FBIS FOREIGN BROADCAST INFORMATION SERVICE

NOTE

JPRS publications contain information primarily from foreign newspapers, periodicals and books, but also from news agency transmissions and broadcasts. Materials from foreign-language sources are translated; those from English-language sources are transcribed or reprinted, with the original phrasing and other characteristics retained.

Headlines, editorial reports, and material enclosed in brackets [] are supplied by JPRS. Processing indicators such as [Text] or [Excerpt] in the first line of each item, or following the last line of a title, indicate how the original information was processed. Where no processing indicator is given, the information was summarized or extracted.

Unfamiliar names rendered phonetically or transliterated are enclosed in parentheses. Words or names preceded by a question mark and enclosed in parentheses were not clear in the original but have been supplied as appropriate in context. Other unidentified parenthetical notes within the body of an item originate with the source. Times within items are as given by source.

The contents of this publication in no way represent the policies, views or attitudes of the U.S. Government.

PROCUREMENT OF PUBLICATIONS

JPRS publications may be ordered from the National Technical Information Service, Springfield, Virginia 22161. In ordering, it is recommended that the JPRS number, title, date and author, if available, of publication be cited.

Current JPRS publications are announced in Government Reports Announcements issued semi-monthly by the National Technical Information Service, and are listed in the Monthly Catalog of U.S. Government Publications issued by the Superintendent of Documents, U.S. Government Printing Office, Washington, D.C. 20402.

Indexes to this report (by keyword, author, personal name, title and series) are available from Bell & Howell, 1700 Shaw Road, Rockford, Ohio 44860.

Correspondence pertaining to matters other than procurement may be addressed to Joint Publications Research Service, 1000 North Glebe Road, Arlington, Virginia 22201.

ACADEMICIANS EXPRESS THEIR OPINIONS ON POLITICAL PROGRAM

Buenos Aires LA PRENSA in Spanish 13 Aug 80 p 4

[Text] The minister of the interior, Maj Gen Albano Harguindeguy, held a meeting yesterday with Drs Alberto Baeza Lynch, Osvaldo Lendoit, Luis Botet, Isidoro Ruiz Moreno and Alejandro Lanari, all of them members of the Academy of Moral and Political Sciences. They were invited to participate in the so-called political dialog, and to express their opinions on the Armed Forces' Political Guidelines for the National Reorganization Process.

All of them, with the exception of Dr Ruiz Moreno, gave Minister Harguindeguy documents in which each of them presented his opinion on the programs and doctrines contained in the guidelines.

The meeting took place in the Salon Gris of the Casa de Gobierno. After the gathering, the participants reported to journalists what had happened, and Dr Ruiz Moreno revealed the idea that had been expressed to Minister Harguindeguy.

Dr Baeza Lynch

In the document submitted by Dr Baeza Lynch mention was made of the "gratitude and appreciation for the success of the Armed Forces in the war against the terrorists who, it is well known, were originally organized by Peron and were maintained by the international Marxist-Leninist movement with the support of several traitors residing abroad."

He stresses that "fortunately, new Argentine cities are among the safest in the world for those who want to live in peace, and the human rights of their inhabitants are well protected."

With regard to the Political Guidelines, the document states that they contain features which must be implemented in order to restore a truly republican system. However, it points out that some of the features "are somewhat ambiguous, and therefore require clarification."

The document goes on to say that, for example, the reference to the institutionalization of the Armed Forces, as worded in those documents, "could be interpreted as indicating a desire to make the military a fourth branch of government not envisioned in the constitution, or as reflecting a plan to subordinate civilian power to military power. Such has not been the intention of those who wrote the document; if that were the case, it would distort the three-branch system established by the constitution."

After stating that "the ambiguity means that the idea must be clarified," Dr Benegas Lynch points out that the institutionalization could be achieved by means of adequate measures by the military ministers of each branch of the military, or through a Security Council "created by law in accordance with the constitution."

With reference to the Political Guidelines' mention of the need to "ensure adherence to the fundamental principles of the constitution, and to "ensure the subsequent establishment of a representative, republican and federal democracy," Dr Benegas Lynch indicates that "these concepts should complement each other in order to be effective, with an express acknowledgement of the need to decide on the appropriate legal mechanism which would categorically exclude from the political scene any activity or proselytism which would violate the basic, eternal and immutable principles of the constitution, principles which form the basis of a free society."

Repeal of Totalitarian Legislation

Dr Benegas Lynch argues "the urgent need to repeal totalitarian legislation before any electoral process can begin. This legislation still is on the books, having been passed beginning in 1943. It laid the groundwork for the corrupt democracy which we have had to endure, and reached the zenith of perversity during the period of 1973-1976. Particularly serious is the legislation referring to labor activities, because the labor movement can never be free and democratic as long as the single union system prevails, requiring compulsory contributions." He also asserts that "we should stress, as stipulated by the constitution, the vital need for a precise limitation of the functions of the state. For this purpose, the National Reorganization Process would have to accelerate as much as possible the program to reduce government involvement. This would lead to much less costly government, and the state would stay out of areas where it has no business interfering." In this manner, "and only in this manner, will it be possible to effectively reduce profligate public spending, which is impossible to cover with real resources, and which causes monetary inflation and increasing indebtedness."

Furthermore, he maintains that there must be a recognition of "the need to take immediate action on studying monetary and banking reform. Such a far-reaching reform would take monetary affairs out of political hands."

With regard to social security, he suggests that Argentina abolish the state monopoly and open the market to private social security funds. Concerning international policy, Dr Benegas Lynch states that "the patriotic desire to prevent the propagation of communist tyrannies in our region was reflected in recent statements by the president regarding the situation in Bolivia," but he points out that "it would be useful to complement those statements in every case with more specific affirmations of solidarity with the free world. This implies an abandonment of excessively close ties with the communist world, all in accordance with the philosophy behind the National Reorganization Process."

Finally, Dr Benegas Lynch indicates that "the Political Guidelines are clear enough, including their elements regarding freedom of the press, independence of the judicial branch, education and culture, all of which have been set forth in the constitution. And the Process is committed to faithfully respect the constitution."

Dr Alejandro Lastra

The document submitted to Minister Harguindeguy by Dr Alejandro Lastra begins by pointing out that "the Republic of Argentina is at a crossroads as a result of the moral, political, economic and social chaos caused by Peronism over more than 40 years of devastating impact on national life;" and that "its consequences became more serious during the 3 years of misgovernment, squander and immorality that lasted from May 1973 to March 1976."

He adds that "when the Armed Forces took over the reins of government on the latter date, they performed an act of salvation, full of promise; however, we must bear in mind that the task did not end there, and that on the contrary, that was just the beginning of a long, difficult job."

He stresses that "the work begun in 1976 has produced undeniable benefits, the most outstanding being the destruction of the organized guerrilla movement that threatened our organized structure and catapulted us into a chaos even deeper than that we had already experienced." He states: "If the guerrillas had triumphed, we would have been launched into the Marxist orbit, imposed by force with arbitrariness and despotism."

After mentioning other considerations, Dr Lastra indicates his general concurrence with the Political Guidelines, with some clarifications and exceptions.

For example, he explains that the guidelines assert the indispensable requirement of "ensuring adherence to the basic principles of the constitution," and stresses that "we would have preferred a plain and simple statement about 'ensuring adherence to the national constitution,' since the word 'basic,' repeated later with reference to the political parties, could generate some controversy about which are the basic principles. This is especially true given the rumors about and the undeniable trends toward a reform of this nation's basic law."

Dr Lastra claims that "there should be a resounding affirmation of adherence to the national constitution, without additions that could cause disturbances or be exploited for purposes contrary to the intangibility of the constitution."

He asserts that the constitution "should be considered unique and immutable, subject to reform only through the means established by the document itself."

He also expresses the opinion that "the totalitarian ideologies alluded to in general terms in the guidelines should be mentioned expressly, although other forms of totalitarianism that might appear may not be excluded." He states also that "proscriptions or prohibitions should not only be selective, but also sectorial, relating to groups, associations or political parties whose doctrines or conduct lend them a totalitarian character. These prohibitions should be expressly indicated."

"It must be made clear," he stresses, "so that there will be no doubt of the goals pursued. . . .and nondemocratic parties and ideologies such as Nazism, fascism, communism and also Peronism (which has similar features) should be excluded."

He maintains that such exclusions can be done through the electoral legislation, and should "extend particularly to organizations of that nature, including as well any party or parties, person or persons, who try directly or indirectly to obtain the support of those political forces or of one of their advocates or sympathisers, by any means."

Dr Lastra recalls that the country "has had a bitter experience in this sense," and "it is necessary to take measures to prevent an attempt to repeat the operation which led to one candidate being supported by all Peronists." He points out that that event "was fatal for the nation, because it led to all the later consequences."

Armed Forces Participation

Concerning the institutionalization of the Armed Forces, Dr Lastra states that it should be undertaken "within the limits and in the manner stipulated by the national constitution," because "to give them authority for another intervention would be dangerous for the military itself, probably leading to its politicization."

The Armed Forces could cooperate by becoming part of the cabinet, he says, with additional participation in an Economic and Social Advisory Council.

Speaking of the economy, he says that "the National Reorganization Process has done a great deal, but there is still a long and difficult road ahead." He indicates that there is an urgent need to curb public spending and to balance the budget. It is also essential that inflation be done away with, and that the structure of the Central Bank be reformed so that it will once again be autonomous.

Dr Lastra emphasizes that he agrees "with widespread opinion that the nation is not ready to be subjected to an electoral consultation," and that first it will be necessary to strengthen the Process. However, he points out that in the stages to come, civilians should be given more say in the administration of the republic; they should have more participation in the national cabinet, provincial and municipal governments.

He is of the opinion that "it would be a good idea to form a national party that would be in the ideological center, between extreme positions. It would have as its members the vast majority of the population that does not feel represented by existing parties." He notes, however, that it should "be the spontaneous product of the desire that has already been manifested; it should not have any official trappings or nature," as the government should remain aloof from that part of the Process.

Dr Lastra also asserts that the politicization of unions should be prevented, and the idea of the single union should be done away with.

Dr Luis Botet

The document submitted by Dr Luis Botet indicates that the Political Guidelines "deserve general approval because they adhere to the goals of the national constitution. Their objective is the continuity of our republican way of life."

He comes out in favor of constitutional reform, although he does not feel that now is the time for it. The reason is that "factionalism and the non-republican organization of some political parties still persist, while the majority of them are still anarchistic."

He adds, "Although I perceive obvious dissent, the monolithic structure of labor unions is maintained as the basis of the Justicialist party. Even though various leaders try to deny this, their dissension--also obvious to me--will not change anything when there is an election."

Dr Botet claims that without serious prior preparation of the electorate, a referendum would have negative results, even if the best technical team wrote an excellent proposal.

After going into other considerations concerning this issue, Dr Botet states that "despite the efforts of this government, it would be impossible and suicidal to call elections or a 'referendum.'" He goes on to say that "a positive result, which would mean stopping the swing of the pendulum that has been moving between elected and military governments for half a century, would require a reform of the organic part of the constitution. It would also necessitate the formation of a few real political parties, with truly republican ideas (not the class struggle), with members who had real and proven abilities to fill the highest representative public offices."

Intermediate Groups

With regard to the intermediate groups mentioned in the Political Guidelines, Dr Botet indicates that it would be a good idea to specify that "they will never be able to undertake activities reserved for the political parties, nor to form alliances with any of these parties, without prejudice to the freedom of each of their members to exercise the right to vote."

Dr Botet also maintains that "it is a gross error to give political responsibilities to the municipal government, because it is a government agency that has been expressly excluded from that area by the national constitution; that function corresponds only to the executive and legislative branches."

Concerning the institutionalization of the Armed Forces, he stresses that "in no way should it go beyond the establishment of a defense ministry," because "the government is the government, and the Armed Forces have a specific function that is well known. This function can never be confused with that of the government, which is essentially deliberative. That is why there is a separate branch."

With respect to culture, Dr Botet expresses the opinion that the guidelines leave no room for objections; he agrees with the comments made by Dr Bunge Lynch concerning the economy, and with Dr Ruiz Moreno with reference to the issue of international policy.

He also notes that he has no objection to the guidelines' mention of social, scientific-technological and territorial issues.

On the other hand, he stresses that in the "area of security" section of the Political Guidelines, the last paragraph is not clear and requires an explanation of what was meant by the words "necessary freedom of action on the part of the military."

He adds that, in his opinion, "it can only refer to a possible reactivation of guerrilla warfare, because the functions of the military have already been set forth and duly refulated in the constitution; a state of war has also been provided for."

Dr Osvaldo Loudet

Dr Osvaldo Loudet, in the document he prepared, states that he "agrees basically with the Political Guidelines," and that this political dialog, "its title notwithstanding, has no political objective; it is simply informative and critical." He emphasizes that "it is necessary to find a formula to save the republic once and for all, eradicating the alternation of dictatorships and demagoguries."

He adds that "the creed adopted by this government deserves our respect and praise," because it draws its inspiration from the principles of the national constitution.

He recalls that the Armed Forces "have been forced to take power because there was a power vacuum, due to ignorance, incapacity and immorality." He goes on to say that "the new transitory power goes against the disruptive influence of all extremist ideologies and the corrupting influence of any demagoguery."

He stresses the need to "educate the sovereign," pointing out that democracy is not possible without the prior education of the people. Without that education, "it is easy to persuade the ignorant masses and take power."

He also comments, after going into other matters, that "starting from the basis of universal suffrage, the suitability of the vote must be determined, and it must be given a different social meaning." Thus, for example, "the married man should have two votes, and his vote should be multiplied according to the number of children he has; family responsibility should increase the value of the vote, as well as intellectual capacity. Just as there are government subsidies, there should be civic subsidies."

Concerning the institutionalization of the Armed Forces, Dr Loudet maintains that it "would mean introducing a fourth branch of government, with deliberative functions." That, in turn, would mean "introducing politics, with its doctrines and passions, into an institution that is above political doctrines."

He claims that "the Armed Forces are merely technical advisers that are indispensable for the executive branch, and are represented by the necessary ministries." Their main function is to protect and defend the national constitution and national sovereignty.

Dr Loudet also asserts that we must step up the study of Argentine history at all levels, because it "gives examples of the falls and resurrections, like those experienced by most nations, but one can clearly perceive an unbreakable ascending line."

Dr Ruis Moreno

At the meeting with journalists, Dr Isidoro Ruis Moreno pointed out that during the interview with the minister, he had justified the actions of the present government, while at the same time emphasizing its adherence to the principles of the constitution, in the Political Guidelines.

He also indicated that he did not believe in constitutional reform without resorting to procedures not envisioned in the constitution itself.

Later Dr Ruis Moreno reported that he had studied the possible consequences of the institutionalization of the Armed Forces as a fourth branch of government, and that he had come to the conclusion that it was not a good idea.

International Policy

When asked about the government's attitude regarding foreign policy, Dr Isidoro Ruis Moreno indicated that he concurred with Argentine tradition. With regard to Bolivia, he stated that the government followed the Estrada Doctrine, and that international recognition was de facto. He added that once it has been proven that the new authorities have a good grasp of the issues, recognition is appropriate."

Nonaligned Countries

In response to a question about Argentina's position toward the nonaligned countries, Dr Ruis Moreno stated that "it seemed erroneous."

Disagreements

During the meeting with journalists, Dr Botet spoke of his position supporting constitutional reform, an issue on which the other academicians present disagreed with him. They also disagreed on the origin of the Peronist government and of Peron, as explained by Botet.

The minister of the interior, in his usual introduction of the guests, indicated that the dialog with the members of the Academy of Moral and Political Sciences "had served to enlighten and improve the Political Guidelines of the Armed Forces."

Next Meeting

The political dialog will continue next Tuesday, when leaders of the Justicialist Doctrinal Reaffirmation movement, an internal movement in the Justicialist party, will go to the Casa de Gobierno.

That group will consist of Dr Raul Matera, Alberto Iturbe, Enrique Osella Munos, Raul Tecera del Franco and Delia D. de Parodi.

UNIVERSITY RECTOR EXPLAINS MEASURES AGAINST MARXIST INFLOW

Buenos Aires LA PRENSA in Spanish 14 Aug 80 p 6

[Text] Mar del Plata, Buenos Aires--The rector of the National University of La Plata and head of the Council of Rectors of National Universities (CRUN), Dr Guillermo Gallo, stated that "all necessary efforts have been and are being made to eradicate Marxist infiltration of universities, especially in all sectors where there is an indication of more need for such action." However, he pointed out that "we must also be careful not to be on a constant witch hunt."

The academician made these statements here in this city, where he is participating in the 27th Annual Assembly of the International Council for Teacher Education. He responded to questions about recent statements by Monsignor Antonio Plaza, archbishop of the Rio de la Plata Diocese.

"I have cordial relations with Monsignor Plaza," asserted Gallo, "and the episode has been completely forgotten." He went on to say that "we understand that we have always been on guard against the actions of Marxist elements; I am not saying there are no more Marxists, or that we have eliminated their activities, because we also know their underhanded ways. But we have taken special care to prevent their infiltration."

Gallo stressed that "this is a difficult task, but the results can be seen in all aspects that we have noted." He remarked that "we cannot always be on a witch-hunt."

Later, when asked about the actions taken by the Ministry of Education and the criticism of that national ministry, the president of CRUN stated that "of course I do not agree with this criticism, which to a great extent can be attributed to the upcoming change of government; that is why there has been increasing criticism of the Ministry of Economics as well, for example."

He emphasized that "from no standpoint can it be alleged that education has been a weak spot for the government." He stated, "Much has been done, and done well. The problem is that the work has been done silently; but there has been progress."

In addition, with regard to the university tuiff, Gallo pointed out that "it has always existed, or practically always at the University of La Plata, for example; it is not a factor that has had any influence on lower enrollment or on the dropout rate, and it has not even affected people's appreciation for learning."

This is a minimal fee, he said, "which perhaps could have an impact--also minimal--on industrial areas, but not on universities in general." He added that "moreover, it is a question of collecting funds which are later turned over to the university in the form of scholarships."

SOCIAL BENEFITS LAW GOES INTO EFFECT

Social Welfare Ministry Announcement

Buenos Aires CLARIN in Spanish 16 Aug 80 p 4

[Text] The minister of social welfare, retired Rear Adm Jorge Alberto Fraga, announced yesterday at a ceremony at the ministry that the Social Benefits Law was being enacted, and he made public the message that the ministry was sending to the president, as well as the articles of the new law.

The ceremony was attended by the secretaries of social coordination, social action, social security, public health, the technical secretary and the head of the cabinet of advisers, retired navy Capts Jose Maria Cohen and Luis Ugarte, Dr Santiago Manuel de Estrada, medical Rear Adm Manuel Iran Campos, retired navy Capt Bartolome Deluschi and the delegates of the army and navy to the ministry, retired Col Reinaldo Taberuero and Capt Efren Villegas, respectively.

The Message

In its most significant passages the message notes, among other things, that "pursuant to the guidelines of Law 16,610, the system is obligatory among workers rendering services for others, pensioners, retirees, those receiving noncontributory national benefits and their respective family units."

Now, "we are envisaging the possibility of gradually incorporating the independent workers included in the national pension and retirement system, and their respective family units, to the extent allowed by the characteristics of each activity and an overall balance."

A person can choose not to avail himself of the benefits that the appropriate social benefit agency is supposed to provide him. To do this, he must submit to the agency a certificate issued by a medical benefits agency authorized by the National Social Benefits Institute (INOS). Once the certificate is presented, the employer will withhold from the worker only 10 percent of his personal contribution, which will go to the appropriate social benefit agency along with the entire contribution of the employer.

The new law specifies the procedure by which medical benefits agencies obtain authorization from the INOS.

It adds that "the obligatory nature of the system" is based on the principle of social solidarity, the essentialness of the health care service and the educational role of creating an awareness about health.

Priority is given to medical aid benefits, for which the social benefits agencies must earmark at least 80 percent of their gross revenue. Death benefits can be included.

A total of 90 percent of the money in the Redistribution Fund must be allocated for medical services in which the INOS will be involved.

The amounts or percentages of current contributions and taxes that are greater than those set by the new law still apply. Nevertheless, an attempt will be made to gradually standardize taxes and contributions, to which end the Executive Branch can order higher amounts lowered, "as long as the system's economic and financial condition so permits" until "they are completely eliminated over a period to be decided by regulations."

One of the law's major points, the message states, is that the system's funds, as well as the assets of the social benefits agencies, will be regarded as "public in nature." In this way, "we will be accomodating an institutional as well as a doctrinary reality, because we have charged social benefit agencies with pursuing public and social interest goals."

As far as the administration of the system is concerned, the law calls for the continued existence of the INOS as "the managing body and the enforcement authority" with jurisdiction over the applicable social benefits.

However, the makeup of the INOS Board of Directors is "substantially" modified; it consists of seven members appointed by the Social Welfare Ministry, one by the employers and one (the ninth) as a representative of beneficiaries.

The INOS will have "legal capacity and sufficient powers" to promote the development of benefits, to manage and control the system and to coordinate, participate in and supervise the activities of the agencies and will enjoy "specific jurisdiction to apply sanctions" pursuant to the regulations that the Executive Branch establishes in due time.

Each agency will be "an individual legal, administrative and financial unit, without any ties to workers' trade union associations." The Social Welfare Ministry will approve their bylaws and will grant them legal status. This will make them legal persons with the scope provided for in the Civil Code for juridical persons and will establish them as recipients of funds.

Each agency will be managed and administered by a council made up of one representative of the state, three representatives of beneficiaries and three representatives of employers.

Major Points Outlined

Buenos Aires CLARIN in Spanish 16 Aug 80 p 4

[Text] The following are the main points of the new Social Benefits Law, as CLARIN previewed in last Saturday's edition:

--The gradual incorporation of independent workers and their family units into the system.

--Those covered by the system can choose not to avail themselves of any of the benefits that they are supposed to receive from their social benefits agency; they must prove that they have joined a duly authorized medical benefits agency.

--In that case, the employer will withhold only 10 percent of the affiliate's personal contribution, which will go to the corresponding social benefits agency, along with the entire employer contribution.

--The social benefits agencies must allocate at least 80 percent of their gross funds to the provision of medical care services.

--The INOS must allocate at least 90 percent of the Redistribution Fund's monies for medical care purposes.

--The system will be run by the INOS under the jurisdiction of the Social Welfare Ministry and within the purview of the State Secretariat for Social Security.

--The social benefits agencies will possess individual legal status and will be totally unattached to trade union organizations, none of the names of which can they include in their own.

--The management and administration of each social benefits agency will be handled by one state representative, three representatives of contributing employers and three representatives of beneficiaries, to be designated in accordance with a procedure that will be stipulated by the regulations.

--The social benefits agencies will operate as financial backers of services, without developing their own operating capacity and while attempting to cut down on existing capacity.

--Physical persons, individually or in groups; state, public or joint agencies, and profit- or nonprofit-making private agencies can be hired for the provision of medical care services. Cooperatives, mutual associations and enterprises providing such services directly can also be hired.

--The Executive Branch will approve the schedule of fees for services, and the INOS can draw up lists of medicines to be used by the social benefits agencies.

--If the person in charge of depositing the contributions withheld from workers deliberately fails to do so, he will be sentenced to prison for from 1 month to 6 years.

--Workers trade union organizations can grant social tourism benefits, but with their own funds.

--The INOS will organize the system under the law within a maximum period of 3 years. To this end it will set the guidelines for the minimum size of the social benefits agencies and must order the gradual merger of current ones below that minimum size.

Law Termed Major Change

Buenos Aires CLARIN in Spanish 16 Aug 80 p 4

[Article by Claudio Polosecki]

[Text] The new Social Benefits Law takes a different approach to the various political, economic, philosophical and functional aspects of the problem of social medicine in our country.

Whereas politically and economically it introduces a series of drastic modifications in the administrative system that has been in effect for the last decade, it opts for an intermediate solution in terms of the philosophical concept of the system and introduces practically no innovations in the strictly functional side of the health care equation.

We can assert that the law clearly and decisively fulfills its main political objective, which as has been repeatedly pointed out was to take the function of administering social funds away from trade union organizations.

From now on, not only will the unions not be involved in administering the funds, but furthermore they will be prohibited from providing any kind of medical care benefit; moreover, they will not be able to play a direct role in designating the representatives of beneficiaries, who will make up one-third of the management of the social benefits agencies.

Economically, the most noteworthy feature is that the social benefits agencies will change from "providers" of services to "financial backers" of services, which from now on must be furnished by agencies hired for that purpose. This will almost certainly open up a wide range of action for commercially organized medicine.

In this same area we should point out the state's increased role in the system in the form of the expanded resources of the INOS Redistribution Fund, which the law stipulates will be gradually enlarged.

With regard to the philosophical principles of the issue, the law takes an intermediate path between the doctrines of "voluntary" and "obligatory" participation. It stipulates that anyone desiring to waive his benefits can do so, but he must continue to pay 10 percent of his personal contribution; the employer must continue to pay his entire contribution.

In contrast, the amount of the respective contributions has not been changed.

Functionally, the main innovation is the scheduled gradual incorporation of independent workers into the system and the grouping together of current social benefits agencies, depending on their size. Once again the problem of coordinating public and social health policy has been left unresolved.

This contrasts with the detailed mechanism established to dissolve the structures developed by trade union organizations even before the enactment of Law 18,610 in 1970.

We can therefore say that the only objectives that have been thoroughly achieved involve the modification of the political and economic role of the social benefits agencies in our country.

Whereas the organizations designed to protect the interests of the workers used to be involved in running these agencies, we will now have a system in which the figure of the "beneficiary" is placed on an equal footing with the figure of the "contributing employer," even though the former has his contributions withheld from his gross pay while the latter passes on the cost of his contribution to the price of the product or service he provides, which the consumer winds up paying for.

Ultimately, however, this legislative approach cannot be considered a novelty, inasmuch as it is the same approach on which the Workers Trade Union Associations Law is based and which has permeated all recent social legislation.

STOCK EXCHANGE OFFICIALS OBJECT TO CNV FEE

[Text] The Buenos Aires Stock Exchange has made public its reply to the note that Finance Secretary Juan Alemann sent to the exchange on 24 July (which in turn was in response to a another note that the exchange sent to the Finance Secretariat on 18 July), in connection with the proposed charging of fees for the services rendered by the National Securities Commission (CNV).

The note from the Buenos Aires Stock Exchange, which is signed by Messrs Julio J. Bardi and Victor Allievi, the exchange's president and secretary, respectively, contains a series of objections to the proposed measures. Its main point is that the CNV, far from rendering a service, which would justify a fee, merely performs a formality or grants an authorization. "Granting permission to draw on public savings cannot be likened to the provision of a service, in the strict sense of the word."

Fees and Taxes

The exchange then analyzes the scope of the terms "fee" and "levy," stating in this regard that "a fee can in no way be equated with a tax for a specific purpose. It so happens that a 'fee' is a charge, whereas a 'tax' is a levy."

"Moreover, although the distinction between fee and tax becomes blurred in some cases, fees should at least bear some relation to the cost of the services rendered, which is not the case here, because only the tax-paying ability and the ease of collection are taken into account, which causes the burden of a general administrative function to fall inequitably on certain people."

Auditing Balance Sheets

With regard to the elimination of balance sheet audits, the exchange states categorically: "On the other hand, eliminating balance sheet audits, as you propose, would simply mean the destruction of the basis for the system of public securities offerings. We are in complete disagreement with this because among other things it would violate the principle of a subsidiary role that the national government has repeatedly asserted and that is highlighted in the Political Bases of the National Reorganization Process.

"Investors have always been one of its main concerns, even during times that bring back unpleasant memories, when policies hostile to free enterprise, business and private savings prevailed."

Additional Costs

The Buenos Aires Stock Exchange continues thus: "To give an idea of the enormous additional cost entailed in charging fees, we need only mention that during the first half of this year the corporations listed on the Buenos Aires Stock Exchange collected 108 billion pesos from stock applications. The fees that would have been collected over this same period, not counting the fees for common investment funds, 'over-the-counter' brokers, audits and other similar services, would total 11.5 billion pesos. In other words, they would have amounted to 11 percent of total receipts. No further comment is required on these figures.

"The state cannot refrain from performing an overall assessment of the problem, because the yield of investment in stocks depends on various interacting variables, including the access of corporations to real sources of capital formation and to reasonable opportunity costs in relation to financial indebtedness."

The State's Competitive Edge

"If the state competes at an advantage by issuing inflation-proof securities with a fixed rate of return and with tax exemptions and if, in addition, it taxes companies prepared to deal in the primary securities market, we cannot state that the primary market will grow because of the higher rate of return offered by securities, since it is obvious that their rate of return can never equal what the state can offer."

Reconsidering State Control

In conclusion, the Stock Exchange note calls for an in-depth analysis of its remarks before the enactment of a new system of levies on corporations that offer public securities and on stock and securities markets.

"The proper thing would be, on the one hand, to reconsider the meaning, methods and scope of state control with a view towards determining what aspects it should supervise and to what extent it ought to do so, and secondly, to overhaul the supervisory bodies and coordinate their activities with other institutions that could lend their cooperation. It should then determine the actual financial burden that the entire community, not just certain sectors, ought to bear in order to guarantee that savings are properly channeled, inasmuch as sound economic growth, which is the result, benefits the entire nation."

ALEMANN COUNTERS BARDI'S OBJECTIONS TO PROPOSED FEE

Buenos Aires LA OPINION in Spanish 16 Aug 80 p 24

[Text] Finance Secretary Juan Alemann yesterday defended the National Securities Commission's (CNV) authority to charge fees for its services and described as excessive the fees that the Stock Exchange charges, asserting that the commissions of stockbrokers are "exorbitant" in comparison to those in other countries.

Replying to a letter addressed to him by the president of the Stock Exchange, Vice Adm Julio Juan Bardi, which was carried in yesterday's papers and which dealt with the bill to charge fees for CNV services, Alemann pointed out that the bill "envisions that the Executive Branch can reduce them, so that the ones that have been made public should be regarded as maximum figures. We are now taking a look at what levels will actually be set. In the case of corporations in particular, the fees listed in the bill are excessive."

He points out that according to estimates by the CNV, if the fees had been in effect in 1979, it would have collected a total of 18.4 billion pesos. He notes in comparison that the Stock Exchange would have taken in more than 7 billion pesos that same year.

He stresses that the fees of the CNV will be paid by corporations, stockbrokers, "over-the-counter" brokers and the securities markets, whereas the fees of the Stock Exchange are paid directly by investors. Therefore, he says, "the concern that the Stock Exchange has expressed for those who place their savings in stocks should lead to a revision of its fees, which we regard as clearly exorbitant."

"It is inadmissible," he asserts, "for the exchange to charge a two percent fee paying out dividends, reappraisals and reinvestment; a one percent fee for stock applications; a two percent fee for securities safekeeping and a 0.5 percent fee for the redemption of government bonds. Since the Buenos Aires Stock Exchange, together with the Buenos Aires Securities Market, has control of this market, it has a direct responsibility not to frighten off investors with exorbitant fees."

He then refutes the exchange president's assertion that corporations do not need the so-called services that the CNV provides them and that they are capable of turning to public securities offerings by themselves. He argues that "if we admit that it is the function of the state to safeguard public savings and ultimately to preserve the public trust, we have to acknowledge that the CNV has a reason for its existence and also that those who benefit from access to public savings ought to be the ones to cover the cost of this supervision."

Alemann then asserts that the CNV will take another look at its schedule of fees, with a view towards cutting the cost of everything having to do with this issue. He remarks, however, that "I emphasize that the exchange should also review its fees and first of all it should especially see to it that the Stock Exchange fees are the lowest possible while maintaining conditions of high-level operating efficiency."

He reasserts in conclusion that the state must properly exercise its policing authority through the National Securities Commission and that the cost of Stock Market transactions must be cut as much as possible. "To this end we will also have to look at the issue of broker commissions, which are exorbitant compared to those in other countries."

CENTRAL BANK HEAD COUNTERS CRITICISM OF ECONOMIC POLICY

Santiago ERCILLA in Spanish 27 Aug-2 Sep 80 pp 29, 31-32

[Interview with Central Bank President Alvaro Bardon in Santiago by Raquel Correa; date not given]

[Text] Comfortably seated in an upholstered chair in his office, the president of the Central Bank is ready to argue--a thousand and one times--about the merits of the economic system. He is convinced that a market economy is only system which will make Chile prosperous and truly free even in the political field. He agrees with the constitutional proposal because, among other things, it sanctifies that system.

Alvaro Bardon (40 years old, married, three children, a bachelors in business with a minor in economics from the University of Chile and a masters from the University of Chicago) is capable of betting anything that Chile will take off. After giving it some more thought, he says that he believes that this has already occurred.

He is friendly and talkative, "Those who do not talk must not have anything to say," and has a distinctive way of expressing himself. He is loquacious, direct, dogmatic and picturesque. His biting remarks frequently leave their mark.

When we asked him whether there wasn't a risk of making the university unaccesible to the poor by calling for the payment of tuition, which he is doing, he replied in characteristic fashion: "The payment of tuition coupled with scholarships for those who cannot pay and are highly qualified. The university is for intelligent people not poor ones."

He has never worked in the private sector and does not regret it: "For an economist who has been trained for work in the private sector, it is very interesting to hold an executive post in the public sector: He has the opportunity to apply what he has studied to the nation's situation. You earn less money but there is a greater degree of major decision-making."

He maintains that he is also not interested in power rather in the "possibility of contributing to the implementation of policies that one believes are the best for the country, to eliminate underdevelopment, for example."

Statistics

/Question/ You were a member of the Christian Democratic Party and one of the criticisms of that group is that the economic system chosen by the military regime "has a great deal to do with the market but nothing to do with social programs."

/Answer/ That is one of the many demagogic phrases being bandied around in Chilean politics. It is an empty phrase. Nothing is gained by saying that one is sensitive to social issues and then, when one is in power, committing irrational acts which stop the growth of the economy. If the economy does not grow, the conditions of the poor do not improve. Some very catchy phrases can be coined such as the insensitivity of the "Chicago Boys" and the cold world of money. But they are phrases, nothing more. And he adds:

Economics is the most developed social science and that appears to disturb some people. The economists' concern for social issues is efficient and productive and not a verbal, empty concern which is not enough to get anyone into heaven because God knows everything. Some individuals feel that they will get to heaven by speaking on behalf of the poor, but it is not a matter of speaking or preaching rather of finding the most efficient mechanism for truly solving the problem of the poor.

/Question/ The Bishops Conference has stated that the economic system is not just or good because it causes too much poverty...

/Answer/ That remark does not help matters. It is just and reasonable for the members of the church to point out the conditions of the hungry and the suffering, but that statement could apply to each of the past 70 years.

Airplane or Comet

/Question/ The church believes that the current economic system is making the problem worse rather than improving it...

/Answer/ Whoever said that is mistaken, that's all. What can I say? The figures show that they are wrong. I have a great deal of respect for the church hierarchy, but in these matters I have a greater respect for statistics. It is a professional distortion, what can I say? I am certain that today the poor lead better lives. Development provides them with greater access to consumer goods, provides better job opportunities.

With 3 pesos poor people today can buy clothes from Taiwan, Hong Kong or India. With 4 pesos they can buy a radio and proudly walk down the street playing a radio cassette. The standard of living of the poorest sector has improved. This can be seen in the surveys. What can be exhibited against that type of evidence?

[Answer] Testimony which only shows that there are poor people. Of course there are poor people and there must be cases of severe poverty. But, actually, the solution to that situation depends on development.

[Question] An opposition economist said that you believe that the country is like an airplane, that it is merely necessary for the cockpit to take off in order for the rest of the plane to lift off, but instead what we have is a comet with a very long tail...

[Answer] Those are words, nothing more. Empty phrases. All studies prove that as the economy improves, passed a certain level, income distribution begins to show improvement. And the most egalitarian societies are those that have been successful in their development. So that all of us can live better, we must increase the gross domestic product, savings and employment. Without this nothing can be done.

[Answer] It is not a matter of sacrificing generations. If there is no savings, employment and investments, the standard of living of the poor will not improve. They will die of hunger anyway. There is no other alternative: to solve the problem of the poor we must grow and, in order to grow, we must implement a good economic policy. On this matter there are no alternatives only demagogy.

A more egalitarian society can be achieved without growth, he continues anticipating questions and comments, but the people become like sheep and there is no progress. To achieve growth we must use private enterprise, the market, competition. There are some who like a society of sheep. Well, I don't like it. I do not believe that it is compatible with being human. It is more of a condition for animals. With free private enterprise some growth begins and there are some inequalities in the first stage.

[Question] Continuing with your analogy of the flock, we assume that there is a shepherd watching over the weakest or dumbest or most incompetent lamb. Some critics believe that the current economic policy eliminates the shepherd.

[Answer] In Chile the government spends 50 percent of its budget on social programs. We pay 60 percent in income tax, 20 percent in value added tax and about 40 percent for social security tax. What else is there to do? Should we increase taxes even more? In addition, I believe that the size of the government is too big. It saps the energy needed for growth.

[Question] Would that expenditure be necessary if our economy were truly developing and employment was high?

[Answer] Eleven plus percent unemployment. But the unemployed's family receives an average income of 7,000 pesos per month.

[Answer] The Chilean economy is not liberal capitalism. Half of the capital is in the hands of the government and the level of spending and taxes as a percentage of GDP is one of the highest in the world. If this is capitalism, I am Chinese. It is an economy that is moving from extreme state control to a mixed economy which respects private enterprise and greatly values economic liberty.

At This Point In Time...

With respect to the constitutional model proposed by the government, Lardon states:

"It is always best to have a clear idea of the future. Among other reasons, because it is very important for investment and growth. In general, the bill responds to what is possible at this point.

[Answer] But societies change by the decade. Only demagogues say that matters can be settled in days, months or in 3 years. Eight, 10 or 20 years is nothing in the life of a country.

[Answer] The fact of the matter is that I have never been interested in being president. Those who are concerned about being president might be concerned. Those of us who are interested in the creation of a freer society, one that grows, one in which poverty decreases, feel that any formula that guarantees stability is all right.

[Question] According to the "Group of 24," the constitutional formula calls for "a capitalist ultraliberal economic order coupled with political autocracy."

[Answer] Those people are very good about coining phrases, catchy but empty. We have attempted to change the economic base so that the country can grow and progress. To do this we must go from a state controlled economy to a more liberal one.

[Question] Traditionally, economic policy has come from political policy. Is the situation reversed today?

[Answer] The political policies were very bad. Today political models are based more on economic variables than before. The basic change that has been made here toward a freer society has been in the economic field. And since it has been successful, more or less, it has influenced other areas of political development.

Stability

[Question] Since the new constitution is an attempt to institutionalize the present economic policy, is it in keeping with what has been achieved in recent years?

[Answer] Investment levels are still low but they are growing rapidly. I believe that next year we will exceed the historical rate (15 or 16 percent), especially now that the future of the institutional system has been made clear. And in 4 more years we would have to reach 20 percent.

[Answer] The Chilean economy began its take off 3 years ago. This can be measured by looking at the growth of economic activity and, in Chile, the GDP has been growing at the rate of over 8 percent since 1977.

[Answer] It doesn't matter where you start. Other countries had a recession and were left behind. It took Chile more than 20 years to recover from the 1929 world recession. Following the 1975 recession, it took us 2½ years to recover our level of investments.

He predicts that the level of growth will be maintained "because we have a good price structure, we have no balance of payments or external financing problems. Technically, we have no inflation problems. The country has good resources, good investment opportunities and people capable of undertaking business ventures."

"In addition," he concludes, "whether people like it or not, there is political stability. Since capital is frightened very easily, it is attracted to economies that provide more security."

[Answer] Of course. The president has done everything possible to bring economic and political stability to the country. That is very valuable. It is the key to success. Without stability there can be no growth, there is an increase in social conflicts and a democratic system cannot be maintained in such an atmosphere.

PPN SECRETARY GENERAL DISCUSSES PARTY

San Jose LA REPUBLICA in Spanish 20 Aug 80 p 8

[Interview with Carlos Manuel Brenes Mendez, secretary general of the PPN [National Progress Party] by Wilmar Murillo in the column "Political Wednesdays in the Republic"; date and place not given]

[Text] The man who has held the position of secretary general of the National Progress Party for a year and a half, Carlos Manuel Brenes Mendez, has spent half of his life operating a livestock ranch he owns in Quepos, and the other half taking part in politics. He was born 68 years ago in San Jose.

He served as a deputy from 1958 to 1962 during the Echandi administration. He was one of the group of deputies who supported Echandi's election, and he held the position of secretary of the congress. On a number of occasions, he presided there in the absence of those normally responsible. He has never held a judicial post, and says that in politics he has always sought to support the men he considers most capable of governing without bothering about their particular interests. During his youth, he was both a Ricardist and Cortesist. He later came to be a Calderon supporter by conviction. He decided to support Miguel Barzuna, believing that his image and his stature as a leader will cause the split between Calderonists and liberationists to be forgotten, and will help to create a new party in which there will be room for all Costa Ricans with good intentions and who are willing to work. Brenes Mendez gave the following interview to LA REPUBLICA.

[Answer] Because of my admiration for the work done by Dr Calderon, I became a Calderonist. I defend his brilliant administration, and I esteem his family. At this time I do not support the "Junior" movement, because I don't think that this is the most opportune time for such a move. It is my firm intention to oppose him if he is chosen as the Unity candidate, but without resorting to any low blows. I will be moderate about him. It has been customary to issue unfair and exaggerated charges. That happened in the last campaign. I hope that in the next campaign ideas and programs will be analyzed without resorting to personal attacks on the candidates, and especially without getting involved in their private lives.

[Question] In practical terms, how could you show that in the next election the voters will not be polarized between the PLN [National Liberation Party] and the Unity coalition, and that this will benefit the National Progress Party?

[Answer] The last campaign gave us an example. There were two political forces which were entitled to borrow campaign funds and which had a great tradition in previous campaigns: Liberacion and Unificacion. Two years before the election very few people thought that Rodrigo Carazo had any chance. Nonetheless the situation changed and there was polarization, but in favor of the candidacy of Carazo. The PLN, as the opposition party, had a significant number of votes, but it suffered the worst defeat in its entire history. And everyone knows what happened to Unificacion.

[Answer] The same that it has been doing, a person to person approach. The time will come to expose the government's plans and then to extol our candidate, who has already shown that he is a great administrator and is well informed and concerned about public affairs.

[Question] How much money will the National Progress Party be inclined to spend on the election campaign?

[Answer] In politics what matters is not what you are inclined to pay, but only what you can spend. Many people believe that Miguel Barzuna and his party have a very small chance because they are not entitled to draw on campaign funds. But Carazo was also in a similar situation. He had an insignificant amount of resources that did not even amount to 3 million colons. But he was able to spend much more than his opponent, Luis Alberto Monge. This means that if there comes a time when the citizens' interest is awakened and they begin to have faith in something better, then the resources begin to come in. A political campaign fund is an advantage, but it is not decisive in itself.

[Question] What separates you, as a Calderonist, from the Unity coalition, and what unites you with it?

[Answer] Unity is a coalition whose sole bond is the right to a campaign fund. In the PLN, a party with a great tradition, the frictions and wounds left by the clash between opposing trends have not yet healed. Monge has problems because of the dispute he had with Dr Castillo. Just imagine the clash between trends within a coalition that has not even been able to form a party.

I think that once the candidacy is decided, there will be many people who will not support the Unity candidate.

[Question] The vast majority of the Costa Rican people have seen their purchasing power drop tremendously. Don't you think that we have reached a point at which the economic situation could cause us to turn backward in political and social matters?

[Answer] We have already moved backward. It seemed to me that it was a mistake for the Carazo administration to halt programs of the previous administrations that were in full progress and for it to forget the Costa Rican tradition of governing in the interests of all the Costa Ricans.

In previous administrations there were mistakes, but there was also respect for good achievements. Carazo did the opposite. He seems to keep on carpaigning, and he shuts down projects already being carried out, and then turns around and starts them up again.

The simplest cases are those of the Plaza de la Cultura and the Raventos theater. That is why I think that we have moved backward. To move forward now, even though everything can't be blamed on the government, we can turn to National Progress as an alternative.

[Question] Do you believe in the possibility of an alliance between your party and some elements which were considered important in the former Liberation movement?

[Answer] Not only do I believe it is possible, but I have always believed that we should seek an understanding between former Liberationists and sectors that are not with Unity, sectors which have shown sympathy for Barzuna, but have not joined the campaign. I believe that is necessary and I hope it will happen in the future.

[Question] There has been some speculation in recent days that the former minister Gonzalo Facio would be a member of a presidential ticket with Miguel Barzuna. Is that true?

[Answer] I couldn't say anything about that with any certainty, because I have no knowledge of the matter.

But I do believe that Gonzalo Facio is one of Costa Rica's most capable people, and any party would benefit from his wide experience and his knowledge. Let's hope it might be the National Progress Party!

[Question] Unity's preliminary candidate, Jose Nine Garcia, has said that the voters will be concentrated between Liberacion and the coalition and that the coalition will prevail. Do you also believe that National Progress has no chance of winning?

[Answer] I have always esteemed Mr Nine Garcia, but now it seems to me that he is being carried away by his enthusiasm, based on what he is saying. If he had traveled through the nation and talked with the voters, as I have done, he would be more aware of the government's unpopularity, and he would see that there is no chance of Unity's candidate winning a majority.

[Answer] I feel, along with the majority of the Costa Rican people, that the person with the best chances is Mr Calderon Fournier, as he has the support of a large part of Calderonism.

[Question] To which of the two largest parties, Unity and Liberacion, is National Progress closer, and what are the major reasons dividing and separating National Progress from the other parties?

[Answer] Considering the past, of course our closest ties would be with the people who voted for Carazo. But that does not mean that they are necessarily members of the coalition now. Many Liberationists see in Barzuna the person who can move the nation forward in these difficult times.

[Question] Now, turning to the subject of weapons. Do you believe that some people in President Carazo's administration are guilty?

[Answer] Not only do I believe so, but any Costa Rican who doesn't think so would have to be very prejudiced and unwilling to see things as they are.

[Question] Does National Progress want to be a force for change in the national authority, to begin a new phase, to take more vigorous action, to raise different questions, and to offer different possibilities?

[Answer] Of course it wants to make the changes that the times require, but without diverging from Costa Rican traditions and ways of thinking.

[Question] Realistically speaking, don't you think you would have to admit that it would still take a great deal for a party like yours to defeat the election machinery of the PLN or the Unity coalition, and that the only thing you are doing is to maintain your position as a viable alternative for whenever the right moment comes?

[Answer] Some people think that a party can only get the voters' support after several campaigns. But I don't share that opinion. We have to recognize that in Costa Rica, even when we are talking about parties, we still deal in personalities. If Barzuna, with his charisma and his qualities of leadership, can attract the interest of the Costa Ricans, inspire them with confidence and faith in him, the voters won't think about whether he heads a new or an old party. It isn't that Liberacion did everything wrong, but it has made many mistakes. We can't tell about Unity. It is not a party and has not had any success in solving problems. Many problems are caused by the hard times the world is going through, but most of them have been made even worse by the lack of tact on the part of the government. There is a great deal of disillusion. People believed that Carazo would govern in the style of Trejos, and that he would make a strong display of honesty. But on the contrary, he gives attention to second and third-rate issues, and lets major problems, such as the strike in the south, wait. That is why the country is disillusioned and very concerned.

[Question] As a politician, you are practically unknown in Costa Rica. How do you plan to project your image in the economic, political, and social area?

[Answer] You are right, because I am not a politician. Politics has interested me, but I have never had any special aspirations. The politician sets himself a goal and works to achieve that goal. I don't have those aspirations and therefore I have stayed out of the limelight. In any case, projecting my image is not my job; the candidate is the one who has to win the voters' support.

[Answer] I have already said, I don't have any. It surprised me when Barzuna thought about me for secretary general of National Progress. It is possible that in the final stretch another active leader may be chosen, and things may change. My time will certainly not allow me to fulfill the duties that the secretary general has in many parties.

BRIEFS

GRAIN PRODUCERS TO UNITE--The producers of basic grains throughout the country have organized a national chamber for the purpose of testing a series of problems which they say are affecting farmers. Antonio Capella was named president of the chamber. He, along with Victor Alberto Quiros Basso, also a member of the organization, has held meetings in all the ricegrowing areas of the country for the purpose of raising the consciousness of these farmers and of those who raise beans, corn and sorghum. BEEF CATTLE EXPORTS DIMINISH--There has been a decline of approximately 35,000 head of cattle for export this year compared to last year. This was reported by the Meat Regulatory Commission and the Cattle Raisers Chambers Federation of Costa Rica, which attributed the decline to the lack of bank credit, among other factors. Compared to last year, when 174,475 animals were exported to the U.S. market, this year, when that market is wide open with no limits because of the scarcity of the product and when prices are satisfactory, exports will come to 140,000. Of the total earmarked for export, according to current plans, 12,381 animals have been left for internal consumption. This represents at this point 23 percent of the export figure, which is 53,696 head of cattle. This means, it was explained, that 58.9 percent of the total designated for internal consumption in 1980 has been delivered. In disclosing the marked difference from the export figure of 1979, which was 174,475, Pablo Araya, of the Meat Regulatory Commission, said that the decline was caused primarily by the lack of bank credit, since the quantity of fodder available at this time is enough to feed 325,000 additional cattle. At the same time, both attorney Araya and Adrian Castro Gonzalez, president of the Commission and of the Cattle Raisers Chambers Federation of Costa Rica, reported that the influx of cattle to market for internal consumption has been normalized. FORMATION OF U.S. COMMITTEE TO OPPOSE BLOCKADE REPORTED

[Dispatch by Gabriel Molina]

[Text] Havana (AIN)--The creation of an ad hoc committee fighting for termination of the U.S. blockade of Cuba was announced here Saturday by those taking part in the conference of American activists opposed to the blockade that was held from 5 to 30 May in this city.

The leaders of the 14 U.S. organizations will conduct a campaign throughout the United States, moreover, to demand an end to spy plane flights over Cuban territory and to the presence, against the will of the Cuban people, of the American base at Guantanamo.

During the meeting, which concluded Friday, the representatives of the American organizations expressing solidarity with the Cuban Revolution analyzed the ways in which the people of the United States can express their disagreement with the Carter government's policy of hostility toward Cuba.

At a press conference held Saturday at the headquarters of the ICAP [Cuban Institute for Friendship with Peoples], the press was given a statement setting forth the views of the American organizations regarding the small Caribbean island that is building socialism 90 miles from the seat of an empire.

Those participating in the conference's working sessions included Sandy Pollack, of the U.S. Communist Party; Johnnetta Cole, a professor at the University of Massachusetts; Juan Vera, of the Puerto Rican Socialist Party; and Jackie Ramos, of the Venceremos Brigade.

Also present were Sandra Levinson, executive director of the Center for Cuban Studies, New York; Rina Benmayor, of the Institute for Cultural Exchange with Cuba, San Francisco; and Robert Chrisman, of the journal THE BLACK SCHOLAR, California.

Alicia Torres, of the Antonio Maceo Brigade; Leroy Smith, of the National Alliance Against Racism and Political Repression, Washington; Lauren Anderson, of the National Conference of Black Lawyers; and Harold Mayerson, of the National Lawyers Guild represented those organizations.

Other participants were Kevin Lynch, a union leader from New York; Jenny Ocampo, of the San Francisco Cultural Institute; and Eloine [as published] Fuller, of the Cuban Resource Center, New York.

Present at the press conference were Manuel Lee, chief of the America Department at the ICAP, and other officials.

Meeting with Rene Rodriguez

Rene Rodriguez, president of the ICAP, expressed Cubans' pleasure at the presence of those American friends who have spoken out in the United States itself in defense of Cuba and have made themselves heard.

He said, too, that there now exists a long tradition of solidarity practiced by those friends who come from the United States to visit, to engage in exchanges and even to work on projects.

He recalled the solidarity at Giron and during the October Crisis and said that this struggle against the blockade will not be easy, but united we will overcome.

Rodriguez attended a meeting with conference participants at the end of the work sessions. The meeting was enlivened by the groups Moncada and Manguare, and by Sara Gonzales.

Speaking for the Americans, Johnnetta Cole said that the same groups responsible for a reduced quality of life in the United States are those that oppose the ending of hostility toward Cuba.

The instructor from the University of Massachusetts noted the presence at the meeting of Lourdes Casal, who has fought with them there in Cuba's defense.

EASTERN ARMY SECOND PARTY CONGRESS MANEUVERS DESCRIBED

Havana VERDE OLIVO in Spanish 13 Jul 80 pp 30-41

[Article by Jorge Luis Blanco, Eliseo Alberto and Leonel La Rosa: "Like a Single Fist"]

[Text] Combatants: we are present at one of the activities that are most important for the Eastern Army and the Revolutionary Armed Forces [FAR] in the 1979-80 Training Year--the Second Party Congress maneuvers with combat fire. To achieve the objectives assigned for this mission, a persistent effort has been made in recent months: implementation of the training programs for the regular and reserve troops was of higher quality, and scheduled classes and maneuvers were carried out in the small units as well as diverse training programs and exercises of the commanders and staffs.

Now the combatants have the high honor of demonstrating the training they have accomplished and the capacity they have developed for successfully carrying out the sacred mission of defending the Socialist Fatherland.

With the arrival of night the troops begin the maneuvers in the Mayor General Ignacio Agramonte FAR National Field Maneuver Area, in Camaguey. The moment for which they have spent long days preparing themselves has arrived. First they wait in silence; then they hear the voice of command, which repeats the combat orders over all the various means of communication.

Commence.

For many hours the sweat would be clinging to their field uniforms--first in the night combat and subsequently in the offensive on the march; in the repulsion of the counterattack and introduction into combat of the second echelon; and in the airborne landing.

Consistent advance preparation was necessary in order to carry out satisfactorily each one of the steps contemplated in the tactical concept of the maneuvers--preparation involving thousands of effectives ranging from the commander to the very last reservist.

Effort and dedication were present in every class--in every detail however small--with the aim of having everything turn out well. The commitment to obtain a grade of "satisfactory" was not mere words. It reflected the firm determination of the commanders, officers, sergeants and privates to achieve superior training and combat preparation--aspects which must be evaluated in the field proper. It is not a question of maneuvering for the sake of maneuvering.

The Second Party Congress maneuvers are very important, because--as their name clearly indicates--they are designed in honor of that very important meeting of the communists, and because in the present situation of threats and aggression by imperialism this task constitutes one more step toward strengthening our combat readiness.

The Second Party Congress maneuvers unquestionably demonstrated the extent to which the units of the Revolutionary Armed Forces (represented by a grouping of forces of the Eastern Army) are prepared to repel and destroy any armed attack by imperialism against our people.

For several days--amid the smell of powder and the thunder of the explosions--we toured the units of motorized infantry, tanks, rifled and rocket artillery, and landing and assault forces. We saw the men--together with their armament and combat equipment--function with decision and swiftness. The great majority of the targets were bombarded with a precision worthy of the highest praise.

'One projectile for each target. That was also a commitment of ours.'

The command of the units was exercised in a dynamic and correct manner over the various means of communication--via radio, radio relay system, telephone and mobile facilities. The commanders at all levels maintained constant observation of the results achieved in the theater of operations and took the necessary measures at every moment they were required, with the aim of guaranteeing the normal development of the combat actions.

The commanders, moreover, had the opportunity to put into practice the coordination planned for among the various branches, and to verify the combat readiness of the staffs with respect to directing the combat.

Without commanders there is no victory. The correct command of the troops is a given in warfare. Here, during the maneuvers, this fact has also become manifest.

In connection with the movement of the troops one cannot overlook the labor performed by the small units responsible for the technical maintenance and minor repairs required by the battalions. These units operated behind the small units, bringing up the rear of the columns in order to lend technical assistance, eliminate defects and evacuate the damaged vehicles.

During the offensive on the march verification was made of the cohesion and preparation on the part of the tank and motorized infantry units, and of the cooperation among the helicopters, fighter bombers, ground artillery and antiaircraft artillery.

Functioning like a single "fist"; one for all, and all for one.

To achieve victory in modern combat, combat actions must be carried out in an uninterrupted manner both at night and by day, and under any weather conditions. During the "Second Party Congress" maneuvers special attention was paid to the development of night combat actions; and this was reflected in the better moral and psychological preparation of the troops. In this phase rigorous discipline under fire was manifested by all elements participating in the repulsion of the simulated attack by the enemy.

The imperialists may come whenever they wish. We are prepared to meet them in any situation, day or night.

The aviation was also active in support of the ground forces. Using the "called-in air strikes" method of combat action, the group commander was able to utilize this important force on short notice to attack those objectives that could endanger the success of the action. The surface-to-air rockets and bombs battered the targets in the field maneuver area with devastating force. The changes in the parameters and systems for high-speed flight were salient features of the simulated combat that took place in the air.

The pilots give the appearance of being engaged in actual combat. They are doing everything to perfection--as if they were contending with a real enemy.

In modern combat, helicopters are increasingly used because of their ability to transport on short notice sufficient troops and materiel to carry out important missions. They have arrived at the battlefield by flying at low level and taking advantage of the relief of the terrain, with the aim of subsequently landing the small units that will ensure the arrival of the airborne troops without mishaps.

It was precisely these troops--the paratroopers--who were charged with providing a brilliant conclusion to the actions of the Second Party Congress maneuvers. The jump was made from AN-26 transport planes, and was characterized by the great skill and preparation of these men who wear camouflaged uniforms and who accomplished in a satisfactory manner the mission assigned in the simulated rear of the enemy.

The Second Party Congress maneuvers have left a legacy of graphic pictures, facts and anecdotes that attest to the high degree of combat and political preparation which the Revolutionary Armed Forces have in general achieved. We have called this evidence--embodied in photo frames and notebooks--"the maneuvers from the inside," because it was gathered while marching side by side with the troops themselves, sharing the soldier's trench. It was gathered at the artillery emplacements in the jump area of the paratroops, from the laborious work accomplished at the command posts and staff posts, and in connection with the advance of the tanks and motorized infantry.

1. With the Infantry

The soldier was an excellent storyteller. During rest periods his comrades would ask him to tell one of his exciting stories. The point of his stories was not solely in the anecdote itself: you had to see him gesticulate. He reminded one of a puppet. He was not afraid to exaggerate: quite the contrary. I saw him stand on his head in order to illustrate an amusing story.

On the right flank the units of motorized infantry are carrying out intense defensive actions against the positions of direct contact with the enemy, for the purpose of reaching new lines of terrain and repelling the counterattack.

Because the soldier was standing on his head, his voice came out "upside down"--but his comrades were laughing in a straightforward manner. Infantry troops are traditionally talkative. We Cubans are talkative. Everyone tells his own story without very much circumspection. Such self-confidence does not engender danger but rather security.

The tanks and the infantry are now delivering their fire as they advance. The infantry attacks without alighting from the armored personnel carriers. The infantrymen burst impetuously into the enemy positions, annihilate his forces, and continue their offensive into the enemy's rear. All resources are employed in carrying out these maneuvers.

The soldier was truly a terrific storyteller. "You've got to brighten the lives of these fellows," he said. A pharmacist by profession, he is a reservist, an infantryman. On the day of the maneuvers the most outstanding combatant of his small unit was chosen. His comrades argued in his behalf at the emulation meeting. "During the action," they said, "he was a model of discipline. When one of us was a bit laggard he would make some witty remark to spur us on. He was unquestionably the best. He is the best." Another added: "As a comrade, he is unexcelled."

The enemy begins a disorganized retreat toward the operational rear.

The soldier's name is Jose.

"And your surnames?"

"Just put down, 'Jose the storyteller.'"

"That's all?"

"It doesn't seem like much to you?"

2. All of Them!

Making use of the illumination of the terrain, the antitank artillery--consisting of 57-millimeter guns--delivers fire upon the "enemy's" reconnaissance armored cars and other equipment situated in the front line and in the immediate rear, employing tracer perforating projectiles capable of great penetration.

At the time this situation arose in the course of the night combat we were very close to a battery of antitank guns. The noise produced by the 57-millimeter guns almost made it impossible for us to hear the words of command that were being given periodically. The troops labored untiringly at their fire positions. The gun commanders, gunners, gunner's helpers, loaders and supply personnel seemed unaware of the presence nearby of "outsiders" who from time to time were taking pictures.

"Who are you?" one officer finally decided to ask.

"Newsmen."

"What can I do for you?"

"We'd like to know the results obtained by the 57-millimeter guns."

"Very well, comrade. Up to now we haven't left a single target upright. Over there they are saying the reason we don't miss is because we're firing with lasers."

"Which are the best crews in the battery?"

The officer looks at us with surprise, appearing not to understand the question. He directs his gaze toward each one of the fire positions, slowly, as if looking for something he doesn't find.

"All of them!" he says.

"Surely some combatants have been more outstanding than others. Can you give me their names?"

"All of them!"

The antitank guns continue their systematic and accurate fire. At 800 meters distance the projectiles are annihilating the targets.

All of the targets.

A Kitchen of Excellence

"Man is a being surrounded on all sides by oblivion." This was the definition given by a writer (himself now forgotten) years ago in the preface to a book of his which no one now remembers. One cannot entirely agree with this theory, although the life of that poor fellow would appear to serve as an apt demonstration of his fatalistic theory. One should, however, recognize that the act of forgetting is at the least a "sickness of the times"--a defect very prevalent among us.

These reflections (which are perhaps somewhat exaggerated) become topics of polemicized discussion by our working team when someone--after completing a journalistic visit to one of the units taking part in the "Second Party Congress" maneuvers--remarked that no one had ever written about the missions entrusted to a cook who serves with landing and assault troops. How could this neglect be justified? It then occurred to us that we could--we should--write a short composition on the subject. The leader of the small unit enthusiastically supported our proposal. "It's long overdue," he said.

Ernesto's Hour

Who would have said to Ernesto Che Caballero--on the day he graduated as an assembler at a technological center in Camaguey Province--that he would soon experience one of the most moving and unforgettable emotions of his first 20 years of life? On 28 January 1979 Ernesto was called up for active military service, and the comrades of the Military Committee of Nuevitas, his birthplace, asked him if he wanted to be a paratrooper.

"It's a completely voluntary decision," they informed him. Ernesto today recalls that he was rather frightened, because he had previously not even considered such a possibility. Fright has nothing to do with fear, however.

"I accepted," Ernesto said. "I answered them by saying that if it was necessary I'd jump with a parachute. So after passing the specialized medical exam I joined a unit of landing and assault troops and began training."

"What about your fright?" we asked him.

"It went away," he replied, and went on to explain why. The combatants of the landing and assault troops--because of the nature of their missions--develop a personal and collective discipline that is necessarily based on self-determination, comradeship and courage. These three basic principles combine to develop a spirit of teamwork and uncompromising labor. Ernesto Che Caballero verified this fact for himself during the initial training sessions.

"The instructors--and the most experienced soldiers--are totally committed to enhancing the technical skills of the 'novices.' The interest they displayed gave me confidence. In March of that year I made my first parachute jump. It was for me an unforgettable day. When I touched ground I felt tremendous joy."

"When did you start to work in the kitchen?"

"Shortly after my first jump. The command informed me that it was necessary for me to become a cook, and I stepped forward. It was almost more difficult for me to learn to cook than to make a parachute jump. I didn't even know how to make coffee. Or rather, when I did make coffee no one would drink it!"

"What are the missions and duties of a cook in a landing and assault unit, Ernesto?" we asked. Caballero smiled. He obviously had wanted us to ask that question.

"The same as those of any other specialist in that field--as those of any other cook: to ensure that the troops are well fed. In our case, however, a cook has to be able to carry out this task in any kind of situation. We have to jump with the combatants. We use cargo parachutes to drop our kitchen utensils, and we follow them down in our own parachutes."

"How many jumps have you made?"

"Seven. Four of them as a cook."

"What plans do you have for the time when you receive your discharge?"

"I'd like to continue parachute jumping as a sport, and to return to my trade as an assembler."

"What about the cooking?"

"I think my future wife will like to know that her husband does all right with a skimming ladle."

4. When the Banners Are Raised

The "ta-ta-ta-ta" of the 14.5-millimeter antiaircraft artillery is heard in the field maneuver area. The tracer projectiles rise like fine threads in search of the target that is itself slowly descending in search of the ground.

The gun commanders repeatedly raise and lower the red banners which are the signal to fire on the "enemy."

The smell of gunpowder seems to adhere to one's clothing; it is stifling. The shell cases are jumping--still hot--and falling very close to the members of the gun crew. All eyes attentively follow the luminous dot which is struggling at a height of several hundred meters to escape the marksmanship of the antiaircraft guns.

With this maneuver we have concluded the Training Year. We cannot deny that we were anxious about it, because our commitment was to obtain the highest marks. There was a great deal of tension, but the enthusiasm was even greater. Our combat fire was very successful; it was equal to the combat training received. The reservists performed superbly, to the extent that you couldn't tell who were the regular combatants and who were not.

The "ta-ta-ta-ta" of the 14.5-millimeter antiaircraft artillery is no longer heard in the field maneuver area. The sky is clear, without any luminous points in it to indicate the presence of targets to be knocked down.

The banners of the gun commanders are still.

The antiaircraft guns wait for them to be raised again.

5. Four Fellows

On the right flank, a tank column is moving forward from the rear. "It hasn't rained for days, fortunately, but the roads are still badly flooded," commented Raul Vega Fernandez, the 20-year-old leader of a tank crew. The mud puddles are, in fact, bound and determined to obstruct the maneuvers. On orders from the high command the march is organized into a column of platoons. "None of the four of us had previously taken part in maneuvers like these," the 21-year-old tank driver, Fidel Castellanos, told me. The hot sun burns. The evaporation from the damp ground creates a fog-like effect. At the prescribed location the formation deploys in a line of battle and joins in the counterattack. "This crew--our crew--had been chosen as 'best' in the current training year at the unit level, but daily practice is one thing and maneuvers of this scope are quite another," Joaquin Febi Torres, a 23-year-old artilleryman, explains. The hoarse murmur of the motors underlies the thunder of the explosions. We might say (although the simile isn't very military) that the scene reminds one of a herd of buffalo trampling a meadow. "The most difficult moment so far was the first general practice of the exercise," said Nicolas Arrechea, loader, at 19 the youngest member of the crew. "Imagine: we were left without internal communications inside the tank." The tanks immediately open fire. Not a breeze is stirring anywhere in the field maneuver area. The next rain shower is assembling its storm clouds--or can it be the smoke from the downed targets? Who can say? "We had to communicate by gestures," Joaquin said, resuming his narrative. The infantry now begins its offensive, protected by the tank formation. I overhear favorable comment: the actions are turning out well for the fellows. I'm glad; they deserve it. "We accomplished our mission in the maneuvers," Fidel said, "despite the difficulties. It was a moment of great tension. Our platoon leader, 2d Lt Juan Carlos Mateo, was right when he told us we had to be prepared for any emergency."

I believe this young tank crew I had the opportunity to visit several days ago is taking part in this counterattack. These four young men--barely 20 years of age--were self-assured and anxious for their unit to obtain a mark of "satisfactory." Now they're in the midst of it. "Yes," Raul had told me. "We have maintained our vanguard status in the maneuvers, but it hasn't been easy. All the comrades, in my opinion, have made an extraordinary effort. We're confident that we'll accomplish our mission on the day of these maneuvers. I'm sure we won't fail." I had taken down his words verbatim in my notebook. In rereading them I realize that to someone who doesn't hear them spoken in the field these words may appear to be somewhat conventional, or--worse still--a cliche. I won't change them, however, for any phrases that have the appearance of originality. I now look toward the battlefront. The tanks are advancing relentlessly. I attempt to count them but lose track. I don't think it's going to rain. I write down in my notebook:

"Raul, Fidel, Joaquin and Nicolas accomplished their mission."

6. The Observer

The MIG-21's can't be seen in the darkness of the moonless night, but you can hear the deafening roar of their turbines at full power. They are arriving at the battlefield, making their approach at a very low altitude.

"Number 204 here. For the entire squadron: crosswind at 3 meters per second."

"And the cloudiness, 204?"

"Good.... Set a course of 100 degrees."

"For the entire squadron: check your armament."

"Altitude?"

"Altitude 2,000 meters, 204."

"I have you in sight; you can descend...."

"Missiles!"

The first pair dive-attacks the points of resistance, command posts and fire positions of the "enemy" artillery. Coming from underneath the wings like swift, fiery arrows, the large-caliber unguided missiles are smashing down here below, raising thick columns of black smoke.

P 34. The Helicopters Arrive at the Theater of Operations

F 35 (top). The MIG-21's Strike a Blow With Air-to-Surface Missiles

P 35 (bottom). The Antitank Artillery

"Target destroyed. You can return 'home.' Number 204 congratulates you."

I didn't have time to ask him for his name: we shall simply call 204 the "observer." From the beginning of the maneuvers my attention had been attracted to this man who from the ground--in the same theater of operations--was directing the missions of the aircraft by means of a radio set.

"It's a reliable apparatus," he said, "and the conversation is heard with great clarity. By using it, I am always on frequency with the planes."

When the fighter planes have left the airfield the flight director turns the command of the planes over to the observer.

"I then become the eyes and ears of the planes," he said. "From my position on the ground I orient them with respect to everything: weather conditions, the enemy's situation.... I guide them in combat: that's the way it is described."

These were the last words I exchanged with the observer, because a squadron of multipurpose fighter planes was already approaching the field maneuver area. According to the tactical concept, these aircraft would deliver a blow on the "enemy" units that were organizing to launch a counterattack.

"Check direction...; speed...; altitude...."

Based on the characteristics of the objectives targeted, the squadron is employing conventional demolition bombs of great explosive power.

"Bombs!"

From the position I occupy close to a command post, I see the small points descending in search of the ground, as the MIG's recover from their dive and gain altitude.

The observer smiles as he writes down in his notebook: "Target destroyed."

7. Political and Party Work

The continuing influence of the Political and Party Work program to a great extent ensured the success of the Second Party Congress maneuvers.

Work was accomplished in this connection under a plan previously prepared by the Political Section of the group of forces that was charged with carrying out the maneuvers, and also under plans prepared in the units and small units and by the party organizations and UJC [Union of Young Communists].

"Within the framework of the policy line to be followed by the political organizations," Lt Col Manuel Carvajal told us, "the development of socialist emulation was envisaged as a fundamental activity which would serve to stimulate the satisfactory accomplishment of the missions assigned before, during and after the maneuvers. At every moment, a great emulative spirit prevailed both among the regular combatants and the reservists."

From the outset efforts were made to create living conditions appropriate to life in the field. Through the hard work of everyone Lenin-Marti halls, gardens and other facilities were constructed to make the stay of the troops there more pleasant.

While visiting a motorized infantry regiment we happened upon a performance by the FAR Artists Group. It didn't matter that it was raining; from an improvised open-air stage our combatant-entertainers took their art to wherever the troops were engaged in their field training.

"Parallel to the training taking place in the field," the deputy regimental commander for political work declared, "cultural, sports and recreational activities have been carried out. The effort made by the amateur groups in the various units--groups consisting of officers, sergeants and privates who when the daily training was completed took up their musical instruments to enliven the evening for their comrades--was indeed commendable."

Important experience was gained when officials of the People's Government and the mass organizations of the municipalities of the mobilized reservists went to the various units and fraternized with the reservists. These officials brought letters from members of the men's families, reported on the progress of production at their respective work centers, and endeavored to learn of all the concerns of the reservists who had been integrated into the units in the field.

During the maneuvers the Political and Party Work program was involved--among other things--in publicizing safety measures for the avoidance of accidents, and helped to ensure that the combat and transportation equipment was always in good condition. To this end every type of graphic publicity was utilized, and a newspaper was published in the field to provide the information needed by the troops in training there.

The Political and Party Work program was active during every moment of the 'Second Party Congress maneuvers, in support of all missions assigned by the command.

8. Meeting in the Field Maneuver Area

The noise of the artillery and the whirr of the tanks has now ceased, along with the rattle of the machineguns and the crackle of the rifles. The Second Party Congress maneuvers have concluded. These days of training in the field have been difficult and exhausting, but the combatants eliminated the word "fatigue" from their vocabulary.

The occasion in question is a brief ceremony for the purpose of conducting a summary evaluation. This is the reason for all this activity here in the sun-drenched field maneuver area of a motorized infantry division of the Eastern Army.

It is indeed worth while to point out that by their very nature, tactical maneuvers constitute the basic, culminating and definitive activity that follows a lengthy training process.

As in the case of any other activity, these maneuvers have produced results--and it is to these results that Maj Gen Julio Casas Regueiro, alternate member of the Central Committee and commander of the Eastern Army, addressed himself in this concluding ceremony when he declared:

"With the conclusion of these maneuvers it can be said that the divisional and brigade staffs, and battalion and regimental staffs, were trained to plan for combat and to strengthen combat cohesion; and the preparation acquired by the commanders and officers in respect to making decisions, organizing combat actions and carrying out these actions was quickly evaluated and enhanced. The troops were trained under the complex conditions of a situation which is influenced by the presence of the enemy's air and ground forces...."

That was not all, however. In keeping with the results obtained, Reservist Fernando Sosa Perez, echoing the sentiments of his comrades, emphasized with emotion "...our profound gratitude for the opportunity--and also the high honor--that we have had to prepare ourselves and take part in one of the most important activities of the Eastern Army--an activity which is at the same time an appropriate and joyful salute by the Eastern Army combatants to the great gathering of the Cuban communists, the Second Party Congress. "

Moments of intense joy were experienced at this concluding ceremony, which was also presided over by the representatives of the commander of the Eastern Army, unit commanders, officers, local party officials and Soviet military specialists. The moments of greatest emotion came during the presentation of the certificates to the vanguard personnel and the presentation of the banner to a unit of reservists from Palma Soriano, which proved to be the most distinguished unit. No less important was the reading--by Lt Col Manuel Carvajal Valverde--of an address composed by a division of motorized infantry.

The maneuvers have not yet concluded, however, either for the reservists or for the regular personnel. This fact is emphasized by the commander of the Eastern Army, when he declared that "the reservists have the task--together with perfecting their military and political preparation--of striving to increase the productivity of their labor, to raise the level of their skills, and to master the use of equipment, in order to fulfill production plans and programmed production costs.

"The regular personnel," he said, "have the task of striving--as they continue preparing themselves militarily, technically and politically--to maintain and conserve all equipment and to achieve continuing improvement in living conditions."

In his address Reservist Sosa Perez declared that in the course of the maneuvers the great importance of preparing for the defense of the socialist fatherland had been demonstrated. In this connection Maj Gen Julio

Casas Regueiro declared: "I urge that we continue to raise the level of our combat capability, under the inspiration of three great occasions: the Second Party Congress, and the 20th anniversary of the creation of the Eastern Army and of the Baragua units, in 1981."

The reservists are now returning to the factories and farms. The regular military personnel are already applying the measures for accomplishing the work of maintaining and conserving equipment and weapons. This event was simply a meeting, held in the field maneuver area, for the purpose of making a summary evaluation and proposing new missions.

CUBATUR TO PROMOTE INFLUX OF FOREIGN TOURISTS

Havana GRANMA in Spanish 4 Jun 80 p 3

[Article by Jose Gabriel Guma and Enrique Sanz Fals]

[Text] CUBATUR [National and International Tourist Enterprise] will implement a seven-point plan to increase international tourism in Cuba, which last year totaled 200,000 tourists.

This was reported by Jesus Jimenez, director of that enterprise of the INTUR [National Tourist Institute] and chairman of the Organizing Committee of the First Convention of CUBATUR Travel Agents, on the second day of this gathering, which is taking place at the Convention Hall.

The program of support for the work of tour operators and travel agencies includes improvement and simplification of all mechanisms of facilitation with respect to visas and passports, improvement and transformation during this year of the network of stores for tourists, increased efficiency in all services to which tourists are entitled, and more active participation in fairs, expositions and presentations, which contribute to better acquainting those in source countries with what Cuba has to offer.

The other elements of the plan are direct participation in promotion of Cuba in source countries, entailing advertising programs, the first of which has just begun in Canada, with others to be launched soon in other countries; the opening of information, promotion and public relations offices in Frankfurt, Paris, Toronto, Washington and Mexico City in 1980; and improvement of the quality of our advertising media and their variety, with respect to brochures, tourist guides, slides, videotape cassettes and films.

Jimenez noted, "Cuba has, as basic components of its tourist product, numerous incomparable natural resources, a long and rich history to display, a culture that blends the traditional with the modern, and a social system of great politico-economic interest. Supported by a rapidly developing tourism infrastructure and a growing tourist industry composed of countless hotels and other housing facilities located throughout the island, in our chief cities, at the beaches, mountains, lakes, valleys and other points of interest to tourists, these components offer the visitor a pleasant, comfortable stay. Everything together makes up a varied, multifaceted package capable of satisfying the most stringent demands of tourists from abroad."

The CUBATUR director answered a number of questions asked by representatives of travel agencies and air and sea transport enterprises; and he stated that Cuba has 118 hotels containing over 30,000 beds. He also indicated that at present 18 hotels intended for the tourism network are under construction and nearing completion.

Toward the end, the 272 delegates from 27 countries were shown films, videotapes and slides demonstrating Cuba's tourist product and aspects of the country's socio-economic development.

GUTIERREZ DISCUSSES CORRUPTION, VIOLENCE

San Salvador EL MUNDO in Spanish 30 Jul 80 p 32

[Text] The visit to this newspaper by Col Jaime Abdul Gutierrez, member of the Government Revolutionary Junta, in connection with tomorrow's Day of the Journalist, has resulted in a press conference.

The government leader was accompanied by Col Jose Guillermo Garcia, minister of defense, and Col Marco Auerlio Gonzales, a member of COPREFA [Armed Forces Press Committee].

After a greeting for members of the newspaper's editorial staff, with good wishes for each of them and recognition of the news job being done by El MUNDO, Colonel Gutierrez and Colonel Garcia answered questions asked by the editors of this newspaper.

One of the questions dealt with the problem of corruption at the administrative level of government and abuses of authority. Colonel Gutierrez said:

"Corruption is a burden which has been around for a long time and is, therefore, difficult to eradicate from one day to the next. Nevertheless, the Junta has been making an effort since it came into power to put an end to that problem and proof of this is the fact that the Office of the Attorney General has initiated legal action against those accused of this crime. With regard to abuses of authority which occur particularly at the lower levels, the directors of the Security Corps are weekly dismissing those individuals who are not living up to the objective of a sound administration and satisfactory behavior by personnel serving in said corps." Colonel Guitierrez said: "The cleaning out process is complementary to the one being carried out against violence, since it is the intention of this government to have the country travel down the path of order, justice, freedom and work."

To another question about statements made by Colonel Majano to the effect that the Armed Forces' Proclamation would be discredited if violence does not end and that there was an urgent need for dialog with the Revolutionary Democratic Front [FDR], Colonel Gutierrez said that since the Proclamation's purposes included putting an end to violence if it is not controlled there is no question that this Armed Forces Proclamation objective will not have been reached. As for dialog with the FDR, he said: "In order for a dialog to take place, it is necessary to have two parties. Obviously, those of the FDR are not in favor of a dialog since they are proclaiming armed struggle as the solution to a problem which the Salvadoran people will definitely resolve." He explained that everyone in the Junta expresses his opinion and that if in a given case there is discussion as a result of apparently different viewpoints this does not mean that unity of thought and action does not exist at the Junta level. With reference to the attitude of those who are now abroad conducting a promotional campaign to take over the government, the colonel reminded us that some of these persons had occupied the highest levels of government and that they were full of theory but had done nothing practial for our people who are calling for effective measures for their development and well-being. "The great revolution which they are promoting," Colonel Gutierrez said, "was nothing more than a decree for the dissolution of order.

"I believe," he emphasized, "that this country's problems will be resolved by the people, who are the majority, and not by minority groups which have forgotten the national interest and are only seeking their own objectives, without thinking about what the people really want, namely peace in order to work and a climate of security, with respect for and adherence to human rights."

On this same subject, Colonel Garcia, minister of defense, said that the opposition groups will have a great opportunity during the election process which will take place in due time; however, he said that those so-called revolutionary groups feel panic when there is talk of elections, because they know that the Salvadoran people are not in favor of violence and will give them no support. Colonel Garcia added that the Armed Forces are ready to fully guarantee the election process so that it will be the people who decide what kind of government they prefer.

Another question concerned the National University. Colonel Gutierrez answered it by saying that this matter was being studied by a special committee to determine the most appropriate solution to the problem. He advised that they, i.e., the Junta, are not against teaching freedom and that all kinds of opinions can be expressed at the university, including Marxism, but that it cannot be occupied or used for purposes unrelated to teaching and the academic training of those who attend the university to study for a specific career.

Another question was asked about young Morales Carbonell, son of Dr Jose Antonio Morales Ehrlich, member of the Junta. Colonel Gutierrez said that the youth's detention was part of the legal procedures and that the case would eventually be heard in a court martial. He added, in response to a question concerning why in this case detention was ordered rather than a release, as was done in the case of Samayoa Leiva, that this is a court-decision made on the basis of the facts in each case.

For his part, with respect to the detention of Morales Carbonell, the minister of defense said it was worth pointing out that even though the accused is the son of one of the government leaders, this had not exerted influence for his release and that everything had been done in accordance with legal principles.

Another question relating to the dialog between the Junta and sectors opposed to the latter was whether any thought had been given to the moderate elements in the FDR. To this Colonel Gutierrez replied: "Moderate is a relative term because all groups affiliated with the FDR have had the same origin and for publicity purposes have taken refuge in the university. I accept the fact that they are good intellectuals but not moderates; and as concerns the government, it has already tried but did not do a thing."

Finally, on the subject of freedom of speech and referring to the Day of the Journalist, Colonel Gutierrez stated categorically that the Junta was not asking the information media to stop carrying out their news mission, since the Junta understood that this task was the journalist's responsibility. He emphasized, nevertheless, that the job of providing information should be done objectively and truthfully and that it was not acceptable for a news report to be distorted to the detriment of sectors which always expect the truth from their information media.

NATIONAL GUARD HEAD DISCUSSES SUBVERSION

[Text] "Communism proposes to enslave us, no matter how astutely and hypocritically it presents itself as a liberator," said Col Carlos Eugenio Vides Casanova, director general of the National Guard, at a reception his organization held for journalists yesterday. The colonel's comment was made in reference to the country's current situation.

The official added that the National Guard is aware that military action alone is not enough to counteract subversion and that it is also necessary to fight in the ideological sector. "What is more," he added, "we must promote intensive action to strengthen our democratic system so that there is participation by all sectors truly representative of Salvadorans who wish to return to peace in order to work for national progress."

On the subject of the new socioeconomic structures adopted by the government, Colonel Vides Casanova said that changes such as agrarian reform and the nationalization of the banking system and foreign trade are actions which translate into social justice for all Salvadorans. He also said that efforts are being made to ensure the exercise of individual freedoms with responsibility and justice to build a strong society capable of resisting the aggression of foreign systems or ideologies.

"At this time, I should like to call upon the few persons who wish to destroy the country to not only examine their consciences but also to move onto the terrain of practicality, reject Marxist teachings and reintegrate themselves decisively and honorably into the social life which the fatherland demands," he said.

He concluded by saying that the press as an institution and journalists as communications professionals have the fullest cooperation of the National Guard "so that their noble mission of service can be carried out with dignity and so that they will be able to tell the truth with the broadest impartiality."

Colonel Vides Casanova made an appeal for reason, reflection and good sense on the part of all Salvadorans and said that a continuing effort is being made to avoid the loss of human life and the destruction of property. He asked parents to help their children with timely counseling to keep them from taking the wrong road.

LABOR MINISTRY REMINDS WORKERS NOT TO MISS WORK

San Salvador EL MUNDO in Spanish 21 Jul 80 p 21

[Text] The Ministry of Labor and Social Security, in view of the fact that the enemies of freedom of work are trying to paralyze the productive activities of Salvadorans, thus assaulting their economy and welfare, with this notice rouses the workers to attend to their labors and the employers to keep their places of business open without any interruption.

To that end remember that in the Labor Law there are the following clear and definite provisions regarding unjustifiable absences from work:

Article 50, clause 12a, states to the letter:

"The employer will be able to consider the work contract terminated without incurring responsibility for the following reasons: if the worker is absent from his labors without the employer's permission or without justifiable reason for 2 full and consecutive working days or for 3 nonconsecutive working days in the same calendar month, meaning in the latter case not only full days but even half days."

Articles 119 and 171 state: "The worker who does not appear at his job, without justifiable reason on his part, loses his wages corresponding to the days absent, as well as remuneration for the weekly day off."

The ministry invites employers and workers to keep up their normal activities at all times and especially during this week, thus contributing to El Salvador's economic and social development and to a future of peace and tranquillity, which we all want.

PRODUCTIVE ALLIANCE DISCUSSES COUNTRY'S PROBLEMS

Bogota EL TIEMPO in Spanish 25 Jul 80 p 7-B

[Text] Board members of the Salvadoran organization Productive Alliance [AP], which includes El Salvador's industrial, trade and agricultural sectors, have stated that the Jesuits working here are subversives and that the extreme left as much as the extreme right, which are spreading terror in the smallest country in the Americas, represent a minimal part of the population, which does not share their policies.

The AP spokesman emphatically stated that this entire Salvadoran problem is directed and sponsored by Communist governments that want to transform the Caribbean into "a Marxist sea to control the oil routes."

"The extremists have devoted themselves to spreading an unreal picture of what is happening in our country," said the Salvadoran businessmen at a press conference held at the FENALCO [National Federation of Businessmen] headquarters.

The AP, which has just been promoting its principles in Washington and Caracas, where the group was received with visible warmth, is visiting Colombia. Besides speaking to the press, the AP established contact with the heads of Colombian industry and trade and visited the Ministry of Foreign Relations, where AP members revealed the reasons for starting their organization: trying to start a dialog with the present Salvadoran Government junta to contribute ideas aimed at achieving peace in El Salvador.

Right now AP members are pessimistic about the possibility that there will be elections, at least for 2 years. "It is impossible to go to the polls in a country where there is a minimum of 20 deaths daily," one AP member said.

Similarly they rejected the present government junta, whose policies they do not support but are obliged to share because this is the only way to prevent a radical government of the left.

The representatives visiting Colombia are: Juan Vicente Maldonado, executive director of the National Association for Private Enterprise;

Manuel Hinds, former minister of the economy in the first government junta; Carlos Hipolito Murillo, manager of the El Salvador Chamber of Commerce; Alejandro Villabona, vice president of the Union of Heads of Businesses; and Carlos Gonzalez, vice president of the National Federation of Small Business. Mr. Villabona survived a terrorist assassination attempt before starting his promotional tour for the AP.

Another of the subjects covered by the association was the ever-increasing scarcity of currency, which is being hoarded by the rich and the middle classes, which are not depositing their money in banks for fear of terrorism and strikes in a country where the words "hostage," "kidnaping" and "death" have become commonplace.

Analyzing El Salvador's underdevelopment, AP spokesmen attributed it to the country's small area and the terrifying growth of its population, victim of a stagnant economy in which the prices of its exports are fixed by world powers and make competion difficult, as well as to the absolute lack of mineral resources such as gas, oil and coal. These ailments, added to violence and terrorism, have brought deplorable results in this Central American country, which for more than 10 years has experienced the most absolute social and physical insecurity which has become even more marked in the last 2 years.

Regarding armed groups, the AP defined them as follows: "There are minority groups of terrorists who have to be distinguished from the guerrillas, because the first attack the civilian population, while the second fight government soldiers. The left consists of FAPU [United Popular Action Front], LP 28, BPR [Popular Revolutionary Bloc] and FDR [Democratic Revolutionary Front], which in addition to receiving money from communist countries are financed by industry, which pays the ransom for the kidnapings so much in vogue.

"The extreme right, smaller in size and power, is represented by 'The Death Squad' and by a commando group called Order that is invading the Salvadoran countryside and cities with terror."

AP members stated that they are ready to remain in their country and that they have not considered fleeing to invest their capital in other countries. "We will continue generating wealth to distribute it," said the industrialists and businessmen who comprise a new front for action in El Salvador.

ACOEES CONCERNED WITH SAFETY OF ITS MEMBERS

San Salvador EL MUNDO in Spanish 15 Jul 80 p 3

[Text] The Association of Foreign Correspondents in El Salvador (ACOEES) has sent us a copy of an open letter to the Government Junta in which it describes actions of which members of the international press have been victims and make the following demands:

1. Full guarantees for the safety of foreign journalists sent to El Salvador and for Salvadoran nationals working for the international news media.

2. Free access to any type of information of world interest and the right to withhold the identity of the source of information.

3. Free circulation of news material toward its destination without any kind of inspection or interference and the right to free mobilization of correspondents and journalists to cover sources of information.

4. The right to provide news with neither self-censorship nor outside censorship, as well as without bugging of telephone or teletype lines.

It also states the following: "In view of the political nature of the attacks on the national and foreign press in El Salvador, ACOEES holds the Government Junta of the Republic responsible for any attempt on their life that journalists may suffer, because the Junta is the highest representative of the constitutionally established state.

"We also wish to clarify that:

"1. Our presence in El Salvador is for professional reasons. We remain outside of any political debate. As professionals we have a right to journalistic judgments.

"2. We place on record the complete repudiation of the horrible assassination of two Salvadoran colleagues, and we ask the Salvadoran Government to step up its investigations to punish the guilty persons as a lesson.

"3. Moreover, we ask the government for an official report on the progress of the investigations as well as for an immediate clarification on the disappearance of journalist Rene Tamsen.

"4. We hope that the Salvadoran Government will instruct the immigration authorities to at no time restrict international journalists' entry and stay in El Salvador."

POLITICAL PARTY LEADERS DISCUSS PREELECTION ACTIVITIES

Guatemala City PRENSA LIBRE in Spanish 25, 26 Aug 80

[25 Aug 80, pp 8, 74, 75]

[Text] With the general elections for president and vice president, deputies and officials of leading municipal entities 18 months away, the Guatemalan political parties are starting to devise the strategies for their election campaigns that will lead them to victory.

The eight legally registered political parties which will be participating in the forthcoming electoral contest are (in alphabetical order): the Nationalist Authentic Central Party [CAN], Guatemalan Christian Democracy [DCG], Nationalist United Front [FUN], United Revolutionary Front [FUR], National Liberation Movement [MLN], Democratic Institutional Party [PID], Reformist National Party [PNR] and Revolutionary Party [PR].

These parties are already at the height of preelection activity, reorganizing their national, departmental and municipal leadership cadres, as well as preparing their government programs, which are regarded as important before considering the selection of possible presidential candidates.

According to responses from inquiries made among the leaders, the general idea is to prepare the government program first, and subsequently seek the person who would be capable of implementing it. To date, there has been no consensus as to whether that person will be a civilian or a member of the military.

There is consensus among the leaders of the eight registered political parties, three of which will be participating in elections for the first time, on the necessity of forming alliances and coalitions in order to win the elections; because it would be extremely difficult for a single party to win an absolute majority.

The leaders also share the notion of rejecting the extreme groups, because of their recalcitrance. Some are considering the organization of a great nationalist center alliance, in order to achieve unification of forces in the country, and to secure social peace, provided there is success in checking the violence which is hampering the country's development, and the making of the necessary social changes.

Following are the views of the Guatemalan political party leaders:

PID

Dr Jose Trinidad Ucles Ramirez, chairman of the PID's political council and first vice president of the Congress of the Republic, stated: "During this preelection period for 1982, the Democratic Institutional Party is only carrying out the phases which were previously arranged on 1 July 1979.

"These phases are: to plan the elections for mayors of 279 municipalities that were formed in 1980, selecting the individuals best equipped to win in each municipality, as well as providing the necessary organization on the municipal branch level to convert that victory into a reality."

He went on to say: "The aforementioned candidates for mayor were named. There was participation in the elections of 20 April 1980, with the assignment of posts and the taking of office therein, on 15 June of this year. That phase concluded with the second meeting of PID mayors, for the purpose of learning the individual concerns of each municipality in which the PID won, and giving them the necessary assistance for performing the job of the mayors."

He continued: "The mayor's prestige accrues to the benefit not only of the voters who elected him, but also that of our country's development and that of the PID, which brought him to the position in an honorable fashion."

He was asked: "Do you think that the violence in the country could upset the normal holding of elections in 1982?"

He replied: "There is not the slightest doubt that the violence could upset any type of election that is held, in one way or another, and in varying degrees. Hence the need for a peaceful atmosphere, affording a better election process.

"However, we are certain that the 1982 elections will take place with the integrity and honesty which marked the elections of 20 April of this year. At times, peoples of the world have to engage in such civic acts under unfavorable conditions, in order to comply with the terms of the constitution, but the elections must be held, and if they take place peacefully, they will serve their purpose to completion."

He was asked: "Has the PID considered the need for forming preelection alliances?"

"In fact it has. The third phase of our strategy consists of the formation of electoral alliances. In the particular instance of 1980, the goal is to make up a great center in which there is room for all the political institutions that believe in democracy and seek the path of the vote rather than that of bullets to fulfill the aspirations of an entire people.

"The PID was the party which made the most alliances in the last municipal elections and, among other factors, this was one of the bulwarks on which its indisputable victory on the municipal level was based.

"For the presidential elections of 1982, the PID thinks that a government program common to all the parties that will comprise this great center alliance should be devised. Once it has been devised, there should be a selection from among this combination of parties of the two individuals best suited to be candidates for the presidency and the vice-presidency, to carry out that program."

He stressed: "For that reason, the PID will embark upon these discussions with a clean slate, and without any candidate, like the other parties; so that the conclusions therefrom will be the result of their deliberations concerning ideas and individuals. The latter, with the election campaign, which will conclude in March 1982, constitutes the fourth phase for the PID."

He was asked: "Speaking of candidates, which proposition would the PID back, a civilian or a military?"

"The PID has no preference for any proposition, because it always sounds out the desires of the people, and interprets them; inasmuch as, since it is a party, it is only a vehicle for the people's aspirations, and as such it must subject itself to what the vast majorities in the country want.

"This may perhaps be the underlying reason for much of the PID's success in the last three presidential election contests: that of 1970, with Gen Carlos Manuel Arana; that of 1974, with Gen Kjell Laugerud Garcia; and that of 1978, with Gen Fernando Romeo Lucas. Hence, the PID expects to enjoy the confidence of the electorate in 1982."

He concluded by saying: "The PID is not a party serving personal interests, but rather a constitutional vehicle for interpreting a people from the standpoint of their thoughts and the individuals who should lead them."

MLN

Mr Rudy Fuentes Sandoval, deputy director of the MLN, commented: "Before planning the campaign strategy for the 1982 elections, the National Liberation Movement made an evaluation of the municipal elections held on 20 April of this year.

"The national board of directors, together with the departmental ones, has requested a complete report on the situations that they discovered in their respective electoral districts, which will help the board to ascertain how many voters abstained in each municipality. We already know, from our data, that only an average of 17 percent of the voters went to the polls.

"We know that many refrained from voting because they were not prompted to do so in municipal elections; and that others abstained because, in some municipalities, pressure was exerted in favor of certain political entities, which displeased many people.

"Furthermore, the violence that prevailed in the country was also a decisive factor deterring people from voting. Many did not want to antagonize the other candidates. There was a certain amount of fear.

"With this information, the MLN is reinforcing its pertinent organs, in an effort which will end in October, at the latest. We are demanding greater activity on the part of the national directors with respect to the various branches of the party.

"Other members of the MLN are also working actively. The women's branch is reorganizing its subsidiaries in the capital and the departments, and so are the labor branches, which are organizing what is termed the metropolitan branch in the capital. The university group has also been active, contacting representatives from all the universities existing in the country.

"The professional branch has planned to go to the interior of the country to found branches, as has the Liberation Party youth, called MOJULI [Liberation Youth Movement], which, among its activities, held a contest for queen of the outlying areas, who will be crowned the day before the 15 September celebration."

He was asked: "When do you intend to begin the campaign?"

"In January, but we are already reinforcing all the cadres. The violence in the country could have a partial effect on the progress of the campaign, but not a total one. It will affect the places where there are subversive groups, such as Quiche, Quezaltenango and San Marcos, but to a minimal extent."

He was asked: "Have they already chosen a candidate?"

"Mario Sandoval Alarcon, the general director of the MLN, is the candidate selected by the high command, because it is felt that his image is indisputable not only within the party, but also among anticommunist Guatemalans who want peace and democracy for Guatemalans.

"The MLN has a record of over 35 years of anticommunist struggle. The phenomenon of violence that Guatemala is experiencing has converted our candidate into one of the few options left to us Guatemalans. Sandoval Alarcon is well known, both nationally and internationally.

"No decision has been made yet regarding his running mate. We must make an analysis and inquiries to find out who will fit on the ticket, and that will be the candidate for the vice-presidency. There are in the MLN democratic and anticommunist elements of conviction, who could serve as a running mate."

He was asked: "What about political alliances?"

"Our party, because it is democratic, is receptive to dialog. What we are seeking is prosperity, peace and calm for Guatemala. If there is any political group with a doctrine that is the same as, or similar to ours, it will be well received; but it would be allied with our candidate, and the position of vice-president might possibly be negotiated."

He was asked: "Is there already a government plan?"

"Sandoval Alarcon appointed a committee to devise it, which has an appropriate period in which to submit it, after studying the state of the nation."

Mr Fuentes Sandoval concluded by saying: "We expect that, as usual, the honorable citizens who desire the good of the country will support us in the forthcoming campaign."

CAN

Luis Alfonso Lopez, secretary general of the CAN, declared: "After having assessed the recent municipal elections in which the Nationalist Authentic Central Party accrued definite success participating as a political party for the first time, we are evaluating the sociological, political and civic areas.

"We are currently reviewing all viewpoints, our plans and our procedures, as well as matters associated with improved organization throughout the entire republic, with a view toward the forthcoming general elections. We are also reviewing the important information that has been obtained, which has given us background with which to start up a new national plan in the entire republic.

"On the basis of that analysis, we are calling for the nation's peace to be upheld, and for the maintenance of a permanent reign of peace in the entire country, as a sentiment and demonstration of an effective state.

"We in the CAN have perceived that the desires of Guatemalans are inclined toward the attainment of this yearned-for peace. Therefore, we consider it a top priority to maintain the peace, by means of better civic education, marked by conviction and absolute dedication to Guatemala, putting our nationalist doctrine into practice.

"The CAN is not yet engaged in a preelection campaign, because the people are not in an emotional mood, seeking candidacies or thinking about elections; but rather are seeking their own security, equanimity and peace. Peace is the first thing that we must achieve. This campaign that we in the party are conducting to attain it has no political label. Where politics is concerned, actions take precedence over schedules."

He was asked: "In addition to this campaign for peace, are your branches being reorganized?

"Yes. We now have branches in all the departments. Starting next week, we shall be making departmental visits for the purpose of personal exchanges of views with all the provincial boards.

"The committees that make these tours will ascertain the status of the cadres. We shall give the boards of directors the CAN guidelines, and so that they may operate efficiently, we shall maintain a constant relationship with the members.

"We have reiterated to the leaders and members that we aspire to obtain the greatest good for Guatemalans, noting that matters must be resolved within the institutional framework. There must be a thorough awareness that this should be the aspiration of every good Guatemalan: namely, to maintain everything in an institutional manner."

He was asked: "Have you considered forming preelection alliances?"

"Not yet; we do not have a guide yet. We shall proceed with the branches to state what our position will be. We must make an assessment, and later decide whether to form alliances or coalitions. At the moment, we do not consider this feasible. What we are doing is training people, on the visits that we make to them, and lending them all the assistance that they need.

"What we are preparing in the party is the government plan, but we have not yet considered whether the future candidate will be a civilian or a member of the military, nor what his occupation or field will be. Discrimination is dangerous. We need a Guatemalan who will respond to the historical times in which we are living."

PNR

Edmond Mulet, recording secretary of the Reformist National Party (PNR), said: "We view the general situation in the country with optimism."

He added: "The future is promising for Guatemalans. There is a national awareness of the country's problems and of the causes which have produced them. Of course, it is not an easy task to overcome corruption, improvisation, violence and lack of vision; but there is a desire among many sectors to apply some solutions.

"The 1982 elections will give an opportunity to groups which have been excluded from the major decisions up until now to make a constructive transformation of our country. The political parties bear the greatest responsibility, because it is now that they must be most careful to avoid placing themselves in the service of political gangsterism which is attempting to control the destiny of Guatemala by various means."

He was asked: "What do you think about the violence that the country is suffering?"

"The violence has been a result of the inability and failure of the extremist groups to make themselves heard through civilized methods. The extreme left cannot win followers when there are dissidents in the Soviet Union, when there are invasions in Afghanistan and when over 100,000 Cubans have become voluntary exiles in only 2 months.

"On the other hand, the extreme right stopped convincing people from the time when there existed inequality of opportunity for advancement, and when, lacking the ideological and political preparation for preserving what it had, it rejected dialog, engaged in repression, destroyed and annihilated. This is a time for making an appeal for harmony. Only a general amnesty for all the conflicting groups can achieve it; because so long as there are some who want to be the conquerors of others, there will be no peace.

"Speaking of political alliances, I can say that, owing to the system of party plurality, alliances are required, but they will be made during the final months before the 1982 elections, when each party has examined closely the behavior of its potential allies or fellow candidates. Since our system is mainly presidentialist, the images of the candidates will have a great deal to do with the formation of the various coalitions."

He was asked: "Has the PNR any candidate in mind for 1982?

"Alejandor Maldonado Aguirre is the PNR's virtual candidate. His record, and his practical, humanist philosophy, as a leader who has proven to make firm decisions at difficult times, have been the focal point for the formation of our rank and file, which has been joined by other groups.

"This has been stated previously, and the PNR's position has not changed in this regard. Everything can be negotiated except the candidacy of Maldonado Aguirre, the program of national self-confidence and our conduct, based on dialog and the repudiation of violence.

"The municipal elections of 20 April of this year were a great experience, and gave us much gratification. On that basis, we are continuing to organize branches and associated groups, particularly among teachers. We go on tours, and give talks on the proposition for renovation, reform and development that we uphold. By January 1981, when we start the campaign, we shall have a complete organization throughout the entire country."

He was asked: "What about the unity pact made with the FUN?"

"It is a program-related alliance that we made with the Nationalist United Front. That pact is being joined by other political groups which are concerned about the current state of the country. Together, we shall make proposals to the citizenry and the government, suggesting solutions for our most pressing problems."

He concluded by saying: "At the appropriate time, we entities merged in what has been termed the Democratic Alliance will embark upon dialog regarding the 1982 presidential elections."

DC

Mr Alfonso Cabrera, the party's executive, stated: "We shall continue to work on the political organization of Guatemalan Christian Democracy all over the country, despite the fact that the branches have been closed as a result of security measures against the threats to and assassinations of our leaders."

He added: "Throughout the country we have maintained a certain work dynamics, although not on a normal basis, because of the aforementioned problems and the deaths of leaders, which forced us to adopt some safety measures."

He said: "With regard to the next general elections, we are preparing a program for government accomplishments which will be ready by the end of this year. We shall offer it for public discussion.

"A solution for the country's problems must be sought, not through a presidential candidacy, but rather through a concrete policy plan.

"The plan that we shall propose is very important. It calls for the participation of all sectors in the construction of the policy plan. Not only will the parties participate, but all the national sectors as well. This is the only way in which peace will be attained.

"For the normal progress of the preelection period, there must be peace in the country. Possibly next week, we shall propose methods for pacifying the nation, by means of two fundamental requirements.

"The first one is that the level of violence must be reduced, in order to create an atmosphere of security, whereby the citizens may dare participate in the elections. The second is that there be guarantees of the election results, just as there were in the recent elections for mayor. The important thing is that all sectors participate, so as to restore confidence to the citizens.

"Insofar as a precandidate for the presidency is concerned, DC does not have a candidate as yet. It is not a candidacy, but rather a policy plan that we need. We shall not consider anyone for the present time."

He concluded by saying: "As for political alliances for the elections, alliances must eventually be formed, but we are not yet considering any. This will occur at the proper time."

[Text] PR

Angel Hermogenes Martinez, the PR's secretary of organization, said: "The Revolutionary Party is reorganizing its departmental branches, because they have been completely neglected.

"We are going out to the departments for this purpose. Last weekend we went to Izabal, which we toured to hold discussions with the secretaries; and there, as in the other departments which we visited, we noted that our people have a great desire to cooperate with the PR."

He remarked: "In this reorganization preceding the election campaign that is approaching, we are placing emphasis on the youth organization. As an example, we initiated it in Puerto Barrios with 70 enthusiastic young people."

He was asked: "Is the party's internal crisis affecting the efforts?"

"What crisis? What happened was that four deputies who are members of the PR were dissatisfied because they did not win the presidency of the Congress; but there is no problem in the party.

"For the campaign to take place normally, it would be feasible to curb the violence, because that is having an effect. Peace is necessary for the security of individuals, so that we may live in calmness.

"The PR advocates a nationalist proposition that is equidistant from the two extremes, a left of center proposition; and we think that Guatemala should be for us, and that we should solve our own problems, and also that there should be greater social justice.

"As we told our people, we are confident that the state of violence will end. We think that we should remain aloof from the influence of the imperialism of both the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics and Cuba, because their doctrine is bad; it prevents the individual from becoming fulfilled as such."

He was asked: "With regard to the future president, which proposition does the PR support, the civilian or the military?"

"I think that, if he were a member of the military who was liked by the people and was capable of executing the government plan that we in the party are devising, we would back him, just as we would a civilian. The important thing is that there be someone capable of carrying out the reforms which will provide greater social justice and participation for the people."

He was asked: "What is your opinion on alliances with other parties?"

"If the time were ideal, and if there were groups or organizations backing the party's plan, it would be feasible to become allied with them. The more organizations there are supporting us, the greater chances there are for victory."

ARMY CHIEF OF STAFF COMMENTS ON CURRENT PROBLEMS

Chinchilla Discusses Violence, Salvador

San Pedro Sula LA PRENSA in Spanish 11 Jun 80 p 2

[Text] Army Chief of Staff Gen Mario Enrique Chinchilla stated yesterday that "there is no peace settlement behind the back of the Honduran people" in Honduras's conflict with El Salvador.

The ranking military officer turned aside the accusations by Camilo Gomez y Gomez, a former official at the Honduran Foreign Ministry, who charged that the current administration was negotiating a peace treaty damaging to Honduras's interests.

Chinchilla Carcamo said that the gains made in the peace negotiations "are in keeping with the terms of the Mediation Pact signed with the neighboring republic," adding that the scope of a possible agreement could not be disclosed for the time being because "there are confidential matters preventing this."

The chief of staff acknowledged that the mediation process moving forward with the aid of Peruvian jurist Jose Luis Bustamante Rivero "is being carried out at a slow but sure pace."

We Are Prepared

When questioned as to the army's opinion on the wave of violence that is jolting Central America and its repercussions on Honduras, Chinchilla Carcamo indicated that "living conditions in our country are not the same as those prevailing in our neighbors."

"Each country," he went on to say, "has its own internal problems stemming from the situation in which it finds itself, but that climate will not reach our country because we are on the lookout to combat them."

Political Future

The Honduran Army's second ranking officer feels that the results of the recent balloting "are satisfactory," adding that: "The most important thing is that the military has kept its promise to hold elections and guarantee the electoral process."

Chinchilla Carcamo denied that there are splits within the Armed Forces and indicated that the statements regarding the alleged politicization of the forces "are sheer speculation."

Nevertheless, when questioned as to the possibility that Gen Policarpo Paz Garcia might run for president of the provisional government, he said that "the National Constituent Assembly will decide on that."

The chief of staff feels that the calm prevailing in Honduras "is due to the Armed Forces" and he argued that "the Honduran people had the chance to vote for the candidate of their choice and for the party to which he belongs."

With regard to the internal problems that have arisen in the Liberal Party, he simply said that they are solely the internal affairs of each party. He did, however, describe such developments as "regrettable."

In conclusion, he stated that he had not received any communication regarding his retirement as a general and that none of his comrades-in-arms had been notified to that effect either.

'LA PRENSA' on Chinchilla's Remarks

San Pedro Sula LA PRENSA in Spanish 12 Jun 80 p 7

[Editorial: "The Challenge of Violence"]

[Text] Questioned by newsmen at the inauguration of a public works project in Tegucigalpa, Gen Mario Chinchilla, the Armed Forces chief of staff, asserted that the country's authorities are prepared to squelch any outbreak of anarchy that might arise in the country.

In point of fact, as quoted in LA PRENSA's article of 11 June 1980, the ranking officer indicated that "living conditions in our country are not the same as those prevailing in our neighbors," when asked for the army's opinion of the wave of violence jolting Central America and its repercussions on Honduras.

"Each country," he added, "has its own internal problems stemming from the situation in which it finds itself, but that climate will not reach our country because we are on the lookout to combat them."

Furthermore, the general described the results of the 20 April elections as "satisfactory," adding: "The most important thing is that the military has kept its promise to hold elections and guarantee the electoral process."

He also contended that the calm prevailing in Honduras "is due to the Armed Forces," asserting that "the people had the chance to vote for the candidate of their choice and for the party to which he belongs."

As in all statements, there are nuances that ought to be examined and observations that must be made, in order to highlight its authentic features and to weigh those that reflect a point of view rather than an exact and objective description of reality.

First of all, the elections were undeniably free and open, which greatly enhances the prestige of the Armed Forces and has raised to respectable levels Honduras's domestic and international image.

However, the assertion that violence will not reach us is an expression of a legitimate desire, not an absolute certainty.

This is because a germ of violence already exists. We have seen it in the recent crime wave and it is also reflected in the tragic living conditions that most of our people must tolerate.

We have gotten used to the idea that violence exists only where bombs, guns or crimes replace dialog and free elections.

Nevertheless, there is also violence, and quite a bit of it, in the towns that lack the most elementary of public services and where children die because there are no drugs to combat a gastrointestinal infection.

How many rural Honduran babies will die of malnutrition before their first birthday?

No one knows exactly, but we do know that many of them, perhaps thousands, will.

This is an undeclared form of violence, born of underdevelopment, poverty, injustice.

Therefore, when we read that General Chinchilla contends that "we are on the lookout to combat them," referring to the problems besetting Guatemala and El Salvador, we would like to believe that he is talking about the vigorous and consistent measures that are on tap to battle the major ills afflicting Honduran society.

Because although it is true that those who preach hatred, war, the class struggle and revolution have a great deal to do with the blaze scorching a major part of Central America at the moment, it is no less true that agitators have found an appropriate climate in the pathetic conditions of oppression, extreme poverty and disenfranchisement that our peoples are forced to live in.

This does not, of course, mean that we must attack social, political, cultural and economic problems to the exclusion of security matters.

This would be ignoring the real and indisputable fact that although the FRG is one of the most prosperous countries in the world and although its people live very well, terrorist groups such as the ill-famed Baader-Meinhof Gang and other similar gangs have sprung up nonetheless.

So, we also have to pay attention to the police and military front, but while avoiding the extremely serious mistake of believing that repression can replace the struggle for social progress.

Both areas, the sociopolitical and the military, must be attended to with equal zeal, with a simultaneous struggle against poverty and extremist infiltration.

Only in this way will we see to it that our people live in well-being, justice and safety and only in this way will we be able to assert that the declared violence that is decimating Central America will be kept far from our shores...

ZUNIGA AUGUSTINUS SCORES PINU-LIBERAL 'ALLIANCE'

[Text] Tegucigalpa--Ricardo Zuniga Augustinus told LA PRENSA yesterday that he had no doubt concerning the alliance formed by the Liberal Party and the PINU [Innovation and Unity Party] against the National Party.

The statement was made by the head of the Nationalist legislative group yesterday on the occasion of the selection of the attorney general and deputy attorney general of the republic, positions which were assigned to the attorneys Serapio Hernandez Castellanos and Rafael Rivera Torres, respectively, both of whom are members of the Liberal Party.

The "blue" leader added: "We have no doubt about that alliance, and of course it is working perfectly today. But we consider attorney Hernandez Castellanos to be a splendid professional, for whom we all voted, in recognition of his ability."

Liberals Are Not Gentlemen

Zuniga Augustinus deplored "the lack of gentlemanliness of the Liberals, in failing to abide by a pact concluded with the National Party to have the positions of deputy comptroller and attorney general of the republic filled by members of the National Party."

The Nationalist leader remarked that his party did not feel that it was discriminated against in the elections for the Constituent Assembly, but noted that, "in the last sessions the Liberal Party did not keep its promise. It will be the people who will be called upon to judge such actions."

We Shall Not Withdraw

The head of the Nationalist legislative group said that, henceforth, his party would uphold everything of benefit to the people, adding that, during the period that is approaching (for preparing the constitution), there can be no majority of one sector over another.

He also commented: "During that critical period, we must all remove the party from our minds, and think only of the interests of Honduras."

He said that the National Party would not withdraw from the National Constituent Assembly, "because we are under obligation to carry out the assignment that was given to us."

PINU ISSUES MANIFESTO DESCRIBING PARTY STANCE

Tegucigalpa EL CRONISTA in Spanish 16 Aug 80 pp 1, 7

[Text] The Innovation and Unity Party (PINU), through its leadership entities and constituent representatives, attempting, as has been its constant standard of behavior, to interpret the desires of the vast majorities and to safeguard the interests of the Honduran nation, publicly states the reasons which have prompted its conduct as an institution of public law during the period of time from the elections of 20 April of last year to the present.

Innovation and Unity hailed the mass-scale vote on 20 April as a victory for the Honduran people's pacifist and democratic civic intentions. At the same time, we hailed the victory of the Honduran people in bringing success for the PINU principle that the constitutional government of the republic should be elected by a direct, secret and popular voting. Innovation and Unity was the only national political organization which clearly expressed this desire both before and after the election date.

Also, on a date preceding the elections, we voiced our intention of striving to have the provisional government that was to be organized made up of a broad representation of the parties, and with a program of minimal objectives which was drawn up and executed collectively.

This program would be required to seek the stability and peace of the nation from the threefold political, socioeconomic and cultural standpoint.

In response to the invitation tendered by the then chief of the Military Junta of Government and the Armed Forces, Gen Policarpo Paz Garcia, Innovation and Unity took part in talks, initially with a delegation from the Armed Forces, and subsequently with the inclusion of representatives from the Liberal and National Parties.

The purpose of these talks was the establishment of the provisional government, the main goal of which would be to organize, guarantee and hold new elections, so as to provide Honduras with a strong constitutional government enjoying broad popular support. In these talks, the PINU reiterated its planks set forth before the elections, emphasizing the need for a program with minimal objectives for the provisional government, as well as the feasibility of keeping the Armed Forces free from administrative tasks and political activity, insofar as possible.

Innovation and Unity also stated that this position was a result of its desire for Honduras to benefit from a strong, professional and prestigious Army, which would serve as a guarantee of the representative, republican, democratic system. In addition, it cited the necessity for resolute support from the Armed Forces for the provisional government. Insofar as the formation of the provisional cabinet was concerned, the PINU voiced its determination not to seek administrative posts for its members, suggesting that, for this purpose, the results of the last elections should be taken into consideration, as well as the qualities of integrity and ability possessed by those appointed.

Our concern over the government program as a priority was not shared by the representatives of the other two parties, who stressed proportionate formation of the cabinet over other considerations.

The PINU then decided to withdraw its representatives from the talks in question. Since that date in July of this year, the PINU has not taken part in talks regarding the provisional cabinet, for the reasons given. The PINU's lack of interest in participating in the formation of the cabinet stems from its desire to interpret the wishes of its rank and file to have a consistent political instrument that is completely independent and a faithful guardian of the national interests. However, we want to put on record the fact that this absence from the executive body does not represent a systematic opposition to it, but rather a consistent, sincere and patriotic critical position. We also believe that a proportionate distribution of the public administration between the Liberal and National Parties entails the assumption of full responsibility for it.

As for its constituent representation, consisting of authentic representatives of the entire nation, it has been, is now and will continue trying to give an example of what popular representation should be, with no commitment other than the one based primarily on the defense of the interests of the majority of the population and nation of Honduras. This commitment is total, resolute and exclusive, and hence not subject to changes of any kind. In accordance with what has been said, the PINU will discuss with the social organizations both its draft constitution, an endeavor in which it has been engaged, and the potential bills to be submitted subsequently.

The PINU thanks the 35,000 members of our organization, who have the satisfaction of having been consistent before and after the election, for this confidence. To the rest of the citizens, whose hopes have perhaps been thwarted, it offers on this occasion its constituent representation to convey to the top-ranking state entity the voice of the Honduran people, whom we have served since we came into existence.

Innovation and Unity also wishes to go on record as staunchly determined to strive to give the Honduran people, as quickly as possible, a constitutional government elected by direct, secret vote, which will make the changes that will lead us, in peace and liberty, to the fulfillment of our national destiny, avoiding the violence which has beset our neighbors.

This can only be accomplished by giving up petty interests and practicing a new political morality, as Innovation and Unity has wanted, and still wants to practice.

This new political morality is not completely unprecedented, if we look back at leading personages in our history, such as Cabanas and Morazon.

This new political reality is not one that Innovation and Unity is seeking to possess exclusively, but rather one that it wishes to seek together with other Hondurans, in other parties and other organizations.

This concept forces us to view with concern the gap which some are attempting to create between the provisional executive body and the National Constituent Assembly, and the conflict which some wish to establish between civilians and the military.

Such conflicts benefit only the enemies of democracy, at both extremes, who should have been totally defeated on 20 April. We must eliminate this antagonism, which has been artificially created through struggle. Such confrontation will not result in any winners, but rather just one loser: democracy.

On previous occasions in its history, Honduras has managed to propose solutions, change structures and recover lost dialog. It did so with Marco Aurelio Soto and Ramon Rosa during the last century. It did so in this century, with the first presidency of Carlas Andino, and with the second republic of Villeda Morales.

And it can do so now, with a short provisional government which is honest and not repressive, but strong. The great task of building a new Honduras for our children, which at the same time will be a model of democratic change for Central America, cannot tolerate any conflict or antagonism other than that between backwardness and progress, and between integrity and corruption. The corruption, which unquestionably exists, is annoying to the masses, detrimental to our image abroad and suicide for the system. As a test of the practice of these principles of austerity and honesty in public administration, the PINU has already established standards in the National Constituent Assembly, through its representatives in that august chamber, calling for not only economic backing, but also political and moral backing for the Office of the Attorney General of the Republic, so that it may efficiently discharge the duties of the public ministry.

Both social change and the battle against corruption, the only sure deterrents to violence, are in urgent need of this new political morality which Innovation and Unity desires.

For the sake of this new political morality, the PINU is not participating in the provisional government. For the sake of this political morality, the PINU does not want the Army to be used as a tool, in the person of its head.

Acting on behalf of this ethical concept, the PINU has voted in the Constituent Assembly with the sole intention of representing, not only its members, but also the other thousands of Hondurans who went to the polls on 20 April surpassing their leaders in civic conscience, good sense and a spirit of constructive change.

Honduras is represented in that assembly, which certain sectors have attempted to discredit: our vices and virtues, our backwardness and our desire for progress, our glory and our misery.

Therefore, the people should follow closely what happens in it, and the press should provide full reports on what is being discussed, in an objective and aboveboard fashion. There, just as in the Army, the political parties, the trade unions or the farmers' organizations, the people will have an opportunity to follow the biblical instruction to know individuals by their works, just as one knows a tree by its fruits.

If we Hondurans believe this, let us act in this way, with an intention for change, with respect for our history and convinced that authority is only a way of serving. Nothing will destroy the peace; nothing will deter the progress. And, after a necessarily brief provisional government, with sound, concrete purposes, in 1981 we shall return to the polls to accomplish what is so urgently needed: the change for peace and liberty.

The path is open; we must not lose sight of it.

Tegucigalpa, D.C., 18 August 1980.

SELECTED EVENTS IN 'TUNA WAR' DESCRIBED

Firm But Calm Attitude

Mexico City EL SOL DE MEXICO in Spanish 17 Jul 80 pp 1-A, 13-A

[Article by special correspondent Isabel Arvide]

[Text] Tlacolula, Oaxaca, 16 Jul (OEM)--"We will act firmly but calmly," President Lopez-Portillo said here in analyzing tuna and squid fishing problems, pointing out that "we will assert our rights," even by going before the United Nations.

Nevertheless, the chief executive, speaking with the same calm that he has asked of Mexican officials in dealing with the problem, asserted that he did not think that we would have to bring the matter before international organizations, because "I hope that reason prevails."

The chief executive was interviewed during his working tour of the state of Oaxaca. In answer to a question about Mexico's stand on the Cuban boats that are also invading our patrimonial waters, he stated specifically: "Where the same grounds exist, there should be the same response."

The Mexican president stressed: "I have given instructions both to Foreign Relations, Fishing and Navy authorities to act calmly, to deal with things firmly but calmly," inasmuch as these were incidents in a lengthy struggle to resolve the problem of developing resources.

He then stated: "What we want is to grow, and this is a basic foodstuff for the people of Mexico; this is a food resource that we have borne in mind for the Mexican diet. We decided to expand our fleet, and we have done so and will continue to do so."

The president was specific in his analysis of the problem when he noted that we must not forget that this is an incident that is part of an adjustment process which began with the tropical tuna agreement, which set catch quotas in accordance with catch capacity.

"This was a totally unfair system, because the United States had the largest fleet, and we had a small one. This doomed us to zero growth. Therefore, together with other Central American countries, including Costa Rica, we withdrew from the agreement," the president said.

"What basically matters to us, of course, is respect for the principles of law by which we abide, but the fish should not be depleted either," our chief executive said, asserting that Mexico has made efforts, "and we will continue to do so," to have this agreement replaced with another. All of these efforts at a compromise, at resolving the conflict in a reasonable manner should have one basic goal: to see to it that the species are not depleted.

Interviewed after he inaugurated 1.4 billion peso projects in Oaxaca, he explained in addition that at the moment, without the agreements, Mexico is in the worst of situations: "They are invading our jurisdiction as they see fit, and we enforce our rights. What is happening here is that if we concentrate a major, disorderly fishing capacity in this area, we are going to kill the goose, or the tuna, that laid the golden egg. We are going to finish off the species. The reasonable thing is for us to regulate the catch, and that is what we are doing."

Furthermore, expanding on his statements, the chief executive stated that in reality the legal problem is that this species is one of the so-called migratory species, and the argument justifiably is that it does not belong to just the coastal nation.

"For this reason," he stated, "we have to establish an agreement, but in the absence of an agreement, we have to defend our jurisdiction, because otherwise, since they do not accept the conditions that we are setting, there is no agreement, and thus we are in a legal vacuum, which is not at all advisable in this day and age."

The president pointed out in conclusion that of course "we are defending our rights very firmly, because we do have these rights. And in the event that other principles are violated, we will assert our rights through the procedural systems that international law itself provides for."

Separately, during his more than 7-hour tour through the state the chief executive inaugurated the Mitla-Zacatepec Highway, a Mexican Social Security Institute-COPLAMAR hospital in the middle of the Oaxaca Sierra Madre Range, the graphite plant located near the town of San Francisco Telixtlahuaca, a housing complex in the capital of Oaxaca and (symbolically) several other projects in the state. He also presided over a working meeting at which CORETT and National Institute for the Development of the Rural Community and Low-Cost Housing deeds were handed over.

U.S. Envoy's Statement

Mexico City EL SOL DE MEXICO in Spanish 17 Jul 80 pp 1-A, 10-A

[Article by Roberto Aguilar]

[Text] "Neither oil, nor trade nor the illegal aliens should be tied in" with the tuna problem, the U.S. ambassador to Mexico, Dr Julian Nava, said yesterday. He also maintained that "warlike language" should not be used either, because the two nations are interested in a solution, not in creating new problems.

He pointed out that an immediate solution to the problem could be a bilateral agreement between Mexico and the United States, inasmuch as an international solution is a very long-term matter, and the U.S. embargo of Mexican tuna purchases could not be prolonged indefinitely because it would entail very serious consequences for both countries.

The long-term solution, he said, would be for Mexico to rejoin CIAT [Inter-American Tropical Tuna Commission] or a new organization that would regulate everything to do with migratory species such as tuna and in which all interested nations would participate.

He pointed out that the tuna problem is just a small part of very broad and fruitful relations in many fields, and "it would be odd for intelligent people to deal with the situation by involving unrelated matters. He categorically denied that the U.S. embargo is a "reprisal" against Mexico.

The ambassador took up the so-called "tuna war" problem at a press conference yesterday that lasted exactly 45 minutes.

He noted that the situation "cannot be described either as a war or as a conflict" between the governments of the United States and Mexico.

"The United States does not doubt that Mexico acted within its rights, since its government has the responsibility and the right to enforce its laws and the president's decrees. Mexico acted totally within its rights."

He added, however: "The United States was forced to apply the laws of its own Congress, which call for an embargo of the product in question." He then added, with a smile: "Now we are at a stalemate," and the negotiations will have to be continued to reach a settlement.

He admitted that the current differences could cause greater friction in relations between the two countries, but he said that negotiation is the only solution, inasmuch as Mexico is increasingly interested in looking to the sea for new food resources.

Discussing the United States' position toward our country, Ambassador Nava asserted that Washington should give more consideration to Mexico, "with respect, friendship and equal treatment for the benefit of both countries' interests."

He said that he was certain that there would be a solution as long as warlike language is not used to deal with a problem that he described as "differences of opinion on technical matters."

"Today it is no longer a question of ideology or sovereignty; it is simply a technical question," he repeated.

He explained that the United States recognizes Mexico's right to its 200-mile exclusive economic zone and that the only difference is with regard to tuna, because it is regarded as a migratory species, and the U.S. stand is radically different from Mexico's.

"The tuna is a wandering species; it has no home country, and it can just as well be within the 200 miles as in the middle of the Pacific," the ambassador said.

"The problem is to determine whether these rights also extend to migratory species," he stressed.

With regard to the ships that have been seized, he noted that they would have to pay the fines that Mexico has set. He commented, however, that there is some confusion at the moment "because three boats did have the required authorization."

He emphasized once again: "It is not a question of a conflict between governments. The U.S administration was, however, forced to defend the rights of citizens because that is what its laws stipulate."

With regard to the ban on squid fishing imposed on Mexican vessels, he explained that before the "tuna affair" his country had issued a warning with regard to the fishing quotas so that this species would not be depleted, and this was the reason for the American decision.

He then emphasized: "The United States cannot dictate anything to Mexico in any field, but the United States has its domestic laws too."

He then concluded: "Instead of seeing this situation as a conflict, we should see it in its dynamic context, the positive side of it, and not tie in anything unrelated to the tuna problem."

Ambassador Criticized

Mexico City EXCELSIOR in Spanish 22 Jul 80 pp 4-A, 23-A

[Article by Mauro Jimenez Lazcano]

[Text] Unfortunately, the color of Mr Julian Nava's skin does not make him a Mexican or a Chicano or even a backer of our people's interests. His stand at last Wednesday's press conference was openly and crudely representative of his true interests.

Those who naively thought that the ambassador's dark skin might make him somewhat different from Robert C. Hill, Fulton Freeman, Joseph John Jova, Patrick Lucey or Poinsset from last century, can see today that they were wrong.

Mr Nava is just an ambassador, not a mediator. Interests are interests, and in the old Dulles style, the United States has no friends. The embargo on Mexican tuna will be open ended, and the United States will apply drastic measures in the future as a reprisal for Mexico's actions in defense of its patrimonial waters.

We have to contradict Ambassador Nava. This is not a "technical matter," as he says; it is a basic conflict between two countries. What the United States is really questioning is Mexico's sovereignty over its 200-mile patrimonial sea.

The United States was always against recognizing Mexico's and other countries' patrimonial waters. Several years ago, when our country unilaterally declared its sovereignty over the 200-mile patrimonial sea, it safeguarded for present and future generations an enormous nutritional and mineral storehouse, while declaring the beautiful and bountiful Gulf of California an interior sea.

Mexico's stand was in keeping with a full-fledged worldwide movement among a majority of UN members, and thus in 1977 the U.S. Government itself also declared sovereignty over its 200-mile patrimonial waters.

Our patrimonial waters certainly contain tuna, shrimp, whales and hundreds of other enormously valuable living species, but they also contain oil. The legal struggle starting today with the Mexican Navy's seizure of U.S. pirate vessels and the U.S. embargo on Mexican tuna exports, as well as the expulsion of fishing boats with permits for American territorial waters, could be just the beginning of a lengthy dispute over the resources off Mexico's coasts.

An Overall Problem

Therefore, when Mr Nava says that tuna and oil should not be tied together because they are distinct issues, he is in error. Both questions in many senses are part of the same problem. For example, U.S. reprisals will be taken in many areas: trade, finance, international credit, the braceros.

Mexican-U.S. relations are a whole, which is affected when there is a change in any of its parts. President Lopez-Portillo understood this when on the eve of his latest trip to Washington he indicated that the talks would be conducted "as a package." Of course they were going to talk about oil exports, but they were also going to discuss braceros, vegetables and technology, the Mexican president said on that occasion.

That is why national public opinion was surprised by the PEMEX [Mexican Petroleum] director's statement that the tuna embargo would not affect oil sales. Public reaction led PEMEX to rectify this stand a few days later. It could not be otherwise, because PEMEX cannot and could not control Mexican foreign policy.

The proper approach is unquestionably the one President Lopez-Portillo has pointed out: "...within the framework of international law, we will carry things to their ultimate consequences..." The chief executive then mentioned the possibility of eventually bringing the conflict before the UN. Meanwhile, the president also said, "we will act calmly."

But neither could we renounce self-defense with any means at our disposal, even oil, especially since now in the United States there is unfortunately not a president but a candidate who seeks to win the "hawk" vote by taking a tough line with Mexico, a country that has shown Mr Carter friendship and cooperation and has sent him oil and gas for the winter.

'Tuna War' Settled Amicably

Mexico City EL SOL DE MEXICO in Spanish 2 Aug 80 pp 1-A, 7-A

[Article by Arturo de Aquino]

[Text] Mexico is authorizing U.S. vessels to fish for tuna and scale varieties inside the country's 200-mile patrimonial waters.

The clearance issued by the Department of Fishing authorities is different from the one made public at the beginning of this week, which permitted 76 American vessels to catch tuna within our 12-mile territorial waters.

In revealing this to EL SOL DE MEXICO, Department of Fishing officials disclosed that for the moment permits to fish inside the 200-mile patrimonial waters were given to two Korean boats and one American vessel.

Nevertheless, they added, additional requests from American boats are under study, and there is a very good chance that they will be approved. Therefore, it was regarded as certain that over the next few weeks there would be more and more foreign vessels fishing in our patrimonial waters.

Fishing Department officials reported that the authorizations issued at the beginning of this week to 76 American boats to operate off the western coast of Baja California Peninsula come under bilateral agreements signed with the authorities of our neighbor to the north.

These permits are exclusively for operations within the 12-mile territorial sea, and any vessel overstepping the limit will be sanctioned.

In signing these agreements, Mexico recognized the "seniority rights" of U.S. fishermen, who have been fishing in the area for several years and who were affected when Mexico established its jurisdiction over 200 miles of patrimonial sea.

With regard to the other authorization made public yesterday, this paper was told that it was in keeping with international laws under which countries not in a position to fully develop their fishing resources should issue permits so that other nations can utilize the surpluses.

In this case, the feeling is that it will not be until late 1982 that Mexico has a large enough tuna fleet to exploit this species, and only then will we proceed to displace the foreign vessels.

SOVIETS OFFER TO DEVELOP COUNTRY AS 'BREADBASKET'

Mexico City EL SOL DE MEXICO in Spanish 14 Aug 80 pp 1-A, 10-A

[Article by Miguel Angel de Alba]

[Text] The Soviet Union has lent Mexico its expertise in the production of grains, since both governments intend to turn this country into the Soviet Union's main supplier of these products.

The Soviet ambassador to Mexico, Rostislav Aleksandrovich Sergeyev, asserted this at an impromptu press conference at the University Club.

He pointed out that the Soviet Union has had problems producing all of the grains that it requires and therefore has had to turn to the United States as its breadbasket, by buying close to 1,000 tons of grain for cattle feed.

Nevertheless, he commented, the White House decided to cut grain sales because of the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan, which forced the Kremlin to turn to other markets.

In reply to a question, he said that he did not feel that this move was designed to pressure Moscow into ratifying SALT II, inasmuch as Carter and Brezhnev agreed at a meeting a few months ago to do so shortly.

But the United States was not ready to ratify the treaty, and this is why the signing has been delayed.

Referring again to Mexico, he said that economic, cultural and political relations are developing nicely between the two countries, although trade relations are not as good as they could be. In this regard, we hope to boost trade by taking advantage of our economic possibilities.

Among others, he mentioned that we are looking at the possibility of joint investments in the manufacture of machinery. For the time being, we have an agreement with Siderurgica Nacional to manufacture about 1,000 tractors using parts imported from the Soviet Union. This figure can be increased if Mexico so wishes.

These tractors will be used to mechanize Mexican farming, which is experimenting with new technologies, some of them brought over by Soviet scientists. These technologies will increase our harvests, of grains in particular, considerably.

He explained that his country has wideranging experience in this field, since its annual output totals 200 million tons. It has currently had to import about 1,000 tons for cattle feed.

We realistically anticipate, he said, that Mexico could be able to export those grains to us, thus eliminating our dependence on the White House.

With regard to the U.S. election, Aleksandrovich Sergeyev asserted that "we want stable relations with that country, independently of any presidential candidate. I cannot voice an opinion on the one or the other because that would be meddling in that nation's internal affairs."

He was then asked about the Olympic Games and the disqualification of several Mexican athletes. His reply was that "we have to look at things objectively. This was an international event at which the judges were not locals. They were international judges who certified 110 new records (74 Olympic records and 36 world records). There was nothing against Mexican athletes, inasmuch as none of them was disqualified by Soviet judges."

In conclusion, he stated that his country agrees with President Lopez Portillo's stand that no hegemony should come before the sovereignty of nations, whether they are socialist or capitalist.

CASH IN CIRCULATION INCREASES, 'DOLLARIZATION' DOWN

Mexico City EL SOL DE MEXICO 16 Aug 80 pp 1-A, 15-A

[Article by Fermin Vazquez Legaria]

[Text] Cash in circulation recorded an average increase of 32.7 percent in July. According to the latest statistical report of the Bank of Mexico, the circulating medium increased by 1.2 billion pesos up to last July, a rise of 4.1 percent, whereas over the same period last year the increase was 13.9 billion, a rate of 5.4 percent.

The Bank of Mexico underscored the slackening in the trend towards "dollarization" and asserted that bank deposits rose in 1 year by 235.2 billion pesos, which enabled private and state-private banks to boost lending to 134.5 billion pesos, a significant increase over last year. In July alone, the report states, the rise was 11.2 billion pesos. Moreover, these loans translate into a strong investment boost for the production activities of the industrial and agricultural sectors in particular.

The Central Bank added that thus the rate of increase in circulating medium last July, 32.7 percent, was similar to the rise in July 1979.

The bank stressed that additional deposits in domestic currency continued their upward trend so far this year, "which has brought about a decline in the dollarization" of bank deposits from the same period last year.

Furthermore, the funds from instruments denominated in foreign currencies, especially dollars, rose by only 900 million pesos in July, as compared to 7.1 billion in July 1979.

Thus, the share of domestic currency funds in total additional bank deposits was 88.5 percent from 31 December 1979 to 31 July 1980, as compared to 78 percent over the same period last year.

Total lending by private and state-private banks to nonbanking sectors amounted to 11.2 billion pesos in July alone, a 14.1 percent rise in national currency loans and a 2.9 percent drop in foreign currency loans.

COLUMNIST DISCUSSES FUTURE OF PESO

Mexico City EL DIA in Spanish 7 Aug 80 p 4

[Article by Martin Luis Guzman Ferrer]

[Text] A recent television program was turned into a vehicle for explaining why the peso was stable and, at the same time, for justifying the so-called "minidevaluations." The program, of course, was an interview with the director of the Bank of Mexico, Gustavo Romero Kolbeck.

His arguments were sound in justifying why it is wholly unlikely that there will a devaluation or a "sudden adjustment" in the exchange rate. This assessment is based on the bank's economic forecasts, and all indications are that the economic situation is reasonably good. If the economy is doing fine, except for inflation, the value of the peso is quite secure.

In the first place, the national product grew by eight percent in 1979 and it will likely increase at the same pace this year. Secondly, our balance of payments is tending towards the black on its trade account, perhaps for the first time in the country's history. In other words, the country is tending to sell more overseas, to export, than to purchase more overseas, to import. Also, Romero Kolbeck said, revenue from overseas oil sales are expected to reach $12 billion this year alone. We can see from these three reasons why the value of the peso is quite secure.

Furthermore, fourthly, the domestic demand for dollars, the so-called "dollarization," has been dropping sharply in the last few months. Whereas in April the rate was high (the Bank of Mexico estimates that it hit between 30 and 40 percent of bank deposits), it was negative in July. In other words, total bank deposits could be calculated only in pesos, because dollars were being converted into pesos. We can thus conclude that the monetary policy of high interest rates for peso deposits and low interest rates for dollar deposits has been highly beneficial to the nation. This upshot, incidentally, shatters the myth that we have to keep dollar interest rates higher here than abroad. The mechanism for boosting bank deposits in pesos has been simple and effective. One-year interest rates in pesos, for example, are around 20 percent, whereas in London or New York, for instance, only 9 to 11 percent interest is paid. It will thus be very costly for a person to speculate against the peso and against the country. Our monetary policy has not [illegible] halted the dollarization trend but it has also brought annual [illegible] deposits up to the very respectable figure (in both relative and absolute terms) of 900 billion pesos in round numbers.

Lastly, the director of the Bank of Mexico explained quite rightly that it is very hard for speculators, for those who want to sell their country down the river, to beat down the value of the peso. Speculation can be easily halted, in contrast to what happened in 1976, inasmuch as petroleum revenue is around $12 billion, the country's international reserves have been rising appreciably, and not only do we not owe anything to the International Monetary Fund, but there is almost $55 million in Mexico's favor there. Specifically, the National Banking Convention disclosed that primary reserves (foreign exchange and precious metals) total close to $3.55 billion and that secondary reserves (agreements with foreign countries or with the IMF to support the peso) amount to some $2.66 billion. In other words, the country has more than $6 billion dollars in its favor, and therefore the value of the peso is solid.

All this having been said, and it is obviously true, we still have to explain the importance of the peso minidevaluations in recent months. In point of fact, over the last 6 months the peso has lost 0.08 percent of its value, "just a few centavos," in Romero Kolbeck's words. The exchange rate was 22.87 to the dollar in late 1979, whereas it now stands at 23.09, more or less.

According to the Bank of Mexico, the explanation for this development is basically twofold. On the one hand, it is due to "seasonal fluctuations" in the demand for foreign currency, and on the other, it is part of a monetary policy that has broken with the fixed exchange rate, in other words, the taboo against devaluing the currency. As far as the first explanation is concerned, in the short run and as long as activity is light, when the demand for dollars increases, its price rises slightly, in accordance "with the behavior of the market." As far as the second is concerned, the country has, as we know, adopted a fluctuating or floating exchange rate. In other words, the exchange rate, the value of the peso, must not be inelastic or fixed; it must be commensurate to its real or purchasing power. A person might or might not be in agreement with this mechanism, which is now used throughout the world in capitalist countries, but it is a reality in the international system. Nevertheless, a devaluation of the peso is unlikely under the aforementioned circumstances, not only on account of what we have pointed out, but also because, as Romero Kolbeck says, if there were serious speculation above and beyond what is seasonal, the Bank of Mexico could intervene with the sizable resources that it has available to maintain the peso's value.

The enduring concern for the peso is inflation. The director of the Bank of Mexico conceded that as of July it was already 15.2 percent. He went on to say that in accordance with general economic policy, the important thing for the country, the priority, was to grow. In other words, we have to provide full employment to around 10 million people, to defend their incomes (with union rights and opportunities) and then ward off inflation. Romero Kolbeck is, in fact, quite right about all this, although he did not take the opportunity to explain what anti-inflation policy the bank is pursuing, because it surely must have one.

One of the few questions that was not served up to him on a silver platter (a poor technique because in order to be convincing, honesty is the best policy) criticized the fact that banks are allowed to pay a piddling 4.5 percent interest on savings accounts. Romero Kolbeck's explanation for this (which had to do with efficient banking practices, not ethics) was far from convincing. He said that of the 29 million persons who have bank accounts, 19 million "prefer" savings accounts. No one, he emphasized, is forcing these people to save their money this way, to malinvest it, one would say. In other words, if people are ignorant and lose money, we have to allow these low-income earners, who are the ones who save this way, to keep making their mistake, because this is not the Bank of Mexico's "responsibility." If inflation is hovering around 25 percent a year, and only 4.5 percent interest is paid on these savings, well that's too bad for those fools. One cannot agree with this "logic." He should have rather said that many of these people are forced to invest their scant, hard-earned savings this way because they cannot come up with the 10,000 peso minimum to open a securities time deposit account. We should also recall that the argument of private banks for not paying higher interest rates on savings accounts is that it costs them a great deal to "manage them." The director of the Bank of Mexico also said that these accounts offered the "appeal" of being almost "at sight"; in other words, the money is readily available. This is not at all convincing because there are virtually liquid securities accounts from which withdrawals can be made up to twice a week. If the Bank of Mexico reduced the 10,000 peso limit and educated low-income earners as to the proper use of securities time deposit accounts, no one would invest their money at 4.5 percent interest. Of course the best thing would be to eliminate those savings accounts and to stop playing along with the banks.

INFLATION HITS 32.6 PERCENT PACE

Mexico City EL SOL DE MEXICO in Spanish 16 Aug 80 pp 1-A, 13-A

[Article by Miguel Angel de Alba]

[Text] If the rise in prices continues at its present pace, inflation will hit 32.6 percent by year end, according to the statistics furnished by the Bank of Mexico, Alfonso Reyes Medrano, the economic adviser of the Confederation of Mexican Workers (CTM), asserted yesterday.

He explained that last month alone the consumer price index rose by 3 percent, bringing the index to 4.1 percent.

Reyes Medrano stressed that the disproportionate rise in prices is due mainly to speculation and to the impact of price increases for generic items which, like sugar, are used as raw materials in addition to being earmarked for mass consumption.

Reyes Medrano pointed out that the above indices are not expected to decline, basing his assertion on the fact that price increases are traditionally the steepest during the final months of the year.

General, professional and rural minimum wages will be more difficult to set the next time because of this high inflation rate.

He said that the CTM would insist that the minimum wages be set after taking into account the regional studies by the unions, which accurately portray the socioeconomic situation of the populace.

He commented in conclusion that the CTM would again fight to have the economic zones for wage purposes reduced further.

HEAVY INVESTMENT IN STEEL PLANNED FOR DECADE

Mexico City EL SOL DE MEXICO in Spanish 19 Aug 80 pp 1-A, 10-A

[Article by Silvestre Gonzalez Arenas]

[Text] The second stage of the Lazaro Cardenas-Las Truchas Iron and Steel Complex is now under construction; it will boost production capacity to 3 million tons a year.

According to data from stock market analysts, Mexico's "three major" steel mills are planning sizable investments for this year. SIDERMEX [Mexican Iron and Steel Enterprise] (Steel Mills of Mexico, Inc.), Fundidora de Monterrey, and the Lazaro Cardenas-Las Truchas Iron and Steel) will invest almost 70 billion pesos, 64 billion in its Michoacan plant and some 23 billion in Steel Mills of Mexico [sic].

Mexico's iron and steel companies, both government-controlled and private, intend to boost steel output by 11.5 percent a year and reach an annual production of 19.7 million tons this decade.

"In order to achieve this objective, the industry will spend 551.833 billion pesos over the next 10 years, and everything indicates that these billions will be invested," noted the group of analysts from the Allen W. Lloyd and Associates stock market concern in their monthly economic report.

Mexico's three main iron and steel plants (the government-controlled consortium SIDERMEX, HYSLA and (TAMSA) will invest around 89.436 billion pesos this year.

The objectives of the Mexican steelworks are contained in the National Iron and Steel Development Plan, which calls for an increase in output from 7.5 million tons in 1980 to 19.7 million tons in 1990, with an operating capacity of 21 million tons.

HYSLA, which belongs to the steel division of the Alfa Industrial Group, is investing about 17 billion pesos.

Pre-Reducidos de Mexico (PREMEXA) is investing another 2.45 billion pesos, and the Mexican-Swiss joint investment enterprise Acerlan is investing about 320 million pesos.

The HYSLA program, which is the largest ever undertaken by a private firm, is designed to boost its production of hot-rolled and cold-rolled steel and galvanized steel; it will also produce specialty steels.

RIO ESCONDIDO COAL RESERVES BEING DEVELOPED

Mexico City EL SOL DE MEXICO in Spanish 15 Aug 80 pp 1-B, 2-B

[Article by special correspondent Roberto Noriega]

[Text] Piedras Negras, Coahuila, 14 Aug (OEM--Via Telex)--The Rio Escondido deposits will supply the country with 4½ million tons a year of noncoking coal, 70 percent of current coal output. This will be used to fuel the coal-fired powerplant being built there.

In addition, further exploration is in the works which, if successful, would enable another 6 million kilowatts of power-generating capacity to be installed in the northern part of the country. The plant under construction will have a capacity of 1.2 million kilowatts.

This was reported to President Lopez Portillo at the start of his swing through Coahuila today, during which he also inaugurated the Resortes Helicoidales de Rassino Rheem Enterprise. He was told there that the plant would produce enough automotive springs not only to meet domestic demand but also to make Mexico an exporter of this item. The company is associated with SIDERMEX [Mexican Iron and Steel Enterprise].

As far as the production of noncoking coal is concerned, the director of the Rio Escondido coal mine, engineer Fernando Espinosa Velasco, told the chief executive at the entrance to one the company's underground mines that it began extracting coal on 28 July, 3 years after it was established. The thermoelectric powerplant will require 112 million tons of coal over its useful life of 30 years.

Forty international biddings were held in 1 year, Espinosa reported, for the purchase, with IDB funds, of the equipment needed to begin developing the deposits and for other short-, medium- and long-term goals.

The programs that the enterprise has under way and that it has scheduled for the future are important because in accordance with the Federal Government's plans to diversify the use of primary electricity-generating fuels, coal will account for 15 percent (equivalent to total domestic output in 1980); this will entail the construction of six coal-fired complexes similar to the one that President Lopez Portillo visited today.

Separately, at the spring manufacturing plant, where the president was met by a number of officials, including the director of SIDERMEX, Jorge Laypen Garay, and Rassimo director Sergio Romero Rosro, he was told that the company would invest 112 million pesos in its initial stage.

The plant will produce 455,800 springs to replace the suspension springs in U.S.-made cars. This merchandise is valued at 32 million pesos and will be earmarked in its entirety for the American market.

The chief executive was told that in 1981 output will jump to 3,128,998 units, valued at 265.966 million pesos; 506,160 units valued at 72.6 million pesos will be for the domestic automotive industry.

The plant, on which construction began in November 1979 and which was completed in July of this year, has a 98 million peso investment planned for its second stage.

In inaugurating the plant, President Lopez Portillo symbolically sent off the first shipment of springs to one of its more than 10 clients.

President Lopez Portillo then traveled by helicopter to the town of Nava, after flying over the Los Tajos coal strip mine.

ELECTRICITY COMMISSION TO INVEST 70 BILLION IN 1981

[Article by Sara Lovera]

[Text] The Federal Electricity Commission (CFE) will earmark 70 billion pesos in 1981 for investment programs to guarantee sufficient supplies of inexpensive electricity over the next decade, the director of the government-controlled enterprise, Alberto Escofet Artigas, said yesterday.

He spoke yesterday to Mexico City Rotarians and after pointing out that the program of electric power restrictions that was applied over the last 7 weeks was a success, he cautioned that given the complexity of the industry, the energy conservation measures would have to continue in the near-term future in nonproductive areas so that the crisis would not return.

As far as the investment program is concerned, he pointed out that a number of projects have been started and will go on line in 1981, thanks to a direct government subsidy of 17.5 billion pesos. A similar amount will come from service charges and specific subsidies, and 35 billion pesos will come from both domestic and outside financing.

Escofet gave the Rotarians, most of whom are businessmen, a brief summary of the activities of the CFE, noting that at present the industry provides electric power to 22,000 towns, which makes it the industry with the widest coverage in Mexico. It serves 9.2 million household and industrial consumers and in administrative terms it has to take care of something like 70 million meter readings, bills, receipts and collections a year.

In light of this, he said, it is to be expected that mistakes will be made, but he asserted that very few are.

Technically speaking, in order to provide service to almost all of the country's inhabitants, with the exception of 80,000 villages with fewer than 500 persons, it operates with 14 million kilowatts, generated by 500 electrical units. Only 70 of these units are modern (less than 10 years old), while 430 are older, and many date from last century.

He asserted that the interconnected system has been a major gain and that over the next decade the peninsulas of Baja California and Yucatan would be brought into this system.

With this system, conservation measures, necessary future rate changes and the planned growth of the industry, the CFE will be able to provide relatively good service for many years.

TOPOLOBAMBO BEING DEVELOPED AS INDUSTRIAL PORT

Mexico City EL SOL DE MEXICO in Spanish 15 Aug 80 pp 1-F, 8-F

[Article by Carmen Aida]

[Text] Topolobambo, Sinaloa (OEM)--Genaro Gallegos Orona, repeating what PEMEX [Mexican Petroleum] director Jorge Diaz Serrano said on his visit to Mazatlan on Navy Day, has asserted that Mexican gasoline is the most inexpensive in the world. Gallegos Orono is the resident construction engineer for the projects that PEMEX is investing about 1.3 billion pesos to build here by the hill known as Jabali. About 600 million pesos have been spent so far.

This naturally beautiful port has been given consideration countless times in construction projects, among them the much touted "Sea of Cortes Tourist Circuit," whose discoverer, Albert I. Owen, an engineer, saw it as having so much potential. Although it was not given any budgetary funds for many years, it is now getting two major allocations, one from PEMEX and the other, a 500 million peso investment, for the Las Gallinas de PROPEMEX Project.
This project includes a tuna freezing and processing plant, a sardine freezing and processing plant, a shrimp freezing unit, a fishmeal factory and a filleting plant.

The PEMEX investment is turning Jabali Hill, where only giant and other smaller cactuses have grown for thousands of years, into a deposit of ammonia, propane, fuel oil and distillates. Along with these plants, a multipurpose pipeline is being built from Los Mochis to Culiacan, as well as a pier with a 350-meter long viaduct that is now completed.

The pier alone, which will be for exclusive PEMEX use, costs 120 million pesos, and unlike all other piers built so far, it has metal, instead of concrete piles.

Multipurpose Pipeline To Be Completed This Year, Rest in 1981

Two years after construction work began, the 380 million peso multipurpose pipeline is about to be completed. From a pump house it will carry distillates a distance of 240 kilometers.

"This is a sizeable project for the area, and although products are not going to be produced here, they are going to be stored and distributed to consumers, thus guaranteeing supplies and preventing contamination," stressed Gallegos Orona. He added that the products will be coming from the Salina Cruz Refinery, that they are currently moved through the port of Guaymas in tanks and that with the plants being built here in Topolobampo, the Sinaloa area will be covered. "They will have supplies here and in Mazatlan."

Each of the ammonia and propane storage tanks are 25 meters high and 42 meters in diameter and can hold 20,000 tons. They still have their natural steel color but will soon be painted white with the green and yellow PEMEX stripes. The two fuel oil storage tanks have a 100,000 barrel capacity each (a barrel contains 159 liters), and at the foot of Jabali Hill there are two more tanks for diesel fuel that can hold 100,000 barrels each. In addition, there are the ammonia and propane handling tanks and a tower to burn off the wastes from the pump house, thus preventing pollution and leaks. The administrative offices and the almost completed housing for the technicians are located on the 52 hectares of level land that was expropriated from the "Rosendo G. Castro" Ejido.

Jormac S.A. (which is in charge of the fuel oil area) and Constructora General del Norte were given most of the contract: compressor, ammonia and propane plants, pier and tower. We were unable to gather more information about the pipeline because the offices, headed by Angel Bonilla, are in Los Mochis. The reports are that it is scheduled to be completed in a year and a half, in other words, in late 1981.

The pier, at a spot known as Punta Ayon, faces out to sea. This is known as a finger-type wharf, like all of the installations for unloading and other maneuvers at this storage plant.

The work is 50 percent completed. The piping is being installed; the number two cluster of piles is being inserted; the mooring platform is going in; a 100-meter section of the viaduct is finished, with 250 meters left, and the walkways and the railing also have yet to be completed.

When all of the pier facilities are in place, deep-draft vessels will be able to enter the port, and as we have said, this wharf is not for tourist purposes; it is strictly for commercial use and belongs exclusively to PEMEX. Remaining to be installed are two platforms and two clusters of piles (which are for mooring ships). A new feature of this pier is its metal piles. It has cathode shielding, which makes it resistant to the material that the piping is made of and prevents rust. Its mechanized equipment will be able to unload simultaneously two 25-ton vessels in 35 hours.

Problems To Cope With

The construction companies have found a port without services. "We have to go to Los Mochis to make our phone calls, because it's a hassle here, and the highway is another problem." So then, Topolobambo is being extended in one direction and contracted in another. It is indeed growing, with ties to Mazatlan and Guaymas, but it is growing like a little monster, over here yes, over there no.

Thanks to PEMEX and PROPEMEX there are temporary job sources for workers, albeit without future prospects. These day laborers receive the minimum wage, are not paid for their seventh day but do have social security.

From far away you can see the storage tanks, some 25 meters high, others 15 meters high. Soon there will be no problem supplying fuel to Sinaloa. This will be one more factor spurring development there, which has not been harmonious, because we are still exporting raw materials since farmers are showing continued resistance to involvement in agroindustry.

The fuel problem will cease to be one. Therefore, there is no reason to delay the beginning of the industrial stage of this "progressive-minded" state.

COMMANDER ARCE EXPLAINS NEEDED IMPROVEMENTS IN POLICE FORCE

Managua BARRICADA in Spanish 16 Aug 80 p 12

[Text] Revolutionary Commander Bayardo Arce Castano charged that some elements are attempting to make political use of the weaknesses of the Sandinista police force in order to blacken the image of the police.

This strong charge by the president of the council of state was made in the last session of this joint legislative body which was devoted to debating a report from the ministry of the interior, explaining the reasons for the recent raids by the Sandinista police. The report was essentially self-critical, and gave a great many reasons why mistakes have been made.

Commander Arce made this charge after representatives of private initiative and of the PSC [Social Christian Party] tried to question the report in a negative manner. The report was provided by the ministry of the interior, and dealt with the raids conducted by the Sandinista police force in the days following 19 July.

Bills Under Discussion

Commander Arce said that "the revolution has been considering a number of aspects and is prepared to correct a series of steps that were taken, because they do not fit the reality that we inherited from the Somozist dictatorship."

He said that every revolution, in its beginning, has romantic features. One of these, in our case, is the laws that were passed in the first days of the revolution, when we were trying to establish an institutional system quickly, without bothering to determine whether or not we had the base, the infrastructure needed so that the laws could be properly enforced.

"The Sandinist police force and the ministry of the Interior, through the government junta, are discussing bills to revise procedures," said Commander Arce.

He cited as an example the fact that in Nicaragua only 24 hours are allowed for processing an arrested person. This time is not adequate for the Nicaraguan police force, which has no specialized personnel and no technically trained elements.

He pointed out that in the United States--with a lengthy police history--72 hours are allowed. But here, because of the Somozist demagogy, the 24-hour requirement was not met. Now, because of limitations and the lack of structural and organizational capacity, no one can be investigated in such a short time.

Referring to the raids in themselves, he said that while they were portrayed as repressive, they were not. He added that repression is one thing, and what appears to be repressive is something else. And the Sandinist police force is not repressive.

The methods used in police work are interrogation, pursuit, and investigation. The methods employed in the past were beatings, torture, and intimidation.

Mistakes Must To Corrected

Comrade Arce said that it is hoped that the various sectors of the nation will adopt an understanding attitude about the limitations of the police force.

It will be the job of the council of state and of the defense commission to propose a series of realistic, specific measures which will help the police to improve, which is the desire of the police force itself.

He indicated that it is the intention of the members of the police force to correct the mistakes that have been made; they are making efforts to improve, though they are limited by a membership of 20 percent illiterates, as well as some other problems.

FSLN [Sandinist National Liberation Front] Cadres Arrested

Referring to statements made by the Social Christian Party to the effect that members of that organization were jailed in the police raids, Comrade Arce said the following:

"There may well have been persons injured. Anyone jailed is injured. But the police force has also been injured."

He said that in these raids even some FSLN militants were arrested. A protest was made to the ministry of the interior, but first the records of all the activists arrested were reviewed.

He pointed out that any organization--even the PSC or the UPANIC [Union of Nicaraguan Agricultural Producers] will not go to any lengths to protect the members of the organization.

He warned that if they want to defend anyone, it would be dangerous for them to act as spokesmen for criminals and counterrevolutionaries who may make use of these organizations in order to commit acts against the revolution itself. It is important to consider this aspect when dealing with such problems, which will continue to arise.

ELECTIONS SEEN AS INSTRUMENT OF PEOPLE

Will Elections Be Held?

Managua LA PRENSA in Spanish 28 Jul 80 p 2

[Article by Roberto Cardenal Ch.]

[Text] Now that the first anniversary of the revolution has come and gone, the democratic political parties and the private sector have begun to talk about elections and the need to set a date so that the existing promise will become a more stable and palpable commitment.

In this article, rather than repeat the arguments of the democratic political parties and private sector, I will attempt to respond to the arguments given by those in government for not setting a date for the elections.

We can separate the arguments offered into two categories: one which maintains that the elections will be held, that the commitment is being kept but that the time is not ripe to set a date because that would distract the country from its principal task which is economic recovery, or that the people have not yet asked for them, etc. The other line of thought maintains that elections are not necessary, that the people have already voted, that holding elections would be the equivalent of causing pluralism to disappear, since the FSLN [Sandinist National Liberation Front] would win them so decisively that the other political groups would be left without participation in the government, that elections are a phenomenon of middle-class democracy and that they do not fit in a socialist society, etc., etc.

We feel that this dual evaluation of elections makes it more necessary than ever to set a date since it would increase the credibility of that group which says that it is keeping its promise of elections at a time when its credibility is weakened by what other high officials in the government are saying publicly, namely that the elections are unnecessary or inappropriate.

With respect to the economic recovery, we feel that with the announcement of a date the private sector in this country and in the neighboring countries with which we trade or which are financing us would see us as a country determined to fulfill its democratic commitments, a country which is ready to be measured periodically against parties so that the people will have an opportunity to decide which of them best satisfies their aspirations; the private sector would see a government within the framework of a system open to change in contrast to a government cloaking itself in a totalitarian mantle which covers abuses and successes. All this would give confidence to investors and would give them the certainty that their contributions will be respected without any arbitrary changing of the rules of the game. It would be a measure which would dissipate the fear of totalitarianism and, therefore, the fear of investing.

It has also been said that our people have not requested elections. On programs such as "Linea Directa" [Direct Line], "Cara al Pueblo" [Face to Face with the People] or "Cabildos Abiertos" [Open Forums] no one has asked for elections and therefore it is deduced that no one wants them. That seems to us a childish and demogogic argument, since it would indicate that anything not asked for in the programs is not wanted by the people. For example, no one has asked to be a member of the people's militias, nor asked to get married, nor asked that they be given a house, nor asked for many other things, but we cannot deduce that the people do not want all those things.

Our people have always asked for elections, have put their faith in them and have seen them as part of their ethos and civil life as long as they have been permitted to make use of this right. By means of elections, the people elect the leaders of trade unions and popular organizations; by means of elections, the people decide who will be the mayor of Monimbo; by means of elections, the people elect those in every group who will be representatives to the Council of State. The Council of State selected its leadership by means of votes, and votes are being used by the Government Junta and the leadership of the FSLN to make their decisions. By means of elections, the CDS [Sandinist Defense Committees] are elected; company boards of directors make their decisions by means of votes, etc.

Other groups say that elections cannot be held because the electoral system favors the middle class since it has economic power, etc. To this we reply that the shoe is now on the other foot. Now the FSLN has in its hands all the economic power that the Somozas held, in addition to economic power over other confiscated properties which were not held by the Somozas. What is more the FSLN has the power of the state so that those who might fear the lack of fairness in any election would be the private sector and the democratic parties, since it is the FSLN which controls the wealth, the means of communications, human and economic resources and the power and the means to strengthen its popular organizations. It is in the best position to make promises, to mobilize itself, to identify the interests of the state with the interests of the future voters, to indoctrinate the people so that they will follow the party's watchwords, to offer public positions, and in short to use the machinery of the state to win elections. However, although elections may merely serve to justify the presence of governments currently in power, for all the reasons cited previously we feel that elections are proper because it is not a question of attempting to win them or to gain power but rather of putting pluralism into practice, strengthening democracy and giving the people the option to choose among the ideologies, social programs, personalities, forms of government and so forth presented by the various parties and candidates.

What is more, the belief that the people have already voted because they fought against Somoza or because they assembled in great numbers in the 17 July Square is to reach a faulty conclusion from a sound premise. We must take into consideration the fact that electing is choosing between two or more alternatives. To believe, for example, that a TV program is infinitely popular because it has an enormous audience in a country which only has one TV channel is to close one's eyes to the truth. It is one thing to see what the people do when they have two or more alternatives and quite another when they only have one choice. The only way to determine whether they are happy with the one-party form of government is through elections. Then the people have the entire say; all become equal, and from the sum of each will the will of all the people is obtained.

Finally, if after those elections it turns out that none of the political parties receives more than 5 percent of the votes, then they will have no political representation since what they are seeking are not gifts but rather duly won rights which oblige others to respect them.

As a final thought for those who do not want to hold elections: It is not right to accuse and attack the military men in Bolivia who did not respect the outcome of an election and in this country to deny the people's right to go to the polls.

Managua LA PRENSA in Spanish 28 Jul 80 p 2

[Article by Mario Alfaro Alvarado]

[Text] One year after the popular victory over the Somoza dictatorship, there is persistent talk about elections. It is obvious that there is growing interest on the part of the Nicaraguan people to know when these elections will be held, elections for which they struggled for 45 years.

Public opinion now has the opportunity to think, speak, write and comment on the elections, their importance and their significance for the life of the citizen and for public freedoms. It is a good exercise in civics because it will permit the people to identify with the very essence of democracy. How, then, is it possible to conceive of democracy without free and honest elections?

Democracy customarily is defined in many ways. But no definition is valid if free elections and choices of government are not included in it as basic elements.

Free elections, a universal and secret ballot and freely elected governments are the very essence of democracy. And that is the kind of democracy which the people of Nicaragua have dreamed of having since independence and which they have never had.

Rivers of blood have flowed in the fields and cities of the fatherland in the cause of freedom and democracy. Hundreds of lives have been sacrificed so that this distressed country could one day have a free and honest election.

Elections are not a mere formality, a constitutional "mandate" which must be complied with in one way or another. Elections are the mechanism by means of which the people legitimately exercise their inalienable right to govern themselves and to delegate authority to those citizens whom they have freely chosen to govern in their name.

Elections have three basic purposes: 1. They limit the exercise of power and keep a candidate or a party from installing a dictatorship and doing what they will with the country and its inhabitants. 2. They permit the people, within the time frame established by the constitution and laws, to change the ruler or the party to which the ruler belongs for another party which seems better to them. 3. They enable the people to exercise their sovereign right and install a government in accordance with their wishes and criteria, thereby confirming that the people alone are the sole and legitimate source of authority in the nation.

What is important here and now is that free, democratic and honest elections be held for the first time in the history of Nicaragua and not that such and such party or such and such candidate win the elections. It is not the coming to power of a specific party which is most important, even though that coming to power is accomplished by means of free and honest elections. What is important is that it is the people who in general, secret and guaranteed elections elect the candidate or party of their choice.

All parties have the right--and they always exercise that right--to say that they have the majority of the voters in their ranks and that they "will sweep" the elections. Anything can be said; however, what counts is to demonstrate with free and secret votes deposited in ballot boxes that in reality one party has the support and confidence of the majority of the people.

A party which really has great popular support has no reason to avoid the test of elections. On the contrary, it should be eager to demonstrate its popularity and the confidence which the people have placed in it.

Gaining power is not what should inspire political parties but rather honestly and cleanly winning elections so that they can put a good government in operation. There are many ways to win elections; however, there is only one way to win them legally and honorably: by means of universal and secret suffrage.

It is not coming to power per se which should motivate a political party but rather gaining power through the will of the people in order to serve these selfsame people, those who gave the party their votes as well as those who did not. To govern and govern well has to be the political objective of the parties.

The political tragedy of Nicaragua has its origin in the absence of free elections throughout its entire independent life. The two historical parties which have dominated the national political scene until now alternated in power by overthrowing one another by force of arms. Once in power, the victorious party always resorted to fraud to "win" elections and maintain control of the state. That is until the other party overthrew it and imposed its own dictatorship disguised as democracy.

Over the years this practice, to the shame of Nicaragua, turned into a deep-seated custom and engendered such party rivalry that it produced the freebooting and bloody dictatorships of Zelaya and Somoza. Election fraud engenders dictatorships and the latter, in turn, promote election fraud. How is this vicious circle to be broken?

It has already been broken. The Nicaraguan people broke it once and for all with the defeat of Somoza and his corrupt clique. Now that victory must be consolidated. The sure way to achieve this is by selecting a legitimate government through free and democratic elections.

DANIEL ORTEGA WARNS WORKERS AGAINST IMPROPER ELECTIONS

Managua BARRICADA in Spanish 16 Aug 80 p 12

[Text] "The people have won the right to elections with their blood, but it is necessary for the people to go through a process of consolidation and transformation and popular democracy, which means that the workers will choose their representatives in democratic assemblies; this is a true democracy."

This statement was made yesterday evening by Revolutionary Commander Daniel Ortega, while speaking to 620 workers from the "El Porvenir Industrial Complex" on the "Face the People" program.

"The elections," said Ortega,"are being called for by a small minority. They want elections that will coincide with their interests, elections in which the bosses will decide who the representatives should be. They are trying to confuse the people and give them the feeling that the revolution is depriving the people of their right to elect."

The decision to give a vote to a representative, said Revolutionary Commander Ortega, is a right that has been won by the Nicaraguan people. The FSLN [Sandinist National Liberation Front] and the National Reconstruction Government Junta will not make use of this right to set up election machinery of the type we had in the past.

The struggle of the people against the Somozist dictatorship, he pointed out, is a way of voting that has more force than simply marking a ballot. The people have shed their blood; this is a vote which carries much significance, said Ortega.

There have been elections in Nicaragua already, but we are not going to remain paralyzed by keeping elections going constantly; that would mean immobility under the guise of participation by the people, said the revolutionary leader.

The member of the government junta pointed out that we should not believe that, because we have a strong revolutionary government, it will use its tools of power to dominate our people. As an example he cited the fact that the revolution has been teaching people to read and has given weapons to the people. That is a great proof of democracy.

Comrade Sergio Ramirez Mercado said that the elections after the triumph of the revolution will be different and that our vote will be more aware.

We don't want meaningless elections, said Ramirez; that would be worthless.

Hearing a small minority talk about elections, it would seem that they don't want to elect conscientious officials who have made a commitment to the people, but rather that they want the traditional sort of elections.

He gave the following example of the sort of elections that this minority wants: a millionaire candidate, because he has more money, can import thousands of shirts with his name printed on them. He can give away radios, sewing machines, etc., thinking that in that way he can win votes in Nicaragua. But now he would be totally mistaken, because such elections would be meaningless. And now, with half a million Nicaraguans having been taught to read, such elections would be impossible.

He added that the people will vote for their own interests. We shall see, he said, who will vote for the agrarian reform program to be improved or who will vote for the return of confiscated lands; who will vote for the expansion of the property owned by the people or who will vote to have the confiscated factories returned to their former owners; who will vote for an expansion of the literacy program or who will vote for a traditional education system such as the one we had in the past under Somozism; who will vote for this nation to continue to be sovereign and independent or who will vote for a return of the old relations such as those with the United States in the past.

These will be the true elections, said Ramirez. Then we will see how the people will vote, whether they will vote for their own interests or for the interests of a minority. And when we can determine that, it will not matter how many employees the government has. It will only matter how many thinking men and women there are in the nation.

During this appearance by our leaders, the following persons were present: Commander Daniel Ortega, Sergio Ramirez, member of the government junta, Minister of Labor Virgilio Godoy, and Vice Minister of Industry Ernesto Leal.

JOURNALISM ISSUES, PROBLEMS DISCUSSED

'LA PRENSA' Is Independent

[Editorial by Pablo Antonio Cuadra]

[Text] We have chosen the most difficult course within the Nicaraguan journalistic tradition. Not to be a party paper. Not to be a government paper, but also, not to be an opposition paper. Not to act as a means of defense or attack, but as a meeting place. And this is difficult because such a position demands objectivity and in our training period of 45 years under a dictatorship, the journalist, like the guerrilla, comes from battle and is accustomed to attack, to information strongly tainted with subjectivity.

We are trying to train our personnel for this new and revolutionary mission of independence. We want to identify ourselves positively with the transformations in our country and in our people, and within this identification, and starting from that point, we want to open ourselves up to pluralism of different opinions and to make room for constructive independent criticism.

But, added to the resistance that always opposes any change in routine or in custom--such as subjectivity in Nicaraguan journalism--we find ourselves facing another obstacle--government criticism when we make a mistake. Its spokesmen ask us to be objective, but criticize us without objectivity. They don't refer to our mistakes but to our "intentions." They suppose us to be ill-intentioned and based on that subjective point of view, they attack us.

I am not saying that our mistakes should not be pointed out and condemned. By so doing, that will make us continue to become more objective. What I am asking is that an enemy not be manufactured where there is no enemy. We are just as interested in the revolution and in its success as are the people in the government today. Our criticism, when it is made, is not so that the revolution will fail, but on the contrary, so that it will not fail or so that it will not stumble. We do this because we are all in this together, we are all following the same course. Some of us lead the way, others remove obstacles blocking the path, and still others point out changes in direction when they occur.

We have compared our journalism with the democratic organ of the government, the Council of State. An organ of pluralist expression within the revolution. An organ of freedom of opinion that provides the points of view of those who are taking part in the process of Nicaragua's transformation. LA PRENSA seeks to be a meeting place for the free expression of a nation that now controls its own history. That freedom is what we have structured our independence for, and we want this difficult objectivity in order to defend our independence. We have not always been objective. Let us be the first to admit that! But we are working toward this objectivity because we consider that to be our contribution to the revolution of a free people who deserve to be kept informed, with absolute impartiality, on the history that is now being written, and who deserve to take part in this history with their ideas, their opinions, and their criticisms.

'LA PRENSA' To Serve Nation

[Editorial]

[Text] Today LA PRENSA aspires, more than ever before, to create a journalism at the service of the unity and peace of the Nicaraguan family. But there are serious difficulties involved in doing so.

One of the most serious problems is the mental heritage left us by the long years of struggle against the dictatorship. Nicaraguan journalists became accustomed to a state of battle. Prompt in accusation, in a sarcastic or direct attack, in systematic, harsh, and frequently negative criticism. The nature of the political antagonism experienced at that time made any self-criticism or a modest recognition of error difficult. That meant a show of weakness and provided a target for the enemy--ready to ruthlessly exploit any admission of weakness. And recognizing any positive aspects in the oppressive regime was playing into the hands of its propaganda machinery. For that reason the journalist kept quiet about any praiseworthy actions, like rare oases, done at times by some members of the government.

The time in which our national journalism was subject to these rules was a long one. It can practically be said that almost all of us Nicaraguan journalists were born and lived under these rules. The young journalist wrote his first stories in a journalism at war. So all of his habits, from routine journalistic practices to the way he presented his stories, were tainted, profoundly shaped by the imperatives of the times. He didn't conceive of a different form of journalism, since he had never had an opportunity to escape from this terrible circle that our situation created and reinforced.

Confronted also with a regime lacking any ideology or any philosophy of government, confronted with a small gangster-like clique, highly skilled in cynicism, the journalist also lost his sense of the clash of ideas and arguments, so common in other countries. On the contrary, in Nicaragua everything tended to become personalized. Could it be any other way? Refuting a government decision with arguments and statistics was meaningless since blunders were not caused by errors or a lack of information, but rather by the exclusive intention to reap personal and political benefits. All of us Nicaraguans are products of this prehistoric, paleolithic history. Our journalists are products of this past.

Now there has been a change. A break that aspires to be both radical and profound, a true beginning of a new history. But what is happening? We carry a burden, a bad habit deeply rooted in our fibers that at times impels us to go on reacting in the same old ways.

In today's Nicaragua, for the first time, the revolutionary government has created an opportunity for a true pluralism to exist. That has meant the joint participation of people and newspapers with different thoughts, interests, and perspectives.

That has meant the creation of a democracy designed to be based on dialogue. But the burden of the past has been stifling all this promise. What is different has often been treated as "the enemy," and the same old dynamics has tried to crush the birth of what is new. The tendency to view others unfavorably has cropped up again, refusing to recognize any merit or honesty in what is different and questioning all such intentions. Self-criticism has again been stifled, defeated by a defensive attitude that tries at all costs to add up points in its favor. At times at any cost at all.

We would be hypocrites if we gave public thanks to God because we in LA PRENSA are not "like them." Also, whoever persists in seeing such defects only in the other side is also being hypocritical. Not only have we often yielded to this burden from the past, but as individuals we can feel this internal tension that at times manifests itself negatively toward whatever comes from the other side, especially when a personal attack is involved and the ego feels inclined to avenge itself.

But we can not yield to the pressure of the old. If we did so we would be betraying the most serious obligation we have to this revolution: to make it fruitful, fraternal, and Christian.

This struggle against the weight of the past will require daily vigilance, a continued effort to reject the old spirit which resists death, as Saint Paul said.

We are ready to make this effort. It will certainly be an effort made by men and as such subject to many faults and contradictions. Still we want this to be the course of our journalism: to facilitate the way to the new history, which as recently literate people we are still writing with shaky lines and a good deal of rewriting.

'BARRICADA' SCORES 'LA PRENSA' ATTITUDE

[Text] LA PRENSA's last two editorials (9 and 10 July), dealing with the particular problems which that newspaper faces in exercising a truly constructive form of journalism, are encouraging, in the sense that they express an explicit intent to improve in regard to the line followed to date by this newspaper, after the great majority of its professional staff and almost 80 percent of its workers in general transferred to EL NUEVO DIARIO in order to create a new revolutionary weapon in our national journalism. Nonetheless, in the search for a response to its particular problems--which may at the same time serve as an explanation to its readers and to the entire nation--LA PRENSA is making a series of general comments covering all of our national journalism, while leaving aside some questions that deserve comment.

In its main argument, LA PRENSA says that one of the most serious problems is the mental heritage left to our national journalism by the prolonged struggle against the dictatorship. The nature of the political antagonism--it says--accustomed the Nicaraguan reporter to be on the attack, a systematic critic, and frequently negative, because no concessions could be made to the dictatorship. The habits, the journalistic techniques and the form used were conditioned by the imperatives of the times. The clash of ideas was lost, and issues tended to be personalized, since nothing else was possible, says LA PRENSA. And then it suggests that after the triumph of the revolution--which entailed a radical and deep break with the past--it was offered the challenge of creating a truly democratic form of journalism, but "we carry a burden, a bad habit deeply rooted in our fibers that at times impels us to go on reacting in the same old ways. But we cannot yield to the pressure of the old," concludes LA PRENSA, and it announces a continued effort to stimulate a different form of journalism, "in order to facilitate the course of history."

While this commentary is positive in general, we must list some of its limitations, if we are to go to the heart of the problem and reach truly worthwhile conclusions.

It is true that the majority of our national journalists took positions of direct opposition to the dictatorship, positions that demanded a commitment on the part of the journalists to use the communications media as real weapons against the old regime. Placing the form and content of democratic journalism at the service of the people responded to an appeal coming from the people themselves, to attack unceasingly the dictatorship in any way possible, at any risk. That was the option chosen by the democratic majority within Nicaraguan journalism, although there were of course groups of Somozist journalists, and a perhaps even smaller sector that never directly attacked Somozism, but sought reconciliation, the survival of Somozism infused with imperialism, and thus the victory of reform and not of revolution. That group also had its own forms, styles, and content.

What is important, in any event, is to point out that the majority of our journalists, by selecting a direct attack against the dictatorship, also defined their class position at the side of themasses. This position led them to understand that the role of the journalist does not consist of placing himself above society like a "referee" to tell people what is going on, cloaked with a false guise of "impartiality." On the contrary, the actual practice and the demands of the struggle showed that the journalist, like the intellectual worker, like the salaried worker, who all fight in the ideological field and have an important social mission to fulfill in society, should organize in trade unions to make their struggle more effective and to unite closely with the majority aspirations of the exploited. The Battle, then, took place not only in the communications media, but also in the streets, in the underground press, in the Union of Radio Journalists of Managua, which joined organically with the masses organized in the United People Movement, in the UPN [Union of Nicaraguan Journalists], which also joined with the National Patriotic Front, in order to fight from that position for the revolutionary overthrow of the dictatorship and for the triumph of the popular democratic regime. We can say, then, that despite all the defeats and distortions that occurred in the dark days, the struggle of the journalists created the conditions for a true integral achievement on the part of the people of the press. Whoever in the past had raised the banners of an "independent" journalism did not do so from an abstract point of view; it was a matter of political, economic, and ideological independence from the dictatorship and from the class power of capital. And the condition for this independence was always its growing unity with the Popular Movement, with the interests and aspirations of the masses, and with the FSLN [Sandinist National Liberation Front] itself.

The truly difficult course which the majority of Nicaraguan democratic journalists have chosen is to continue to maintain this historic option that was chosen during the period of struggle against the dictatorship and to place journalism at the service of the majority interests of the people. This is difficult because always being at the sides of the people and against all their enemies is an attitude that entails great deprivation and a struggle against an ideological burden that goes much deeper than what was inherited from the dictatorship. Even more difficult is the fact that, now that the dictatorship and the large anti-Somozist umbrella under which some false friends of the people had gathered have both disappeared, our present situation demands clear definitions. One is either with the people or against the people, and it is becoming harder to deceive the people.

The challenge given us By the revolution is immense, we don't doubt that; but it is a challenge that is easier for some to accept than for others. Revolutionary journalism in the days of the dictatorship personalized many of its attacks on Somoza and the men who visibly represented his regime of exploitation, but it acquired also a higher level of consciousness that led it not to personalize political issues, and to educate the people to see that what was important was not to replace persons, but the system itself, by another system with a radically different content.

Attacking Somoza and the Somozists never implied that their persons had to be eliminated to solve the nation's problems, but rather that it was necessary to fight against"Somozism without Somoza" and imperialist intervention in order to give preference to the revolutionary system rather than the one favored by the reformers. Actually, while in the past there was a ruthless ideological clash, the democratic journalists demonstrated great ability and skill in favoring the revolutionary concept of anti-imperialist Sandinism, rather than the reformist concept of proimperialist anti-Somozism.

Now, participating in today's revolutionary Nicaragua and exercising a truly constructive form of journalism is obviously easier for those who have always fought at the sides of the revolutionary people without any sort of reservations. We all know the outcome of the struggle: the triumph of the Sandinist Popular Revolution and not of the proimperialist bourgeois reform. The people are in power, and that means absolutely everything: ownership of the communications media, the tasks and roles of journalists, and both form and content.

Then what are the real problems, the difficulties, and the tasks today facing our national journalism? The answer to this question is obviously much more complex than the answer given by LA PRENSA in its editorials. We can say, though, that what LA PRENSA proposes as the main problem--overcoming the burden of "negativism" in criticism, the inertia in self-criticism, and what position to take in relation to the new authority, after having lived through over 4 decades of Somozism--has already been handled well by the revolutionary current of journalism. Those who joined fully with the struggles of the masses and the revolutionary transformation brought about by the FSLN have never confused the radically different essence of today's new revolutionary authority and all its state institutions with the antipopular nature of the Somozist dictatorship. Those people are quite different who, claiming to oppose the Sandinist hegemony, place themselves in the "opposition," and even go so far as to make use of the luxury of questioning the Sandinist authority as if it were Somozism, using weapons that they never dared bring out into the light of day during Somozism. Perhaps that may be a problem for some of the new journalists of LA PRENSA, but it can not be considered a problem for all of our national journalism. There are problems, but the central issues lie elsewhere.

[Text] Now that the differences have been drawn between those who, because of their ideological ties and their behavior in the past, were bewildered by the rise to power of the exploited classes, and the majority of our journalists who joined in the Sandinist struggle and who have no structural problems in defining their position in relation to the new Sandinist authorities, we can deal with the real problems and issues facing our national journalism.

We do not claim to be providing magic solutions and recipes for these problems, because there are none, but rather we are outlining the magnitude of some of the tasks that we face, while calling on other comrades to join in this collective effort of clarification.

In short, this is not a matter of simply exposing reactionary positions present in Nicaraguan journalism; we must also determine the courses that will entail greater commitment on the part of journalists with the revolution, especially now that the Assembly of Commitment of the UPN is drawing near.

I From Concept to Organization

Against the bourgeois concept of the communications media as tools for the dissemination of (apparently objective) ideological messages aimed against the masses, to demobilize them, confuse them, and deny them their historic role, we must promote a revolutionary concept that aspires to make the media a true means of communications: weapons for the masses, independent of capital and of imperialism, to be used for the organization, education, and mobilization of the people around their revolutionary tasks and above all, to achieve a true communication among the people.

The link between the organized masses and the communications media, in the transmission and reception of messages, is for that reason an imperative in order to achieve true communication. Rather than a technical matter, this is an essentially political and ideological problem. If we think not, let us review the communications media in our nation and we will find huge differences in the importance that they attach to the presence of the organized people in the construction of a new society. The clash between these two totally opposed concepts is manifested on a daily basis.

But a correct concept is not enough to guarantee the organic bond linking journalism in Nicaragua with the masses. The organization, as an essential intermediating entity, must become a real force to enrich the concept and guarantee revolutionary practices. That is the challenge proposed by the revolution to the UPN. In addition to its many tasks in the realms of political education, the specialization of journalists, the economic defense of the interests of the union, its role in the national and ideological struggle, and its political presence in our national life, perhaps its most immediate task is to help to standardize a revolutionary concept of the role of journalists, so that the organization may be consolidated and structured according to the tasks proposed for it.

The struggle is both demanding and difficult because it offers the challenge of breaking old organizational models and overcoming a series of ideological weaknesses, but in the end, it is the only way to multiply the efforts and abilities of journalists on both an individual and collective basis, while at the same time creating a stronger bond between the union and the revolutionary mass organizations.

II Social Transformation As a Source of News Versus "Sensationalism"

The media, which are still subject to the dynamics of the laws of the marketplace, must oppose the objective pressure that tends to impose on the news and on information the character of merchandise designed to be sold to consumers.

"Sensationalism," which is typified by unusual isolated events or facts (three-legged chickens, legendary heroes who take the place of the masses, exciting feature stories, and other distortions of bourgeois society) which have little or nothing to do with reality, but which stimulate sales of the news product at the cost of the reproduction of the old types of bourgeois values (which make things of no historic importance seem important), is a trend that should be opposed by revolutionary journalism. The revolution itself, which contains a wealth of information, events, and unprecedented social dynamism, should be the main source of news. It synthesizes the heart of our people: their problems and limitations; the economic and social transformation; their struggle in all fields to win new sectors over to the cause of the revolution and to defeat its enemies in all areas; the understanding of their own history and their future; and the changes that are taking place in their daily lives.

Furthermore, when confronted with a contradictory situation, journalism should be able to expose the reactionary interests of those who proclaim a false "independence" from the revolution, while in reality they are quite dependent on the political ideological, and ultimately economic interests, of capital.

In the everyday focus on the class struggle, in the interpretation of the news (analysis of its causes, consequences, and interrelationships with other phenomena), opposed to the presentation of isolated events that reflect an artificially fragmented reality, these two different concepts of class are made manifest. Concealing reality is the objective of the reaction, while giving the people the tools to take possession of the history that they are creating is the goal that the revolution has given revolutionary journalism.

III Not Only Content, But Form As Well

Nothing is harder than to be imaginative and to give new forms of expression to revolutionary journalism. The break with the past, with its ingrained habits, will be a long and difficult undertaking, but we can not forget this challenge and go back to the easy way of transplanting old forms to fit new contents.

Apart from creatively exploring the forms that offer the best means of communication among the people, we must recover the entertaining and amusing function of the communications media, but separated from the alienating and stupefying character given the media by the forces of reaction, in order to give the media a new liberating perspective.

How much progress have we made so far? That is a question we must ask in order to overcome our deficiencies and limitations.

IV New and Old Values

"We can not yield to the pressure of the old," said LA PRENSA in its editorial. But we have seen what LA PRENSA means by "old." For revolutionary journalism, the "old" is nothing but the exaggerated patriotic nationalism that was advocated by the forces of reaction, in opposition to the revolutionary internationalism called for by Sandinist practice. The "old" is reactionary anticommunism which the reactionaries use to confuse and manipulate the petite bourgeoisie in order to keep them away from the historic regime of revolutionary Sandinism. The new is voluntary work, the Assemblies of Commitment, and days of emulation, in which our people express a new attitude toward work that marks a step forward in their revolutionary consciousness. These are some of the new values that the revolution has been creating.

Disseminating the best experiments, making them widespread, must be a duty of revolutionary journalism in its contribution to the victory of the new over the old. And where can the new be found? Right here: in the everyday life of the people, in their advances in participation in directing the economy and the revolutionary state, advances that so annoy the classes who were removed from power. The new lies in the deep love for our country which inspired the Sandinist revolution and in the constant renewal of our homage to the heroes and martyrs who made the victory possible. The old vices and the heritage of Somozism will not disappear overnight, but the revolutionary transformation of Nicaraguan journalism is one of the worst enemies of these vices from the past.

V Revolutionary Criticism

An essential requisite for the exercise of revolutionary and constructive criticism within our national journalism is a thorough understanding of the Sandinist revolution and a sincere bond between the journalist and the revolutionary process and the class interests represented. That is why the reactionary forces find it so difficult to exercise constructive criticism. They do not share this understanding and this bond, and their statements of good faith are worthless because they are contradicted in practice every day and in the end, that is what counts.

We revolutionary journalists, on the opposite side, have to try to go beyond mere understanding and a bond with the process. We also need to have new attitudes and to overcome a series of political and ideological weaknesses in order to find the central issues and to exercise our criticism with a great sense of responsibility. We must throw overboard matters of personalities so we will not miss our target, and in order to find real solutions for our problems.

The communications media should also become a weapon used by the masses for their revolutionary criticism. That is the correct position. But there are problems, both subjective and objective problems involved in this, and we must properly evaluate them in order to determine their causes and the real possibilities of overcoming these problems. In any case, the essential thing is always to offer alternative solutions within a revolutionary perspective. That is what really makes criticism constructive.

The revolution demands an energetic and responsible position from revolutionary journalism in facing problems such as excessive bureaucracy, the squandering of our resources, arrogance, abuses of power, etc. We must not allow ourselves to become involved in manipulation, as the reactionary sectors do every day.

We are the first to be convinced that without criticism there can be no revolution, and that is why we are calling on our national journalism to face up to this historic responsibility. Only thus can we rise to the level of our circumstances.

CARLOS NUÑEZ COMMEMORATES 'BARRICADA' ANNIVERSARY

Managua BARRICADA in Spanish 27 Jul 80 p 3

[Speech by Carlos Nunez, commander of the revolution, at the ceremonies commemorating the first anniversary of BARRICADA; date not specified]

[Text] Brothers of the National Directorate
Brothers of the Government Junta for National Reconstruction
Brothers of the National Secretariats
Brother delegates of the Mass Organizations
Comrade journalists
Workers of BARRICADA
FSLN [Sandinist National Liberation Front] Propagandists
Pioneers in Revolutionary Journalism

When the FSLN was founded 20 years ago, an activity was initiated which was new in scope: propaganda activity. And the first leaders, who are not with us and whom we miss, operating clandestinely and anonymously at the stroke of midnight, taking advantage of every opportunity, glued to the mimeograph machine with stencils, their hands covered with ink, barely using single sheets of newsprint in semidarkened rooms--these men put into each one of their publications their untiring spirit and their bright intelligence in the production of leaflets, pamphlets and newspapers. They awakened our consiciousness with their activity, teaching us methods of fighting; it was they who showed us the way toward ending the dark night of Somoza and it is they who should be considered the pioneers of revolutionary journalism in Free Nicaragua. For this reason, in the midst of the celebrations which have centered around the first anniversary of the triumph of the Sandinist Popular Revolution, it is especially important for us to salute the first year of BARRICADA because this newspaper symbolizes the efforts of the leaders who have fallen. It symbolizes their hands, their blood and their intelligence which, molded by 20 years of fighting, were present in the many thousands of leaflets published, in the hundreds of thousands of articles written even under the most ferocious persecution, in dozens of newspapers published on a national and international level.

The emergence of BARRICADA as the official organ of the people's vanguard and of the FSLN as the undisputed leader of the emerging popular revolutionary power, marks an important milestone in the process of organizing the working people on a mass basis. That enormous organizational effort in the proper exercise of power necessarily involved the establishment of its own organ of expression which would be clearly defined and conscious of its role in the new era our people began by revolutionary means under the leadership of the FSLN on 19 July 1979.

Birth of the Revolution's Newspaper

From the date of its first issue, 25 July 1979, which carried a headline summarizing the vanguard's resolve--Victory and Forward--BARRICADA has been one of the important elements in strengthening the ties between the FSLN and the masses at the same time that it was becoming a valuable instrument in the difficult task of explaining, orienting and organizing the masses throughout each one of the complex contingencies which have arisen in the development of our program.

It fell to our brother, Commander Bayardo Arce, to assume for the national directorate the responsibility of pulling together the experience of the FSLN on the subject of the revolutionary press--which, because of the very peculiarities of our fight and of our historic development, was a fragmented experience--and with the assistance of persons such as Julio Lopez, Luis A. Guzman, Carlos Fernando Chamorro, Leonel Espinoza and Carlos Carrion, establish the basis for the emergence and permanence of the official organ of the FSLN.

It has been 12 months of hard work. In spite of the scarcity of materials and with great effort and dedication, we have succeeded in bringing about the consolidation of the revolutionary press--a daily, everyday expression of the guidance of the vanguard to the masses--which has been characterized by dynamism, creativity and originality.

A New Kind of Journalism

BARRICADA has been overcoming these difficulties and its own inexperience. In what we could call stages, BARRICADA has, little by little, assumed the responsibilities inherent in its role and has projected, with increasing clarity, the peculiarities, requirements, advances and problems of our revolution. To be real and effective that projection has to have as its permanent focus the transformation of the masses, of the organized people. And that has not been easy.

It has not been easy because that transformation of the masses occurs without fanfare. It is the everyday effort of the field worker or city worker to increase production; it is the straightforward activity of the new type of labor union assemblies; it is the everyday activity of the CDS [Sandinist Defense Committees]; it is the political training which is taking place in dozens of seminars all over the country. It is, in short, the constant activity of all the people which serves to bring about a revolutionary transformation.

As we said, it has not been easy to take over the job of projecting that transformation of the masses. It has not been easy because the press in this country was marked with the stamp of sensationalism. We were not accustomed to regard as news the formation of a cooperative in the country near Matagalpa; we were not accustomed to regard as news the daily lives of men and women among our people working in factories, schools, neighborhoods and labor unions.

After the victory of the revolution, after the people had become the subject of their own history, this had to change; BARRICADA, the official organ of the vanguard, could not fail to assume primary responsibility for a program which has definitely necessitated a qualitative change on the part of the national press.

BARRICADA's Achievements

In this sense BARRICADA has established and must continue to establish, the guidelines for the new journalism in the new Nicaragua. BARRICADA thus constitutes the vanguard in the fight for the transformation of national journalism into a sector in conformity with the new realities--serious, responsible and revolutionary.

It is precisely for these reasons that the sectors interested in stopping or at least curbing the extent of these transformations feel that BARRICADA is a thorn in the flesh.

They sometimes speak about BARRICADA's lack of "objectivity." An objective newspaper is something BARRICADA is not and never will be--and that we can state flatly. It is not and never will be impartial because it is at the service of the revolution's interests, which are none other than the interests of the working people. BARRICADA is not impartial because, like the revolution itself, it is a Sandinist organ. Therefore, like the revolution, it is of the people and anti-imperialist.

Within the framework of those definitions BARRICADA must continue its upward march toward excellence. The tasks it has before it are enormous and the different aspects of its activity and of its influence on the people's consciousness should be developed more and more effectively, with a wider scope, a higher degree of perfection and better than the way things have been done up to now.

BARRICADA must every day become more efficient in the fulfillment of its educational task; it must constantly improve its performance in its role as disseminator not only of the guidelines and positions of the vanguard, but also of that enormous activity that we spoke of earlier which is no other than the building by the masses--down to the most minute details--of life in the new society. And to achieve this, we must strain every muscle so that BARRICADA may be the strongest support for our mass organizations, especially as concerns the overall political-organizational guidelines.

The Ideological Fight Will Become Harder

The aspect which, in political terms, probably best sums up what we have said up to this point is BARRICADA's job as an ideological combatant. Up to now it has been possible to wage the ideological battle within objective parameters, that is, starting with the concrete tasks of the revolution. That is a framework which must be maintained; it is by necessity the North of our compass.

We believe that the nature and the content of the ideological battle has been clarified, but it is important to be aware of the fact that the battle will become harder and that it is going to be harsher. For several months now the international reactionaries, with beating drums, have unleashed a campaign through their transnational newspapers which as you all know, has found an echo, subtle or blatant, in some of the local media. In other local media they have been confronted by the solid, brave and honest activity of newsmen who without any hemming and hawing have said to them: Gentlemen of the reaction, consciences cannot be bought, we are for the revolution, we are for the people, we are free newsmen, the people's freedom has no price. On the other hand, the very progress of the revolution, demonstrated graphically on 19 July, will noticeably influence the actions of the obstructionist or frankly reactionary groups. It is up to us to perfect our aim.

It is up to us, not only to reject the attacks and to disseminate the best arguments to counter them but also to strengthen the people's understanding of all the details and shadings of the politics of the revolution.

It is up to us to raise the level of political understanding of the masses as high as possible. This will without any doubt guarantee the rejection of reactionary or ultraleftist interpretations, a better performance of assigned tasks and a substantial contribution to the formation of a solid revolutionary attitude in our people. This should be based on a participation which is conscious and clear as to the historic, stragetic objectives of the revolution and on an understanding of the immediate requirements and limitations.

BARRICADA Must Outstrip Itself To Meet the New Requirements

An even greater strengthening of BARRICADA is therefore essential. Its objectives with regard to militancy and with regard to the masses must become more specific. It is essential that even in the most remote areas of our country BARRICADA be identified as the official organ which expresses the activities and needs of these areas as the vibrant, dynamic and guiding expression of the people in revolution; the organ which speaks to the people, tells them their errors and their mistakes and gives them its invaluable instruction.

Great things are expected of BARRICADA and hence a great effort will also be needed to accomplish its assigned tasks.

We note with satisfaction how it is improving. The editorials, the background articles, the departmental news, the articles on the mass organizations, the leadership activity of our vanguard, the actions of our government junta and the National Reconstruction Government are pulled together and presented by BARRICADA with ever-increasing good judgment.

Its condemnation of the plight of the workers and the living conditions of our people is presented in such a way as to constitute an important element in the formation of class consciousness.

BARRICADA has grown, but it has a long road to travel to meet the demands which the unfolding revolution is placing and will continue to place on the press and on revolutionary journalism.

In this sense it is necessary to become more and more closely linked with the people's affairs. It is necessary to strengthen ourselves ideologically and politically in order to face the situations which arise. But it is also necessary to establish clear guidelines and specific objectives for every area in which our newspaper is called upon to exert an influence.

The Moral Stimulation of the Sandinists

We wish, finally, on this day and before all of you to give recognition to the great merit of the comrades who are spurred on by their work in the Sandinist system. Moral political recognition is not related to any material thing. For the revolutionary, knowing the appreciation, the sympathy and the acceptance he enjoys among his comrades-in-arms is worth millions of times more than any luxury article because Sandinist morality has no price and because the recognition of the vanguard and of the people will go down in history; one generation can die and others can be born, but the example, the qualities and the teachings will always remain in the hearts of the people and the nations as something inextinguishable, like an eternal flame which always lights the beautiful road of the revolution.

FREE ENTERPRISE COMPARED TO SOCIALISM, FOUND LACKING

Managua BARRICADA in Spanish 10, 12 Jul 80

[Text] One of the arguments most frequently voiced by the Right is the allegedly greater efficiency of the "free enterprise" system compared to centralized planning. It is argued that economic incentive within the capitalist market makes for a more efficient utilization and assignment of resources. Individuals and businesses react more rapidly within a "free" market structure than within a heavy bureaucratic machinery.

It is held, in addition, that the state is by nature a "poor administrator," from whence it is inferred as a logical conclusion that the greater quota of economic activity should belong to the private sector. It is also maintained that even the socialist countries are "resorting at full speed to capitalist techniques in the administration of state enterprises." The obvious conclusion to be drawn from the foregoing would be that socialism is an inefficient economic system. Naturally, no intelligent reactionary would support a return to an absolute "laissez-faire" system. For obvious reasons it is accepted that the state looks after the "common interest" and intervenes in the economy through indirect mechanisms which correct the "imperfections" of the market system.

If we try to make a comparative analysis of the two different economic systems, it is easy to conclude that the socialist system--although by no means perfect--is more efficient than the capitalist system. The variables at the macrosocial level would be: the rate of economic growth, rates of unemployment and inflation, redistribution of income, education and health.

With respect to economic growth, any serious economists recognizes that in general the rates of economic growth of the socialist countries are greater than those of the capitalist countries. In 1917 U.S. production was 8 times that of Russia; at present, according to TIME magazine, USSR production is 60 percent that of the United States. This last figure is also deceiving, since the Soviets do not include services in what they call the "Net Material Product." It must be remembered also that the USSR was devastated by World War II, while the United States was economically favored by the war, which provided it with a way out of the crisis of the 1930's. Between 1953 and 1979 the Soviet economy grew at an average rate of 8 percent, while the American economy grew at a rate of 4 percent. For 1980, UNCTAD estimates that the socialist countries will have an average growth rate of 4.1 percent. The capitalist countries will be lucky if they achieve zero growth rate; more probably, with the present recession, it will be on the negative side. Bergson, a rightist American economist, admits that generally the economic growth rates of the USSR average 3 percent higher than the American rates.

Should any reader wonder, then, why the United States is the richest country on earth, before answering he would have to analyze imperialism to explain the phenomenon. In any case, the comparative analysis of its production with respect to the USSR cannot be limited simply to saying that the United States produces more; it is necessary to view that tendency historically. On the one hand, it is obvious that compared to 1917, the supremacy of American production has decreased constantly, and on the other, while the socialist economy maintains self-sustained rates of growth, the cyclic crises of imperialism occur with increasing frequency and greater intensity and are so complex that the solution to them is ever further from the old formulas of the bourgeois economy.

Marxism recognizes that capitalism develops the productive forces of a society in an enormous way. In the United States capitalism has constructed an incredible productive capacity, but it has become enmeshed in the unavoidable contradictions of the system. That is why, although in 1917 the United States produced 8 times the production of the Soviet Union, that difference has been cut dramatically by the greater growth rates of the Soviet economy.

Many capitalist economists like to mention the experiences of the FRG and of Japan, countries which achieved high growth rates in the 1950's and 1960's. Obviously capitalism has been capable, and not only in that era, of achieving high rates of development in some countries, but sooner or later its inevitable contradictions emerge, as is happening right now with the worldwide capitalist recession. Moreover, it should be remembered that Germany as well as Japan were favored by the immense influx of funds from the Marshall Plan, something which did not happen either with the USSR or with Eastern Europe.

[Text] The socialist economies do not suffer from the cyclic crises of capitalism. They are economies without either inflation or unemployment, and with a stable balance of payments. The capitalist countries, on the other hand, have fallen into the trap of stagflation (inflation with recession and unemployment). If they attack inflation, they aggravate unemployment, and vice versa. The capitalist economic policy is the policy of "stretch and shrink," of "accelerate and brake." If there is strong inflation, they brake the economy, which aggravates unemployment; then they accelerate, aggravating inflation, and the cycle is repeated indefinitely. Because of this "accelerate and brake" policy, the rates of economic development of the capitalist countries are constantly lower than those in the socialist countries.

Nor do the so-called "market economies" have overseas equilibrium. There are always countries which are behind and those which are ahead in their balance of payments, and this, with the fluctuation in foreign exchange, gives way to instability in exchange rates and uncertainty in international trade. In socialism, on the other hand, foreign trade is planned and the balances of payments are balanced.

Regarding unemployment, it is already well known that this is a problem inherent in the capitalist countries. At present the United States has an unemployment rate of around 8 percent; on the other hand, with respect to the USSR, the same reactionary magazine, TIME, in its 23 June edition, states that "without any doubt, scarcity of labor is a serious problem in all sectors of the Soviet economy." Although its language is distorted, the aforementioned magazine clearly accepts the existence of full employment in the Soviet economy. At the same time, inflation is practically nonexistent in planned economies, because of price control as well as control of currency. Some reactionary economists have maintained that although open inflation does not exist in the socialist countries, there is "hidden inflation." This theory of "hidden" inflation in the socialist countries is false, because the percentage of goods and services sold on the so-called parallel, or black, market is not significant.

It is frequently said that the capitalist market is a more efficient system for the allocation of resources. Such statements, however, do not indicate what type of market is meant. The same bourgeois economists specify several market structures in perfect competition: oligopolistic, monopolistic, etc. When they exalt capitalism, they do it under the supposition that it functions as a "perfectly competitive" market. However, the unavoidable fact about capitalism is the predominance of oligopolies and monopolies. And when monopolies predominate in the economy, when the big fish have swallowed up the little fish, in no way can it be said that the capitalist market is an efficient way to allocate resources. Even within the bourgeois economic theory it is widely accepted that the dominance of a few enterprises in the market does not lead to an efficient allocation of resources. Naturally, what the bourgeois theory can never accept is that monopolization of the economy is an unavoidable law of capitalism.

In the socialist countries, income is more justly distributed, and education and health are completely free. In the capitalist countries there is unequal distribution of income and in some, health and education are a shameful business. Even dying can be extremely expensive in the United States.

It is undeniable that there is bureaucracy in socialism, but the bureaucracy is not exclusively a problem of this system. It flourishes equally in capitalist countries and even in big private corporations. Bureaucratic inertia in the private sector is partly responsible for the deep crisis in the American automobile industry, which was unable to adapt itself in time to the energy crisis.

It can also be accepted that the bureaucratic problem is a little more serious in the planned economies, but balancing out the pluses and minuses, the result is always favorable to the centrally planned economies.

The socialist states are not "poor administrators." On the contrary. Socialism represents the overcoming of the contradictions of capitalism. It is for this reason that in planned economies there is no inflation, unemployment of imbalance in overseas payments, and in general they show greater rates of development than those of the capitalist countries. The economic incentive also exists in socialism, and this does not mean that they are "resorting to capitalism techniques in the administration of state enterprises." It is simply that the Marxist principle of "to each according to his work"--which is the same as saying "to each according to his productivity"--is being applied. The essential thing in socialism is the socialization of the means of production, and it can perfectly well use--in addition to moral incentives--economic incentives which raise productivity.

PROGRESS OF AGRICULTURAL DEVELOPMENT PROJECTS NOTED

Managua BARRICADA in Spanish 26 Jul 80 pp 3, 8

[Text] The existence of a coordinating council capable of bringing state agencies together with those of the rural workers is a qualitative step in the revolutionary process. The BND [National Development Bank], INRA [National Institute for Agrarian Reform], PROCAMPO [Peasant Development Program] MIPLAN [Ministry of Planning], ENABAS [National Staple Foods Enterprise] and ATC [Association of Rural Workers] are represented in the National Assembly of Small and Medium Producers.

In practice, these entities function in Departmental Committees of Small and Medium Producers and are coordinated by a National Committee. The purpose of the assembly held in Managua was to evaluate its objectives, which are: 1) to express solidarity with the first anniversary of the Sandinist Revolution; 2) to initiate efforts to facilitate the harvest for the small producers (which, it is predicted, will be very large); and 3) to discuss policies and mechanisms for the late harvest.

It is well to summarize the presentations of the representatives of the BND, PROCAMPO and ATC and of Commander of the Revolution Jaime Wheelock, since they outline the present situation of this agricultural and livestock sector.

National Development Bank

The credit granted by the BND has contributed to the incorporation into production of areas which have historically been left out. In this respect credit must be considered a political fact. The BND has granted credit for 1980 as follows:

Producers	Credit	Percentage
More than 50 manzanas	1,900,000 cordobas	46.3
Less than 50 manzanas	1,006,000 cordobas	24
Small producers and associations	1,153,306 cordobas	29.7

If we take into consideration that in 1977 the state granted the small producers only 9.4 percent of the credit, the change in the social composition of agricultural and livestock production becomes apparent. The credit, which was easily granted to the small producers and associations, has evidently been a dynamic factor for this year's harvest.

The BND has also generated a change in its policy. This change involves 526 agencies, the Air Bank of the Atlantic Coast (with 8 new agencies) and 12 million cordobas granted for recovery of the coffee production industry.

The small producers' debt has been restructured (avoiding its cancellation and the harmful expectations which this might have caused), and that restructuring was as follows: The interest on the debt was cancelled to 30 May and the entire debt was restructured at the following new rates and terms:

Sandinist Agricultural Cooperatives	at 7 percent for 15 years.
Credit and Service Cooperatives	at 8 percent for 12 years.
Small Individual Producers	at 11 percent for 10 years.

PROCAMPO

PROCAMPO has provided this process with its technical assistance for development. A current of new and proven technical know-how has begun to flow to the small and medium producers.

Rural development and agrarian reform require technical as well as political education; apolitical technical assistance does not solve social problems. PROCAMPO considers training a revolutionary task through which the technicians, who impart the knowledge, must increase their efforts to learn about the elements of the revolution.

Technical assistance contributed by PROCAMPO to the small and medium producers for 1980 is as follows:

Classification	Manzanas	Estimated No. of Quintals
Corn	148,484	4,000,000
Beans	8,916	104,000
Rice	19,606	526,000
Sorghum	3,964	177,000
Cotton	8,563	(no estimate)
Coffee (33 percent of national production)	34,600	40,000 (gold quintals)

Association of Rural Workers

The speech by Wilberto Lara, national production secretary of the ATC, and that given by Commander of the Revolution Jaime Wheelock were the most applauded of the assembly. In them, criticism, self-criticsm and a high degree of class awareness (which occasionally gave them a belligerent tone) combined to hold the audience's attention.

Comrade Lara pointed out one fact that clearly reflects the great steps made by our rural workers in organizing and responding to the call of our vanguard: the feverish agitation which in July moved all the countryside, all the rank and file agencies of the ATC (union as well as cooperative) to hold hundreds of commitment assemblies, evaluating their work and setting goals to be achieved by each worker.

"Today the rural workers are learning what it means to participate in the administration of all the people's wealth, and although we have only taken the first tottering steps (because this is so new), the results are encouraging. For the first time we are questioning, evaluating, recognizing the mistakes, making formal commitments."

He emphasized as one of the most significant achievements of the ATC, the great response of the small producers in forming cooperatives, and that this response is only one example of the rallying power of the FSLN [Sandinist Front for National Liberation] and of the great prestige it enjoys in rural areas.

Concerning the fear that the cooperatives will become isolated and remain outside of the APP [Area of People's Property] and be a negative factor in labor, he pointed out that many of them have set volunteer work on the APP farms as a goal. Although this appears to be a small detail, it reflects the confidence of the workers in the leadership of the vanguard and in the work of the new revolutionary state.

The ATC admits--and clearly--that many credit and service cooperatives do not actually function as cooperatives. There is the will, the disposition and a great eagerness to become better organized, but there is still much work to be done before that will and disposition are translated into solid cooperatives.

The ATC has made some demands on the various state organizations. It asked that PROCAMPO "give real technical assistance and not limit itself to the distribution of goods and funds. Proper utilization and, in the last analysis, the acquisition of credit depend on this."

He called upon the comrades who are technicians to go to the cooperatives, however far away they may be and no matter how bad the roads are and "to learn from the practical experience of the farmers and to have the willingness and humility to combine their technical knowledge with that experience."

He admitted that many times credit has been distributed carelessly, but he said that complaining does not accomplish anything and that the BND must learn to propose concrete alternatives--to be creative and not simply passive. The ATC has proposed the establishment of savings accounts in the BND agencies, where the cooperatives can deposit their funds so that they can withdraw them from time to time according to their actual needs.

He demanded greater efficiency from ENABAS, better planning of supply in rural areas and better coordination in sales; "we cannot continue to function with improvisation and last minute decisions in such a vital area of the life of our cooperatives."

As a concrete result of the organizational achievements and of the awareness of the small producers, this first year they organized the Sandinist Agricultural Cooperatives, in which the small producers have broken through the barriers to work their plots collectively, socializing their means of production and their work.

To guarantee that these cooperatives become an example for all the farming population, he demanded greater attention from state agencies because one of the most important achievements of our cooperative organization is at stake in the CAS [Sandinist Agricultural Cooperatives].

Commander of the Revolution Jaime Wheelock

Commander Wheelock began by congratulating the best Departmental Committees. He recognized their capacity to deal with the problems, their coordination with the National Committee and their compliance, discipline and assistance. The committees so recognized were: Leon, Managua, Nueva Segovia and Chontales.

He defined the assembly as an important milestone in the process, since it shows how the revolution is solving, in a collective way, the problems of the small producers. He emphasized the importance of the fact that over 12,000 manzanas are under the control of INRA and that while the initial agrarian reform was insufficient (given the anarchical geographical distribution and the diversity in the degree of infrastructure), the committees are looking for an overall solution to the problem.

He defined the associations movement as a revolution in the rural area. In Nicaragua today there are some 2,500 associations (which means 70,000 heads of families) on 130,000 manzanas, and while it must be admitted that in many cases these associations are informal, we must struggle to consolidate all that associative effort, because it is that base which must be strengthened.

The double economic structure (export-import) poses a problem for the cooperatives. It is necessary to have plenty of labor in the cotton, coffee and sugarcane areas. The contradiction of excessive credit, shortages of labor and small credit, and the weakening of the cooperatives, must be very well managed. The success of our agricultural cycle may reside in the proper balancing of this contradiction.

Commander Wheelock stated that if there is anyone heroic, anyone who struggled and was historically exploited, it is the farmer and semiproletarian, and his just claims to the land are well recognized. Concerning the list, to be made up by UPANIC, of certain confiscations which are to be reviewed, he promised that not a single inch of land will be returned; furthermore, he announced that a law is being studied whereby the revolution, or the peasants, could make use of any land which is not under production.

He ended his speech by suggesting the need for the revolutionary state to grow, and noted that this could be done in two ways: through increasing the foreign debt (which is going to have to be done, inevitably, but to the smallest extent possible) or through effort itself, through increased productivity. He called on the workers' sense of responsibility to increase productivity and said it was not possible to keep workers who only work 3 or 4 hours a day.

After 19 July, and as our greatest tribute to our revolution, we will begin to work under emergency conditions to solve, by every available means, the problem of productivity.

ARGENTINA'S CAMILLION INTERVIEWED ON RELATIONS WITH BRAZIL, BOLIVIA

Rio de Janeiro O GLOBO in Portuguese 11 Aug 80 p 8

[Interview with the Argentine Ambassador Oscar Camillion, in Brasilia on 10 August]

[Text] In an interview granted yesterday, Argentine Ambassador Oscar Camillion officially affirmed that the government to replace that of President Jorge Rafael Videla will pursue a policy of rapprochement with Brazil. As stated, the fact that the current president is nearing the end of his term of office in no way minimizes the significance of the visit he will pay to Brazil beginning 19 August.

The incoming government, he added, will essentially pursue Argentina's present foreign policy course, an outstanding characteristic of which is cooperation with Brazil.

Although Argentine diplomats have revealed some misgivings regarding "ideological disturbances" in Latin America, this will not restrict rapprochement with Brazil. In Camillion's opinion, ideological factors have no major significance in the relationship between the two countries.

Although it is only 3 months since President Joao Figueiredo's visit to Buenos Aires, the Argentine ambassador declared that "in addition to the simple rapprochement policy, there is now enough subject matter to warrant another presidential meeting."

Ideological Factors

[Question] The Argentine Foreign Ministry has shown considerable concern regarding "ideological disturbances" in Latin America. Will this be one of the topics of discussion between the governments of the two countries during President Videla's visit?

[Answer] The relationship between Argentina and Brazil is basically sound at the governmental level. Diplomatic procedures are now seeking to establish conditions for a permanent relationship based on the respective national interests and on the concept that rational cooperation is capable of furthering such interests. A concept such as this, while not losing sight of the stability and continuity of the states' interests, transcends any circumstantial political situation of the moment.

In the period in which we are living, there is a tendency to confine the study of these interests to a specific region. The superpowers themselves are continental regions which operate within regional limits. The defense of similar interests is also being undertaken, for example, among Arab countries and, to some extent, among African nations. The logical conclusion from this is for South America to study its problems from an increasingly regional point of view. This is promoted by both economic and political reasons, insofar as well-advised activities strengthen the trading capacity of both the region and of the countries within these areas. I would venture to point out that the plan drawn up by the two foreign ministries attributes no major significance to ideological factors. The countries' personal interests determine practical and tough positions on any form of automatic alignment.

[Question] Both foreign ministries have repeatedly denied any plan to negotiate a South Atlantic defense pact. In any case, Brazil and Argentina have extensive coastlines to be defended. How do these two countries intend to promote the safety of this region?

[Answer] It is obvious that for countries such as Brazil and Argentina the South Atlantic is of far greater importance than the Indian Ocean and the North Sea. It is also clear that insofar as our seacoasts jut out into the South Atlantic, the defense of their seas poses a problem for each government. It is not merely an abstract problem, if it is borne in mind that both Brazil and Argentina have to sustaintiate their positions within the context of the [Law of the] Sea Conference, both regarding territorial waters and the area of exclusive economic interests. As a matter of pressing concern, the defense also includes the preservation of natural resources, marine wealth and the substratum. The natural conclusion, then, is that the specific area of naval operations should be, as it always has been, the South Atlantic.

As regards maritime defense of the area, I believe that it is primarily a national objective for which the Armed Forces are mainly responsible. This duty, however, is not incompatible with professional maneuvers between the two friendly navies, which have many experiences to exchange. In their conversations with one another, the two countries have never specifically discussed negotiating a pact and both the respective foreign ministries and the Armed Forces have steered clear of the subject.

No Interfering

[Question] How does the Argentine Embassy view the possibility of President Vidal's visit becoming the target of unfavorable demonstrations?

[Answer] This subject is somewhat fanciful. I think that the rules that normally prevail during a head of state's visit stem neither from diplomacy nor politics but rather from courtesy. Knowing the Brazilian nation as a people, I consider far-fetched the idea that there could occur any unfriendly demonstrations against the representative of the Argentine people's government. I believe that groups which give vent to their biased viewpoints toward a foreign country are, in fact, assuming deplorable obtrusive positions in areas which do not concern them. I believe that this practice should be done away with once and for all in Latin American countries which are historically most persistent in rejecting interfering in their domestic problems. No one is in a position to teach anyone a lesson.

[Question] Has the Argentine Embassy already taken steps to help locate the Argentine priest, Jorge Adur, who is said to have disappeared in Brazil?

[Answer] There is no record whatsoever, either through official channels or through ecclesiastical channels of this priest's whereabouts in Brazil.

[Question] How are we to interpret the dispatch with which the Argentine government decided to return President Figueiredo's visit to Buenos Aires, made only 3 months ago?

[Answer] That is due to the fact that the two parties found it expedient to pursue the Buenos Aires conversations immediately. It was also taken into consideration that on reorganizing the Argentine government, they would need time to define their priorities. As a rule, no new president travels immediately after taking office. This makes the date set for the Argentine president's visit to Brazil a suitable one, even though we are practically on the eve of the Argentine presidential inauguration. Moreover, it is generally believed that in addition to the purely political event, there is enough material to warrant a presidential meeting.

Pertinent Points

[Answer] The two countries have given adequate proof that in diplomatic areas there exists a very favorable climate which puts an end to many seeming conflicts frequently based on misunderstandings, on the lack of communication or merely on the lack of information from both sides. It is a well-established fact that in responsible diplomatic areas and in broad terms there is today a very constructive climate for the rational analysis of mutual concerns. Confidence on the government level has broadened its range to include technical areas such as commerce, finances, science and technology. I feel sure that it will also extend to the areas of the arts and intellectual creativity. I would say that this is a vital political fact which is strengthened in meetings such as this one.

[Question] If we consider that President Videla is at the end of his term of office, what assurances have we that the next Argentine government continue this climate of rapprochement with Brazil?

[Answer] I have every reason to believe very firmly that the international policy of the next Argentine government, no matter who the next president may be, will follow the present lines, not only because it can be reasonably considered a practical, overt line, but especially because it was not the decision of one isolated person. It is obvious that President Videla has been very decisive regarding this global policy. However, he is part of a decision-making system where individual influence is significantly low. International policy, in particular, has resulted from agreements among pertinent sectors of Argentine power. The next government will also be the expression of this system. It is to be expected that he will here embody certain nuances indicative of his own personal style, but it stands to reason to presume that the basic lines--from among which emanated the policy with Brazil--will be maintained.

Preference

[Question] How do you explain that President Videla has stated that he prefers the present government in Bolivia to that which was elected by popular vote?

[Answer] A long historical experience with neighboring countries arouses in us an instinctive liking for the government which is now in power because we must establish relations with the neighboring countries. Unfortunately, in Latin America's present phase, there does not exist, as a rule, a 100-percent guarantee of stability. In this case, the only choice the government has is to accept things as they actually are beyond their own borders. As far as I can recall, all the changes undergone in the Bolivian proceedings gave grounds for suspecting interference, owing to the affinity demonstrated by more powerful neighboring and nonneighboring countries. This happened, for example in 1944 and in 1952 when General Barrientos overthrew Paz Estensoro, when Barrientos died and so on one after the other. I believe that a good plausible assumption would be to think that the facts of Bolivian history concern, first of all, the Bolivian people, their social, economic conditions and the interests of the country. That is the present situation. No one, in fact, has the right to say that he likes or does not like a particular country. This would be conducive to subjecting international relations among states, which are permanent, to critical phases caused by foreign domestic policy regarding which no one, as a last resort, is in a position to intervene. The only sound rule in international policy is simply to accept events within other nations' boundaries as they occur. Otherwise, international policy would, as a last resort, become subject to discontinuous procedures and disguised party maneuvers involving interfering mechanisms.

[Question] On the economic level, how will the transformation of the Latin American Free Trade Association (LAFTA) into the Latin American Integration Association (LAIA) improve trade between Brazil and Argentina?

[Answer] It was evident that the multilateral mechanisms based on the compulsory use of the most-favored nation stipulation had petered out. The joint objective to organize a free-trade zone became paralyzed immediately after its first and only meeting. Reforms which attempted to internationalize the Caracas protocol were restricted to postponing the initial time limits. It was, therefore, concluded that the multiplication of trade lines is practicable only through the establishment of nonextendable bilateral mechanisms. The experiment showed that many bilateral concessions failed because of the obligation to extend privileges to all members of the organization. Consequently, from now on it will be stipulated that countries grant trade-promoting concessions based on better-adjusted estimates, transacted on a bilateral basis.

EFFECTS OF CANCELLATION OF BOWDLER VISIT VIEWED

[Article by Pascual Albanese: "Umbra in Relations With Washington"]

[Text] U.S. Ambassador Raul Castro moved up his return to the United States, which he had delayed because of the canceled visit to Buenos Aires of William Bowdler, deputy undersecretary of state for Latin American affairs, whose trip was undoubtedly postponed in keeping with the State Department's annoyance at Argentina for having been the first country in the world to recognize the new Bolivian military regime.

Before leaving, Castro himself acknowledged that the cancellation of the trip caused a "momentary interruption" in the bilateral relations and a "certain resentment" on the part of the Argentine Government, which officially chose not to give out any information about the episode; all information given to the news media had only one source, the U.S. Embassy.

Simultaneously, diplomatic sources in Washington, whose opinions were transmitted by UPI, insisted on alluding to Argentina's alleged official support for the overthrow of President Lidia Gueiler. A UPI cable went so far as to hazard the opinion that "although it has not been confirmed, the most specific rumors in this regard indicate that Argentine military transport planes took quantities of food to the Bolivian soldiers."

As a matter of fact, Castro's return implies that the United States has no ambassador to Argentina. The arrival of Klaus Ruser, who was left in charge of the diplomatic legation, does not fill the void since, although he is an experienced official, the rank of ambassador is lacking from a protocol standpoint.

In this context, the system of bilateral consultation established at the time of the "Goodpaster mission" would seem to be about to collapse. Amidst the internal wrangling among factions in the State Department, the new situation could very well be used to advantage by "hard-line" partisans with reference to the Argentine leaders. This "hard-line" sector which may recover the ground lost during the last few months.

James Carter is faced with a serious dilemma. To appoint a new ambassador over the short term would be interpreted as a sign of thawing at a time when U.S. diplomacy is exerting all its influence to create a "cordon sanitaire" around Bolivia with the efficient cooperation of the Andean Pact nations. In turn, to leave the embassy vacant until after the presidential elections in November would mean opening the gap for the dreaded penetration of the USSR, a point about which Washington has become even more sensitive since the visit of Yuriy Fokin, secretary general of the Soviet foreign ministry.

Therefore, an unknown factor which is difficult to determine is whether the cooling off in relations will or will not last until October, at which time the OAS General Assembly will discuss the report of the Inter-American Commission on Human Rights pertaining to Argentina, an issue which is now dormant but which, under these conditions, may be resurrected.

Apparently, the development of the Bolivian case will have considerable influence on clearing up the impasse. Nevertheless, one thing is clear: Although in January of this year official spokesman enthusiastically declared that in the future Argentine-U.S. relations would be analyzed before and after Goodpaster's visit, there is no doubt that it will now be necessary to speak of our ties with the United States before and after Bowdler's "nonvisit."

PURPOSE OF SOVIET SECRETARY'S VISIT DISCUSSED

Buenos Aires CONVICCION in Spanish 30 Jul 80 p 11

[Article by Martin Olivera]

[Text] With the same secrecy with which it began--in fact, with which it was planned--the visit of Yuriy Fokin, secretary general of the Soviet Foreign Ministry, to Buenos Aires took place yesterday as scheduled.

Curiously, neither the San Martin Palace nor the Soviet Embassy nor the National Atomic Energy Commission (CNEA), which the Soviet official was to visit, added any information yesterday to the brief reference to the visit made on Monday.

According to that brief reference, the Kremlin diplomat had arrived in Buenos Aires for the purpose of talking about the agenda of the next meeting of the United Nations, as has been traditionally done for the last several years.

Since no one could recall such an event--without exception, none of the sources contacted by CONVICCION believes that these meetings are traditional--Soviet spokesmen asserted yesterday that not only are such meetings customary but that, moreover, one of these diplomatic exchanges resulted in getting the Soviets to support the appointment, at that time, of Ambassador Ortiz de Rozas as chairman of the disarmament conference.

To be precise, the Soviets are now saying, the principal reason for Fokin's visit to Argentina is to obtain our country's support for the next disarmament project which the Warsaw Pact will present to the UN General Assembly in September 1980.

The sources stressed that this procedure is customary when it is a question of meetings with friendly countries.

Another semiofficial reason for the trip was to discuss the next meeting of the Nonproliferation Treaty Conference (TNP)--since the USSR might also begin to supply Argentina with enriched uranium--in which connection Fokin reportedly had plans to meet with the CNEA leadership.

On this point there is such a lack of information that it was not possible to ascertain whether the meetings did in fact take place along with the publicized trip through Atucha. When asked, the CNEA turned people over to the Foreign Ministry. At the San Martin Palace they kindly said that they knew nothing.

Nevertheless, a precedent was set in Brazil, where Fokin officially discussed the subject of nuclear energy. It is almost certain that he came to Argentina with the same proposal, and it is certain that the cancellation of William Bowdler's visit may have greatly facilitated his task.

Another point which may have held more interest for Fokin, in view of Bowdler's attitude, is the provision of turbines for Yacyreta where, at present, the American firm Allis Chalmers appears to be the sure winner. It is probable that Fokin is now thinking in terms of the weakening of Washington-Buenos Aires relations and trying to offer some advantages for strengthening Buenos Aires-Moscow relations, which are in a state of steady growth.

Lastly, and although it has not been said officially, certain parties connected with the Soviet circle have acknowledged that a subject of special interest to Fokin is the regional situation and particularly Bolivia's future.

According to these reports, the Kremlin has come to the conclusion that the international isolation with which General Garcia Meza's government is being faced and will be faced may facilitate a Moscow-La Paz dialog, which would fit in with the Soviet strategy of broadening its presence in Latin America.

Again according to those spokesmen, Fokin has allegedly stated that Moscow's position toward the coup d'etat is similar to that of Buenos Aires, since the doctrine it supports is very much like the Estrada doctrine. In other words, conditions are propitious for Moscow to recognize La Paz.

What the Kremlin wants to be assured of is that Garcia Meza will extend his hand toward the communist capital. Judging by the Soviet sources, Fokin will leave Buenos Aires with "his mission accomplished."

PAPER LAUDS NEW GOVERNMENT ATTITUDE TOWARD MIDDLE EAST

[Text] Reports from Jerusalem last week indicated that the Israeli minister of industry, commerce and tourism, who was then in Buenos Aires, had informed the Jewish press that Argentina would not recognize the Palestine Liberation Organization (PLO), he had been told by Foreign Minister Carlos Washington Pastor. This statement was not denied by the San Martin Palace. Argentina, that source said, reiterating the words of our foreign minister, "will only support the moderate Palestinian leaders on the West Bank and in Gaza."

The source of this report and the fact that it was not corrected or challenged in official circles reveal that an attitude has been adopted which in many ways will contribute to clarifying the Argentine policy on the Middle East. Despite the intensive and increasing trade links, including sales of military equipment between Israel and Argentina, our country's conduct in the Arab-Israeli conflict has not always taken on the clear profile which it should have, despite the close relations existing between the Arab terrorist organizations and the subversive leaders, wanted because of their crimes by the courts in our country. It is known moreover that the PLO, which includes various Moslem terrorist groups, is the support center for dozens of organizations in many parts of the world which have the responsibility, as a part of a concerted plan, for destroying political stability in the West. A short time ago we referred to a report provided by the British writer Robert Moss, to the effect that in the PLO training camps contingents of guerrilla fighters from many countries, including, among others, many Argentines in the Montonero group, are continuing to be trained.

The existence of these links, known to our authorities, made the Argentine foreign policy in the Levant, as revealed in many of the votes within the United Nations, difficult to understand.

The announcement that Argentina will not recognize the PLO might prove an encouraging indication if it were followed by other steps designed to establish the conduct to be pursued by our country in some realms of international policy more precisely. We are referring in particular to our continued participation in the group of nonalined countries headed by Fidel Castro, despite profound differences with the majority of the nations it includes and in violation of the "Western and Christian" characteristics so often mentioned in official speeches as distinguishing Argentina.

The attitude announced by Argentina, according to the report from Jerusalem, came a few days after the vote in the UN on a resolution demanding that Israel withdraw, prior to 15 November, from all the Arab territories occupied since the "6-day war," but without the guarantee as provided in earlier documents of this highest international body of "safe and recognized frontiers," i.e. in substance recognition of the state by the countries of the Arab world. It is remarkable that this UN vote coincides with the resolution adopted by the PLO at its last meeting in Damascus reiterating its decision to take over the whole of the territory of Palestine, including Israel, by means of acts of war and extermination. The vote in Damascus marks the finish of Arafat's "mannerly" campaign in the European foreign ministries with a view to winning diplomatic status. The UN resolution to which we refer calls for the surrender of the "irredentist" territories to the government of the PLO.

It is on this point precisely that the new Argentine attitude takes on its true value as a promise of correction, with the statement that there will be no recognition of the PLO and the issuance of support of only "moderate Palestinian leaders on the West Bank and in Gaza."

The new attitude of the Argentine Foreign Ministry on the Middle East conflict would seem to be oriented toward other consistent steps, in view of the fact that the former laborite prime minister of Israel, Itzhak Rabin, was invited to speak at the national military college this week by the general staff of the Argentine army.

Confirming its known position on the matter, the Socialist International, in which Israel participates, has condemned Rabin's decision to accept the invitation extended. There can be no doubt of the "foundation" for the resolution by the International, attacking the attitude adopted by some of its members with regard to the Argentine Montoneros and their support of the cause of the PLO as the "true representative of the Palestinian people." Thus the Socialist International remains faithful to its pattern of promoting the prestige of two preserves of socialism, one with democratic roots in Europe and another with shades ranging between populism and authoritarianism outside the old continent. It is not then so much an inconsistency as a tactic within the framework of a strategy designed to compete for "customers" and weight with communism in some key regions of the world.

CAUTION URGED TOWARD PROPOSED CHANGES IN URUGUAY'S CONSTITUTION

Buenos Aires LA PRENSA in Spanish 28 Jul 80 p 6

[Editorial: "Uruguayan Political Institutions"]

[Text] Since the beginning of its independence, the neighboring republic of Uruguay has been characterized by its struggles in defense of freedom and by the consolidation of its democratic institutions. Law and justice have protected all its residents equally, and they have provided protection and security for many foreigners who, due to in insurmountable political contingencies, had to leave their native land, almost always as victims of cruel persecution. This explains why, after the vicissitudes the neighboring country underwent in the not-too-distant past as a result of subversive and terrorist action, the American community in particular feels the weight of the problems which afflict that country as though they were its own.

The preceding makes observers all the more certain that Uruguayan political institutions will continue to be an exponent of these noble traditions. Moreover, this is borne out by efforts being made by the most influential civic groups in the country to prevent certain announced constitutional reforms from weakening the republican and democratic principles which have governed its institutional development for many decades. Recent information confirms the undesirable nature of the changes proposed by official spheres as well as the resistance those changes have encountered from almost all sectors of the population.

Opposition to the new constitution is particularly directed toward the guidelines for the establishment of a collegiate organization which would control all government bodies, with the functions of a constitutional tribunal. The Blanco Party has declared that the tribunal plan "attacks the republican essence of the system" and that it would be "a veritable supergovernment which would lord over the entire administration with universal powers and with no one to control its actions." Such a tribunal "is absolutely inadmissible" and "without precedent in the constitutional law of the democratic world. With this reform, it adds, "very little would remain of the separation of powers—the foundation of Uruguayan constitutionalism—due to the prevalence of an all-encompassing executive branch and to the reduction of parliamentary power to an extreme minimum." Morover, the proposal would "greatly interfere with the longstanding and untouchable judicial branch."

The constitutional tribunal would not be elected but, rather, appointed from among "important people" by the president and congress, based on the need to increase the powers of the executive branch "so that it may conduct government policy." A few weeks ago, the Christian Democratic Party published a statement rejecting the constitutional proposal at the same time that leaders of the Colorado Party criticized the principal aspects of that initiative. If we consider that the "blancos" and "colorados" together received 85 percent of the votes in the last elections held in Uruguay 9 years ago, it is easy to infer that the proposed reform is rejected by the majority of the citizenry.

According to the provisions of "Institutional Act No 2" of 1976, the reform plan must be drawn up by the 25-member State Council and subsequently submitted to a group consisting of the president, his ministers, government advisers and 28 active duty generals of the armed forces. If the proposal to establish the above collegiate body goes through, a new obstacle could arise with regard to the political opening announced by the government a few days ago and which led to the authorization of a meeting of 50 leaders of the Colorado Party aimed at initiating the party's internal reorganization.

More than once we have given credit where credit is due to the current Uruguayan leaders for firmly repelling extremist activity and with equal resolution confronting the guerrillas, who constitute one of the most powerful and well-trained subversive organizations in Latin America. For that same reason, we are assuming that their new measures will be within the scope of political efforts aimed at safeguarding the essential powers of the democratic institutions. The concept of establishing superstate organizations with the function of controlling or watching over the constitutional exercise of public administration is not compatible with the requirements of the political evolution now underway.

COMMUNISTS TO REORIENT LABOR-RELATED ACTIVITIES

Buenos Aires CONVICCION in Spanish 31 Jul 80 p 10

[Text] The fact that Athos Fava has become secretary general of the Argentine Communist Party [PCA] signals the arrival of a veteran union leader to the decisionmaking ranks of that political organization. This event, far from being fortuitous, is apparently in keeping with a bolder strategy of intervention in the current phase.

An event which would endorse this orientation would be the failure to promote the other strong candidate, Oscar Arevalo, who had cleared a significant path for himself in that party by residing in Europe for several years as an official of the CPSU.

When Arevalo returned to Argentina and was chosen by the 12th Communist Party Congress held in May 1963 to conduct a new "cadre school" for the organization, many of his peers did not know about his achievements; that factor weighed heavily in the election finally held.

However, according to some observers of the course being taken by the Argentine party, Fava's appointment is also in keeping with the need to intervene more forcefully in the Argentine labor movement.

As Fava pointed out in a brief article which appeared in the REVISTA INTERNACIONAL, "what is in a state of crisis in our country is not the need for a union or a vanguard party, the PCA, but the fact that an ideology, certain methods and nonproletarian ideas have been imposed for many years to lead the labor movement toward passivity and defeat."

Fava's ideas on trade unionism are explained in the same article, in which he also criticizes the right as well as the extreme left. "The Peronist right is trying to carry out the same role as that of European social democracy, with its own interpretation in keeping with its nationalist roots, impregnating it with middle-class nationalist ideology. However, both the old paths of reformism and middle-class nationalism, as experience shows, serve only to divide and demobilize the working class and the popular movement.

"In turn," Fava continues in the REVISTA INTERNACIONAL article, "the extreme left has shown itself to be no more than the expression of lower middle-class adventurism, and its leaders often come from the extreme right."

An Agreement

After expressing his opinion on these sectors of the political spectrum, Fava indicates that he is not in disagreement with Peronism, with which he believes it is possible to work in unison without removing its adherents from their union responsibilities.

"This does not mean," he asserts, "replacing the Peronist leaders with communists but, rather, establishing by joint agreement, from top to bottom, a unified and coherent directorate which will reflect the spirit of struggle and desires of the workers."

Fava then stresses that, with his party's leadership, "the masses will learn. The masses will learn more quickly if the PCA is at their side."

According to the new secretary general of that organization, the PCA is increasing the number of its members among the working class. "A study of the class composition of those who have joined the party in the last few years shows that about 70 percent are wage earners and that 50 percent of that group are workers."

Fava stresses that these figures "make it clear that our main concern is in building and strengthening the party in the large firm where, together with the Peronist workers, we are experiencing very difficult and complicated situations."

Fava's study does not refer to Argentina's current political situation nor to his opinion of the current government but concludes with the observation that "the PCA is at this stage the principal link which can determine the course of events, and its ability to do so will become greater as the party grows."

PERONISM SEEN AS CAUSE OF INSTABILITY

Buenos Aires LA PRENSA in Spanish 22 Aug 80 p 10

[Article by Jose Antonio Abuin: "Our Chronic Instability"]

[Text] More than 4 years have passed since the day when the armed forces decided to take over the government political posts. For the sixth time in less than half a century, the military bases and barracks opened their doors to allow the armed branch of the country to become its leading head as well.

This last assignment of functions has been deemed by some to be the cause and others the effect of the chronic instability from which we have suffered in the last half-century.

What is beyond question is that the most outstanding characteristic of this half-century has been this instability. Between 1930 and 1980 there should have been nine presidents of the republic. Instead there were 22, 13 of them provided by the army. There have been six military pronouncements and eight presidential elections. The only presidents whose authority derived from the polls and who succeeded in finishing their terms were two generals--Justo and Peron, although the latter was expelled in the midst of his second term and died in the course of the first year of his third. This serious political instability led to profound instability in all other sectors.

It can be asserted that neither the polls nor the barracks have provided us, except with an occasional honorable exception, with leaders who were equal to the needs and above all the urgent problems of the era. On the contrary, this period has been outstanding in that decisive action was taken by the worst of the examples the land of the Argentines has produced to date. I am speaking, obviously, of Peron.

It was precisely the fact that the seriousness of the subversion to which Peronism led was not understood in its full magnitude that allowed the demagogs to profit from this sea of confusion, while many of the others were not and are not successfully taking the proper steps which, in a country subject to subversion, cannot be simply administrative. In other words, one does not triumph over subversion by building a bridge, a road, or even a nuclear plant.

Peronism did not govern nor fail to govern. Its followers branded its adversaries as unpatriotic, sold out to imperialism, servants of the multinational enterprises and slaves of "international synarchy." But it was they who invaded the country and treated it like a conquered land, through the introduction of the theory and the practice of two highly subversive doctrines: first Nazi-Fascism and then communism.

These doctrines are entirely foreign to our traditions, and therefore it is pertinent to state that Peronism is entirely antinational. The whole truth is not being told, therefore, when it is said that Peronism governed badly, or even when it is said that its government was the very worst. Those who remain thus superficial reveal that they do not want to understand that Peronism, because of having pursued this intensive and extensive task of subverting the beliefs and ideas, the institutions and the life of the republic, succeeded in reestablishing anti-Argentina. It had been defeated in Mayo and in Caseros, but it surged up again, as there can be no doubt.

Peronism has always been a synonym of chaos. Under these conditions, it is more than clear that it could not govern. When Peron and his accomplices were swept out of power during the memorable days of September 1955, the country seemed to be awakening from a bad dream and it hastened jubilantly to stanch the wounds resulting from the total war Peronism had waged against its opponents, and to embark upon the path of recovery. But the evil had not been conquered, as became very clear and evident shortly thereafter.

Peron profoundly divided society and society has continued to be divided since then. This explains why it has not been possible to govern, for there is no government without society.

This, which is so basic, was not even understood by those who followed in the government of the country after 1958, that is to say for more than 20 years now. All had their plans and programs but none succeeded in carrying them out. For some this was because they compromised with Peronism and believed that they could govern thus, whereas Peronism is constitutionally incapable of making the existence of order possible, and without this, it is obvious that there can be no government. In other cases, it was because they did not or would not realize that, before even attempting to implement any program, it was absolutely indispensable to dump the ballast of Peronism, which was causing the ship to list and making it impossible to navigate.

This situation also explains why the political career of Peron was so long. It was not simply that he could win many more votes than others, for he also talked a different language and wanted things other than his antagonists did. While Peron devoted himself, constantly and in the broad light of day--for it must be admitted that he was brilliantly clear and only those who wanted to be were deceived--to the establishment of a totalitarian regime in the country, this undertaking cannot be imputed to any of the other de jure or de facto presidents, although a couple of them flirted with Marxism. We are excluding, naturally, Campora and Lastiri. But they lacked personality, and were merely agents of Peron.

The electoral process which led to the elections of March and September 1973 was a clear example. The Peronists won and what inevitably had to happen happened--the country lost. Had any of the other parties won, Peronism would not have allowed it to govern. The conclusion is that this process should not have been sponsored without first resolving the Peronist issue.

How? By revealing it for what it was. By making it clear that the Peronist doctrine is anti-Argentine. That the party was not a civic association, but a band for plundering the country. That its leaders, with their leader as their head, were with an occasional exception the very worst which could be found in any one of the sectors of the country. And that finally, it brought chaos, violence, corruption, and that it wanted to produce nothing else.

The task of enlightenment fell short in extent and the depth needed, as is revealed by the fact that so many young people believed, above all at the beginning of the present decade, that Peron could provide a solution to our evils. Precisely he who had created them.

On the other hand, if after carrying out this campaign of clarification, after having made all the necessary efforts to reeducate the Peronists, there still remained an irreducible nucleus, it is obvious that this sector could not claim any right to impose a totalitarian model on the country. The matter is the clearer if we note that, even if a majority were to propose such a thing, that majority would have to be contained to make it impossible for it to advance, thus committing real suicide for itself and for the true citizens.

Now then, Peronism continues to exist in the minds and the hearts of many people. In the projects it carried out and which have not been dismantled, and in its hopes for return. And there are many who continue to pursue the same old policy which brought so many evils to the country. For some it is because they still do not understand this reality and admit this presence, as if thereby the recovery of the republic were possible. And others, although admitting it, hope to profit from it in the coming elections, which they would like to have held as soon as possible.

The analysis of what has been done in these past 4 years should be focused mainly on this question. For it is a visceral issue and that which explains the existence of other problems. On the other hand, if attention is focused on the surface level, action in the wrong direction will continue. It is not the symptoms which should be examined, but the subversion provoked by Peronism. Until this is faced as it should be, it will be futile to try to patch up the consequences.

The mentality and the projects which represent the heritage of Peronism have prevented us from being able to emerge from decadence and build a modern country. Despite the efforts which have been made in other sectors, since the basic question has not been addressed, we have been converted into a country whose image reflects chaos and pettiness. It is this which has made possible the rude and even aggressive treatment we have received abroad.

Instead of presuming that all of this criticism is unjust and spending a great deal of money in an "attempt to reveal our true image," let us recognize that for many years we have been a people who have given rise to some leaders specializing in creating rather than resolving problems. Therefore, if indeed we have had and continue to have foreign enemies, the most numerous and fearful ones have emerged from within our society.

All of these leaders are clearly individualized. They have pursued their path and produced their works. We should feel no guilt of conscience if we eliminate them definitively from public life, for they have had their opportunity to act and they have done so, doing serious harm to the country. It is wrong to give them further opportunities.

If this is not done now, if those who worked against the country are allowed to participate in a future electoral contest, the evils in our country cannot be corrected. For the mechanism which has several times succeeded in converting the majority of our citizens into a mere flock of electoral sheep, making them believe that the important thing is that the succession of elections not be interrupted, will be put to use again.

It must be remembered that in 1976 elections were scheduled for the end of that year and that many politicians "gave assurance" that they could find the solutions to the evils plaguing the country therein. And so the regime became an electoral regime with no substance or goals other than to keep the electoral wheel turning, such that the image of the professional politician swelled to the point of covering the entire horizon. And then, inevitably, the citizen sinks to the status of a pawn of the political boss.

Since the electoral system is characterized by the effort to satisfy the greed of the voters for profit rather than the civic aspirations of the citizens, the leaders willing to function in an atmosphere so devoid of proper ethics can only be, barring some isolated exceptions, mediocre politicians seeking to achieve a constant leveling downward in order to conceal their shortcomings of all sorts. A system like this can only lead to destruction of the hierarchy, apathy, lack of discipline, chaos and decadence.

There has repeatedly been recourse to the procedure of separating professional politicians from the administration and even the discussion of public affairs. But this has not resolved the problems, because after a certain time the whole of the banned list has returned to action, which was possible because the necessary housecleaning and organization measures were not adopted.

In order to dismantle the electoral politicking system, one must begin by distorting the formula according to which "anyone can elect anyone." This is not to urge selection of the voters, but rather selection of the candidates. It simply means recalling the existence of Article 16 of the constitution. Nor would it be a bad idea for us to remember that the constitution is based on the republican system. Let us then educate the leaders and the citizens so that we can recover an effective republic. It is not as is clear a matter of "dialog" with anyone, but of proceeding along the path pointed out to us very clearly by the highest law.

Let us summarize. We must attack the causes and not simply the outer manifestations of our problems. If we do not do this now, we will be allowing another electoral process to establish in power those who will profit from the continued existence of a situation which has led us, through chaos and inefficiency, to decadence.

An assessment of what has been done and what could not be done or was not wanted in these last 4 years shows that we owe our difficulties to the Peronist legacy, which has become unmanageable and intolerable. We must rid ourselves of it to allow our society to reorganize. Otherwise, we will continue to suffer from the chronic instability which has done us so much damage.

PALADINO SEEKS DEMOCRATIZATION OF JUSTICIALIST PARTY

Buenos Aires LA PRENSA in Spanish 22 Aug 80 p 10

[Text] Mar del Plata (NA)--Jorge Paladino, formerly the personal representative of Juan Peron, has demanded the "democratization" of the Justicialist Party because he believes that this will be "a way also of contributing to the democratization of the country."

He added that "the country needs organized, orderly and disciplined but not submissive Justicialism" in order to prevent "an effort to lull or domesticate it, because politics is dynamic."

In this connection, he also urged the government "to speak clearly about this process of democratization, so that it will not be postponed indefinitely."

Paladino visited this city to appear on a television program in which he talked with journalists.

He stressed also that he still supports his "old ideas," because now "more than ever it is necessary to put them in practice," and he went on to differentiate two eras in Peronism: "that of the living Peron, and that since his death."

Democratization

"Thus I demand the democratization of my party," he said, "and the emergence of leaders, be they those now or different ones, for the democratization of Justicialism."

He came out in favor of "frank and honest dialog" but he disparaged the present discussion because he believes that dialog "must be based on honesty, on the intention to debate with the political parties, with those who can truly achieve the possibility of governing the country."

He said that "democracy is the best way of governing" and expressed the view that "the parties are the tools."

With regard to the participation of one Peronist sector in a meeting with the minister of interior, he said that he did not want to express any view "as to whether Raul Matera did well or badly in participating in the talks," but he said that "dialog should be something else, through the officials of the established parties."

As to his being invited to participate, he said that "there has recently been speculation as to whether I, in this particular case, would accept or not, but in fact they have not offered, and I want to be very honest about this."

Extremists

On the subject of the "special groups" of Peronists to which Angel Robledo recently referred and the presumed support by Peron of those responsible for the kidnaping and murder of former President Pedro Aramburu, he recalled that on that occasion "I held a press conference as Peron's representative and on his behalf, repudiated the crime."

He added that he continued for 2 more years to represent him and that "I was never dismissed."

With regard to the letter in which Peron appears to endorse the Montoneros, he said: "Well, it must be realized that the intelligence services specialized in drafting presumed letters, messages, records and other similar things by Peron."

In conclusion, Paladino maintained that "to speak the truth, one must examine how the Montoneros were organized, and the source and motivations of Palermo and the gentlemen who supported them."

ECONOMIC GROWTH FOR 1980 SET AT 5 PERCENT

Santiago TERCERA DE LA HORA in Spanish 21 Aug 80 p 10

[Text] Economists Mario Gomez, Andres Sanfuentes and Andres Passicot--the latter two are professors on the faculty of the University of Chile--agreed yesterday that national economic growth will be one-third less than originally estimated; in other words, it will not exceed 5 percent during 1980.

The professor and former head of the University's Department of Economics went even further in stating that "there is no possibility whatever" that the economy will exceed this annual growth rate over the next 3 years.

At the start of 1980, various authorities in the government and in the private sector had estimated a growth rate of 8-8.5 percent for the countries activities as a whole, with expectations "in some sectors reaching as high as 15 percent," it was admitted Tuesday of this week by the president of the SOFOFA [Industrial Development Association], Hernan Daroch.

The SOFOFA subsequently reduced its expectancy to around 6 percent. This figure has now been further reduced to 5 percent.

Andres Passicot, Mario Gomez and Andres Sanfuentes commented separately on the economy's momentum and on the related near-term forecasts, in a seminar held by the "Gemines" research firm.

Passicot said that the economic growth of the industrial, agricultural and mining sectors will be less this year than his estimated general average of 5 percent. Furthermore, the mining sector's growth will be less than 2 percent, owing mainly to lowered production of copper and coal, which will be only partially offset by higher production of oil and potassium nitrate.

The lowered growth rate in the agricultural sector, with respect to the original estimate is owing, in Passicot's opinion, to the climatic difficulties confronting this sector. It will be recalled that production and yields in 8 of the 14 traditional crops had already dropped as early as during the 1979-1980 growing season.

The economist did not go into explanatory detail regarding industry's growth drop. However, the SOFOFA's president said this week that this sector "is reaching a market saturation level" in Chile and that industries are experiencing quite some difficulty in "acquiring more consumers."

Hernan Daroch declined to identify this phenomenon as an outright recession, preferring to call it a "situation of slower growth than expected."

In contrast to the situation outlined for industry, agriculture and mining, Andres Passicot stated that the construction and services sectors--specifically transportation and trade--will experience growth rates surpassing 5 percent this year.

According to Passicot, this reduced economic growth rate for the country as a whole is explained by the fact that "the recovery in terms of real wages has about reached its termination, and real wages will now increase by (only) 7 percent annually, which is just about right," in his view.

Another factor entering into this phenomenon is that "domestic prices seem to have risen more than was expected," with the result that many domestically manufactured products "were substituted by (other similar) imported ones."

Economist Andres Sanfuentes, on the other hand, expressed the opinion that the reduced overall growth rate has as its principal cause a "light creative investment level." He explained that over the last few years investors have already gone into those sectors where "it was obvious to do so" in view of the profits and comparative advantages they offered.

Economist Mario Gomez said he concurred in the views expressed by Passicot and added that in some industrial branches--such as textiles--a precipitous drop in growth rate is observable.

COUNTRY SEEN AS IN POSITION TO PRODUCE SYNTHETIC OIL

Santiago EL MERCURIO in Spanish 20 Aug 86 pp 1, A-20

[Text] Chile is in a position to produce synthetic oil from mined coal. The oil could replace crude in all its uses, including those of the petrochemicals industry.

This statement was made by the director of the Department of Chemical Technology of the College of Physical and Mathematical Sciences, University of Chile, Alvaro Gonzalez, who deems that coal in the near future will again be the planet's most important energy source, owing to the exhaustion of its oil reserves.

The scientist announced yesterday the first high-level seminar on new coal technologies to be held in this country. It will take place tomorrow and Friday in this city's Hotel Carrera.

Professors from Notre Dame University in the United States and from the Imperial College of the University of London will take part in the proceedings, in addition to researchers from the University of Chile.

Oil From Coal

"One of the most interesting prospects that is opening up for the use of coal," said Gonzalez, "is its conversion to a hydrocarbon fluid similar to petroleum, which can be substituted for the latter in all its applications."

"Success has even been had with the production of gasolines with ratings in excess of 100 octanes, which, when mixed with other easily obtainable products, yield gasolines of special or ordinary kinds that can be used in common automobiles," he said.

Costs

Ricardo Badilla, doctor of chemical engineering and author of the "coal liquefaction" project, said, for his part, that "the technology is already available in many countries, but the problems are economic ones."

He explained that, at present coal prices and using technologies now in operation, the cost of producing a petroleum equivalent from coal is around $50 per barrel. "Since the current price of petroleum is between $30 and $35 a barrel," he said, "and it is expected to continue rising, we can say that when oil reaches $50 a barrel coal will be competitive."

He added, however, that "further technological developments will bring about a gradual reduction of production costs below the present figures."

"Moreover," he pointed out, "in Chile we are very close to commercial exploitation of the Magallanes coal deposits, which, since it will be opencut mining, will provide coal at a price well below the international price and will therefore bring the cost of producing synthetic oil down to around $35 a barrel."

Research

By way of example, they indicated that in the United States it has been calculated that to construct a plant for converting coal to oil at a rate of 500,000 barrels a day (five times Chile's entire daily consumption) requires an investment of around $1 billion.

"Nevertheless," said Badilla, "any such estimate applicable to the United States, England or other countries is not applicable to Chile, because of the fact that our coals are of a different and unique composition."

"Before any decision of an economic nature can be arrived at," he said, "we must know exactly the behavior of our coals, and this research effort is therefore necessary."

GOVERNMENT CRITICIZED FOR METHOD OF ENDING STRIKE

Too Many Contradictions

San Jose LA NACION in Spanish 1 Sep 80 p 14A

[Passages enclosed in slantlines printed in boldface]

[Text] Analysis of the documents produced as a result of the Pacifico Sur strike and the settlement of that dispute, ranging from Decree 11748-TSS (which permitted intervention in the company) to the statement made to the nation by the minister of labor the afternoon of last 29 August on radio and television networks, confirms the already widespread impression that the Carazo Odio Administration resorts all too frequently to a curious and disturbing trick to make certain actions appear to be its own. Unfortunately, the facts do not support such an interpretation.

In the case of the Pacifico Sur strike, as in others before it, this government duality has been repeated amazingly often, resulting in a credibility gap between what the government tells the nation and what it does. Invariably the government begins with the premise that if the facts contradict its words, too bad for the facts. When the Pacifico Sur strike was already over a month old, the government issued a decree on 13 August taking over control of the company's activities and the supervision of its labor relations, for the purpose of ensuring the continuation of work and services, as well as guaranteeing the workers' freedom to have their jobs back if they so desired. Although that government measure received support--sometimes enthusiastic--from the managerial sectors of the country; and although the decree was responding legally and politically to the need to resolve a situation that was going on too long, given the circumstances, the decree nevertheless was too ambitious. It did not confine itself to the objectives established by legal and constitutional norms, but tried to solve the whole problem and end the strike with the stroke of a pen.

For that purpose it created two commissions, a tripartite one which was to look into the firing of workers, and a technical one which was to make a decision on wage adjustments. The decree also set forth the criterion that there would be no reprisal "nor would penal, civil or company disciplinary action be taken against the workers, labor organizations or their leaders for merely having participated in the strike movement." It asserted that "the above-mentioned control does not imply financial or commercial intervention, nor interference in the company's general management." The contradiction between this assertion and the establishment of a Technical Commission made up of an official from the Ministry of Labor, two representatives of the National Banana Association and two from the National Banana Growers Chamber, which was to make a decision on which wages "were to be adjusted and by how much," was overcome by the alleged acceptance of the commission by the company in question.

However, the strike did not end with the issuance of the decree. During the days that followed the problem of violence emerged. The possibility that the parties would resume negotiations under the new conditions created by government control was dashed by the decree itself when it out and out prescribed the procedure that had to be followed to resolve the labor disputes that had led to the strike.

The government as well as the communist leaders were facing a hopeless task due to the very text of the decree. The workers had only one choice: either submit to the terms of the decree and return to work, ending the strike, which would spell total defeat for the union leaders, or continue the strike. They chose the latter, and forced the administration to make a greater effort to enforce the guarantee of reinstatement for workers who wanted their jobs back.

It was under those circumstances that the options for a successful result for both the government and the reds became difficult. The administration faced the challenge of going ahead to impose the terms of the decree, even at the cost of possible large-scale repression. The communist leaders had no choice but sympathy strikes, and that option had already begun to fail.

That was when the negotiations took place between the administration (represented by the minister of labor) and the leaders of the Golfito Workers Union (UTG) and of the General Confederation of Workers (CGT). The government, however, true to its custom of giving deceitful explanations, did not want anyone to assume it was negotiating with the comrades, so it resorted to the ruse of interpreting the scope of the decree so that the nation would believe that it was simply a matter of talks to clear up some points that were not well understood in the decree and to determine the implications of the decree. This is where the first official version of the end to the strike comes in. The union leaders get into the picture, of course, and put forth--still in the form of an alleged clarification--six points in a letter dated 24 August, addressed to the minister of labor. In the first point they ask if the guarantees of no reprisals or legal actions also cover the workers who participated in sympathy strikes, and the people who cooperated with the movement in various ways. The second point deals with the date of the firings by the company, which they claim should be the first day of the strike, 10 April. The third point asks whether the firings will be taken care of by applying the clauses of the Collective Bargaining Agreement. The fourth, regarding the firings as well, asks if they will be resolved on faith or whether current legal norms will be applied, and if the 70 percent will be reinstated. The sixth point asks whether the Executive Branch "believes that the adjustment (of wages) could reach at least an overall figure equivalent to an amount of money no less than 12 percent of the payroll for agricultural, dock, railroad, engineering, and factory workers, as well as other similar workers." We have omitted the fifth point because it simply asks if the Technical Commission will hear the workers.

The curious thing is, all these points were made by union leaders "ad inquerendum," that is, asking if they could expect their demands to be met in accordance with the scope of the decree.

The minister's answer to these "concerns" was not long in coming. On the same day, 24 August, he answers their questions in the following manner: 1) The government will take the necessary action to prevent reprisals or legal actions against the workers who participated in the sympathy strikes, or against those who cooperated with these movements. That is, the government is taking on that commitment outside the context of the decree, but leading people to believe that this is one of its "implications," that third parties will be protected (that is, communist leaders not affiliated with the union); no reprisals or legal actions will be taken against these people. The government, then, is promising to renege on its public service duty, as set forth in Article 334 of the Penal Code.. The government is entering into a pact, therefore, at the cost of the legal order.

2) The time limit for the firings is between 6 April 1979 and 10 April 1980. Thus it deals with the "concern" of the comrades. 3) The dismissal cases will also be subject to the terms of the Collective Bargaining Agreement. 4) The firings will be resolved in accordance with the justice that prevails in each case, and /we can assert/, according to the judgment of the officials who have made the corresponding initial study, /that approximately 70 percent/ of them can be reinstated." 5) "/We can assure you/ that this adjustment made by the Technical Commission will have the overall result of an increase the equivalent of /12 percent/ of the average wage of the workers you mention in your letter, working from the average wages paid during the first half of this year."

According to the above-mentioned terms, the minister of labor agreed to the "clarifications" of the strike leaders, and according to those very terms those leaders defused the movement and ordered the workers to return to their jobs, proclaiming at the same time a resounding victory.

The reaction, first by the company (which was not even heard at the negotiations) and then by the Chambers (which several days earlier had ventured to express firm support for the administration and the decree), to this settlement, as well as the surprise evoked among other sectors of public opinion and the mass media, obliged the government to back-pedal. Its insistence that there would never be any departure from the terms of the decree, on which its prestige depended, led the minister of labor to engage in a difficult and elaborate dialectical acrobatic exercise to demonstrate the indemonstrable, that the entire agreement with the comrades was nothing less than the result of the literal application of the decree. He said there was no negotiation of any kind, and that the leaders had ended the strike when they finally understood the provisions clearly.

In view of the objections put forth by the company (which did not accept the settlement), and the criticism by the press, the Chambers and the private sector, the administration is trying out a second version of the facts. Naturally, it was presented to us by the minister of labor, who is the one who has to walk the tightrope and who knows the most about the pact with the union leaders. The settlement was not simply a clarification of the decree, but something substantial enough to cause them to defuse the strike movement.

In this second version, the minister of labor sacrifices the workers, making the promises of his letter of 24 August to the union leaders appear to be mere opinions of his, without any significant value. First he tried to surprise the company and public opinion by asserting that there was no negotiation and that the talks dealt with the scope of the decree. But once the concessions made to the strike leaders became known, he cast the latter adrift and left them floating, maintaining that nothing had been agreed upon. In his answer of 24 August the minister says, regarding the two basic points of the conflict (the dismissals and wages): "/We could also assert/ according to the opinion of the officials who made the corresponding initial study, that approximately 70 percent of them can be reinstated." That is, the minister assures the union leaders, so that they will end the strike, that "approximately 70 percent of the workers will be reinstated." How can the minister make that promise if that point has to be decided "in toto," by the Tripartite Commission? But now, in the second version, that is omitted and the minister says in his 29 August message: "It is the /opinion/ of the Ministry of Labor that approximately 70 percent of the fired people can be reinstated. But we do not really know how many workers will be reinstated until the Tripartite Commission, established in accordance with the stipulations of the executive decree and accepted by the banana company, hands down its decision; then we will be able to know the exact percentage of workers who will get their jobs back." Does this bear any relation to what he told the strike leaders? Why didn't the minister give them that answer instead of the one he gave on 24 August, in which he doesn't express his opinion, but assures the comrades that approximately 70 percent of the fired workers will be reinstated? Is it possible that a matter as touchy as this one can be handled with such inexplicable ambiguity by an official and an entire administration?

In the letter to the strike leaders written 24 August he promises the following with regard to wages: "/We can assure/ you that that adjustment, to be made by the Technical Commission, /will achieve/ an overall result of 12 percent of the average wages. . ." This is a formal promise, sealed with his signature, and led the union leaders to call off the strike. But on 29 August, the minister changed his mind. He told us that on that point

"I took the liberty of expressing the opinion that 12 percent of the overall amount of the payroll could be the percentage of the final adjustment for the workers." On the 24th he said "we can assure you that that adjustment, to be made by the Technical Commission, will achieve an overall result of 12 percent. . ." and 5 days later, on the 29th, he explained that he only "took the liberty" of expressing an opinion, but that it would be the Commission's decision. Now it is not the company, but the workers who have been left up in the air, unless it is contrived that the Tripartite Commission will set at 60 or 70 percent the number of workers who are to be reinstated, and that the Technical Commission will decide that the overall raises will amount to 12 percent.

Under those conditions, no one can be certain: not the nation, not the companies, not the unions. If the government proceeds like this, no one knows what to go by or what words mean. The uncertainty created by these actions and the administration's obstinate adherence to the idea that the decree was implemented and there were no negotiations, contrary to what is shown by official documents themselves and the facts, is surely creating a climate of anxiety and concern in the country. This trend must be stopped by means of a drastic rectification and sudden awakening to the true situation in this country.

San Jose LA REPUBLICA in Spanish 31 Aug 80 p 6

[Text] The official handling of the banana strike completely exhausted the Costa Rican people's ability to be astounded. Now, perplexed, we are wondering whom the government is trying to fool. The democratic sector? Management? The banana workers? The communist leaders? Itself?

Things are in bad straits when the minister of labor feels it necessary to constantly clarify the clarifications he makes of the executive decree issued 13 August, supposedly to put an end to the banana strike in the south. However, the more he explains, the more he gets caught up in the tangle of contradictions that he has woven. There is no other possible result in situations in which what one says and what one does have nothing to do with each other.

Not even the least dialectical effort is needed to discover the trap into which the minister of labor placed the administration by trying to introduce some citizen sector whose identity is becoming more and more confusing. Here lies a danger whose consequences, God willing, we will not have to lament for too much longer.

In a new twist in his ever-changing position, the minister said in the speech he gave on national radio and television networks last Friday:

"For the first time in Costa Rican history an illegal strike, in this case led by extremist leaders, has ended with the latter accepting the juridical system, without negotiations, through the implementation of the executive decree issued for the purpose of ending the strike."

We are given to understand that the juridical system referred to by the minister is the one made up by all current legal norms, including the executive decree issued on 13 August. The decree was welcomed warmly by the citizens, because they saw reflected in it a firm and decisive position by the government regarding the illegal action of the communist leaders; not because they were convinced of the constitutional and legal purity of that executive action. Let us analyze, with the simplicity characteristic of the case, the manner in which the minister has tried to tell each sector what he thought that sector should hear, either fooling everyone or outwitting himself into believing that he could manipulate them without anyone's discovering that he was acting without direction or judgment.

/The executive decree of 13 August (Article 3) says:/

"The workers shall return to their jobs at 0500 hours on 14 August of this year, with an absolute guarantee of the continuation of their labor contracts and the absence of reprisals or penal, civil or disciplinary actions /against the workers, labor organizations and their leaders/ for merely having participated in the strike movement."

The guarantee granted by the decree is clearly and specifically limited to the banana workers, to the labor organizations that participated in the strike and their leaders; no one else. /In a letter sent to the minister 24 August, the communists bargain:/

"Does that guarantee extend to the fellow workers who have participated in the resulting sympathy strikes, /and to the people who cooperated with our movement in various ways?/"

The communists' request goes beyond the limits of the decree to include within the guarantees offered in that document, red agitators who do not belong to the company or the unions, who went to the area to disturb the peace and to encourage the violation of the law.

"By the same token, the government will make the necessary efforts to ensure that the same conduct will apply to those who participated in sympathy strikes, as long as said strikes are called off as a consequence of /this response: or against those who lent support to these movements./"

The minister hastened to give in to the demands of the communists who were on the fringes of the law; not only did he extend the guarantees offered by the decree to those who went to sympathy strikes, but he also made them apply to third parties, agitators and activists who had nothing to do with the movement. That leaves company doors wide open to strangers who come trying to promote illegal movements. Furthermore, he stipulates a condition for the expansion of the guarantee: that the sympathy strikes be called off as a consequence /of his response/, and not, as he says now, in accordance with the executive decree's provisions.

"The judicial actions that for punitive reasons were filed with the courts by the office of the attorney general of the republic, an office of the Ministry of Justice, shall continue forward. Whether they be workers or third parties, the people who committed crimes shall answer for them; /there shall be no future legal actions before the penal courts. . /"

The minister, a distinguished lawyer, knows full well that the law dictates that crimes be prosecuted, and that this duty is irrevocable. Therefore, his offer is illegal. He also knows that the trials already begun in the restrictive courts can only end in dismissals of the cases, whether the verdict be a conviction or an acquittal, without the Executive Branch being able to do anything to modify that procedure. Thus, there is nothing behind his assertion that criminal prosecutions will continue forward.

". . . does not mean that the people who committed crimes shall remain unpunished; those cases shall be heard by the courts /and were not dismissed/ Of course /new cases will not be filed/ as a result of the strike because as soon as the strike ends, no new case can exist for the very reason that there is no strike."

Neither the president of the republic nor the minister or anyone else can drop criminal charges already filed; but what is most serious is not the sophism of saying that what cannot be done was not done, but the announcement that the law requiring prosecution will be ignored if there emerges evidence now of crimes committed during the strike, which to date have not resulted in the filing of charges.

/The executive decree of 13 August (Article 5) says:/

"A technical commission, coordinated by an official of the Ministry of Labor and Social Security, and made up also of two representatives of the National Banana Association and of the National Banana Growers Chamber, /shall determine which rates,/ beyond the parameters established of 20 percent of wage incentives per unit of time accrued by the workers of the Compania Bananera de Costa Rica, /shall be adjusted, and by how much. . ./"

The decree gives the Technical Commission exclusive authority to determine the rates and the amounts of wage adjustments, "beyond the parameters established of 20 percent of wage incentives." /In the letter sent to the minister by the communists on 24 August, the latter bargain:/

"Does the Executive Branch believe that this adjustment could reach at least an overall figure equivalent to a sum of money not less than 12 percent of the payroll of agricultural, dock, railroad, engineering and factory workers, as well as others?"

"/We can assure/ you that that adjustment, to be made by the Technical Commission, will achieve an overall result of an increase equivalent to 12 percent of the average wages of the workers you mention in your letter, working from the average wages paid during the first half of this year."

In the negotiations, the minister hastened to answer the communists on 24 August that they were in an illegal position. He clearly, decisively and expressly told them that "/we can assert,/" without hesitation or doubt, that "that adjustment /to be made/ by the Technical Commission will achieve" "an increase equivalent to 12 percent."

That offer is direct, clear and precise, and it violates the executive decree as well as the legal norms the decree supposedly was based on.

"It is the opinion of the Executive Branch that that adjustment could be equivalent to 12 percent of the average wages of the workers, /and that was what it informed/ the social organizations that represent them. But the Technical Commission shall carry out its task with the knowledge and approval of the employing company, and have the final word on this issue."

It is impossible to understand the dialectical juggling of the minister, because what he told the communists was quite different. In an official note, on behalf of the administration, he told them, "/We can assure you/" that the adjustment to be made by the Technical Commission "/will achieve an overall result of an increase equivalent to 12 percent./"

/Third explanation by the minister, 29 August:/

"/I took the liberty of expressing the opinion/ that 12 percent of the overall amount of the payroll could be the percentage of the final adjustment for the workers. /It does not necessarily/ have to be that percentage."

Whom is the minister trying to fool or confuse? In his answer to the communists on 24 August, /he assured them/ that they will have an overall increase of 12 percent. Now, at the end, he says that he "took the liberty of expressing the opinion" and that "they will not necessarily get the 12 percent raise they demanded."

The problem is that the communists called off the strike because the minister /assured them/ that the Technical Commission would grant them that raise, and not in accordance with the executive decree of 13 August, as the official claims now. The reds were clear in the note they sent on 25 August:

"/In accordance with your answer/ contained in communication DM-846-80, we have prepared to call upon the striking workers to go back to their jobs at the Compania Bananera de Costa Rica and call off the sympathy strikes supporting them, as established in our earlier letter."

That is, the strike was ended because the minister told the communists: "We can assure you . . . that that adjustment, to be made by the Technical Commission, will achieve an overall result of an increase equivalent to 12 percent." Is the minister now trying to fool the communists by taking away what he so emphatically guaranteed them?

That decree established a Tripartite Commission to study separately each dismissal that took place after 6 April 1979, and to determine, case by case, which workers should be reinstated in their jobs.

/Request by communists in 24 August letter:/

"We want to know. . . and if the previous study made by the ministry of the different cases allows you to assure us that at least 70 percent of the fired workers could return to their jobs."

"By the same token, /we can assert,/ according to the opinion of officials who made the corresponding initial study, that approximately 70 percent of them can be reinstated."

The minister says nothing here about the results that could be obtained by the Tripartite Commission in its study of the cases; on the contrary, it makes an assertion that gives the impression that it is binding upon the above-mentioned Commission.

". . . but it will not be until there has been a definitive decision that the exact percentage of reinstated workers can be revealed."

In this second explanation of the modification of the decree, in an interpretive manner, the minister begins to modify what he affirmed to the communist leaders, and points out that the number of workers to be reinstated depends on the decision of the Tripartite Commission. He does it timidly, however, indicating that only then will "the exact percentage" be known, since in his letter regarding the negotiated settlement of the strike he assured them that "approximately" 70 percent would get their jobs back.

/Third explanation by the minister, 29 August:/

"The Ministry of Labor has expressed the opinion that approximately 70 percent of the fired workers /could be/ reinstated."

That was not what he told the communists when he negotiated with those who were behaving illegally, to end the strike. He told them, "We can assert. . . that approximately 70 percent of them can be reinstated."

That same day, 29 August, he cleared up that point further by saying: "But we will not really know how many workers will be reinstated until the Tripartite Commission, established in accordance with the stipulations of the executive decree and accepted by the banana company, hands down its decision."

This indicates that if the Tripartite Commission says that no worker shall be reinstated, then why did he tell the communists he could assure them that 70 percent would be reinstated, according to the preliminary studies he had in his possession?

If after swearing up and down that the Executive Branch would not negotiate with those who adhered to an illegal position, and that he would enforce the 13 August decree, he negotiated with the red leaders on the pretext of explanations and the determination of the decree's scope, and led them to believe that they could get a 12 percent raise for the workers and the reinstatement of 70 percent of the fired workers, then what does he expect the communists to do now that they have been deceived, especially if the rulings by the commissions regarding wages and dismissals do not correspond to the percentages he "assured" would be granted with his authority as minister?

The minister, in this case a spokesman for the administration, should speak clearly and bring the country out of the cloud of contradictions which he has plunged it into. We Costa Ricans need to know what to expect.

Government Negotiations Criticized

San Jose LA NACION in Spanish 27 Aug 80 p 14A

[Text] By means of an agreement between the administration and the labor leaders of the General Confederation of Workers (CGT) and the Golfito Workers Union (UTG) as a result of several days of negotiating, yesterday the settlement of the Pacifico Sur strike was announced after more than 46 days of striking.

The agreement makes several concessions to the union beyond the terms of the decree with which the government took control of the company. The main concessions are an overall raise equivalent to 12 percent of the average wages, using the average wages paid during the first half of this year as a base, and a promise that the Technical Commission established by the decree to resolve this dispute shall respect this percentage; the determination of each dismissal case in accordance with the justice of the case, with a promise that such instructions shall be given to the official representing the administration on the Tripartite Commission; and the reinstatement of at least 70 percent of the fired workers.

A peculiar aspect of this agreement to end the strike is that it was undertaken after negotiations with union leaders who advocated the illegal strike, without the participation of the representatives of the other side, that is, the Compania Bananera. Another peculiar factor is that it does not conform to the terms of the decree which, according to repeated affirmations by the administration, through its minister of labor, were irrevocable. In fact, the agreement between the government and union leaders that the wage adjustment demanded by the union "will achieve an overall result of an increase equivalent to 12 percent of the average wages" does resolve this point of conflict, The Technical Commission is entrusted only with the mechanical settlement of each case.

In this manner, the administration has made a wage agreement behind the back of the Compania Bananera, and furthermore has violated the terms of its own decree. That document said that official control "does not imply financial or commercial intervention, or interference in the general management of the company." Therefore it is not only surprising but also patently contrary to and in violation of the legal code and the collective bargaining agreements signed by the parties, for the government to announce an agreement after proclaiming over and over that there would be no negotiations with the strikers because the decree provided a means to end the movement. One of the parties involved was not even heard, and the agreement violates current labor legislation, as well as the very text of the decree which permitted government intervention in the company.

What the government began well, it finished badly. We do not know what drastic circumstances led the government to negotiate under the table with the leaders of the CGT and the UTG, when many workers were already beginning to go back to work and a demonstration of police force lent credence to its decision to enforce a decree that provided a mechanism apparently agreeable to the Compania Bananera to resolve the basic points of conflict.

The Compania Bananera, however, made it clear to the government that it does not accept the agreement made with the union leaders who were responsible for the strike. It has said that if the government forces it to accept the settlement, it will take the matter to court so that the courts will have the final say. If they win such a suit, which is very likely given the legal aspects of the case, the state would have to pay a large indemnity, something the present administration would certainly not have to face. Meanwhile, the union leaders are proclaiming a resounding victory, and are preparing to celebrate with a parade next Thursday. No one has forgotten, however, that the strike continues in La Estrella and Rio Frio, and that those strikers will receive full support from the victorious workers of Pacifico Sur.

The result of the conflict, then, if the strike is indeed over, could not be worse. Not only have the comrades attained an apparent victory, reflected in a 12 percent raise (which is not serious in and of itself), but the victory has been obtained behind the back of the law and in defiance of the government's own promises to obey the text of the decree. It was made possible by direct negotiations between the administration and the strike leaders, without consulting the company. The country should be very alarmed at the precedent this sets.

The divorce between word and deed that has characterized this administration (which in the case in question became patently obvious when until a few hours ago Minister Serrano Pinto was claiming repeatedly that the talks with the union leaders were limited to clarification of the implications of the decree) serves to accentuate further the anxiety and uncertainty that unfortunately have invaded all Costa Ricans.

CIVIL AVIATION HEAD ARRESTED--The Judicial Investigation Organization [OLJ] has arrested the director of civil aviation for complicity in the drug trafficking case discovered in Miami. Members of the U.S. mafia were staying at the Royal Dutch Hotel and others of similar category in Costa Rica. Colombians, Australians, and North Americans are implicated in the drug trafficking case, police officals have reported. The control tower is partly responsible for not demanding all the documents and requisites for the flight to leave. The OLJ has arrested Mr Roberto (Benedictis), civil aviation director, for complicity in the marijuana trafficking discovered in Miami after a plane of the (EXACO) Airline was seized. Mr (Benedictis) was aware of the flight which was to be made to load the marijuana in Colombia and take it to the United States, the OLJ officials added. Mr Roberto (Benedictis), however, did not advise the respective authorities and, although he was not in agreement with the operation, he preferred to remain silent. The control tower was to blame in the traffic. The Judicial Investigation police said that the control tower of Juan Santamaria International Airport was partly responsible for the marijuana traffic by the (EXACO) airplane because it failed to completely fill out the control log which indicates the place of exit, destination, and type of mission to be carried out. The Costa Ricans were pressured by the U.S. mafia members when they decided to quit the group and they and their family were threatened, thus forcing them to continue being part of the mafia. SPADAFORA DENIES ORGANIZING BRIGADES--Panamanian guerrilla leader Dr Hugo Spadafora today said in San Jose, Costa Rica, that he is not organizing any armed brigades to fight in El Salvador. Spadafora is well-known in Nicaragua where he fought next to Sandinist guerrillas in the campaign to overthrow the Somozist tyrants in 1979. In statements to newsmen in San Jose, Doctor Spadafora said he was visiting friends he made during the Sandinist campaign. Spadafora told newsmen that more armed brigades will be organized in Latin America to fight against the fascist tyrannies in the continent. Rodolfo Quiros, Costa Rican immigration department chief inspector, said he did not know anything about Spadafora's arrival in Costa Rica. Spadafora said that he had come into the country legally. According to Spadafora, the situation in El Salvador is similar to the one that existed in Nicaragua: The people are being led by a military vanguard which is handling the struggle against the government very well. Spadafora does not believe that Sandinism will become a leftwing movement. From what I can see there is press freedom. I believe that they are observing democratic pluralism. The newspaper LA PRENSA has strongly criticized the government. In a way this proves that there is press freedom, Spadafora pointed out. MACHADO VENTURA SPEAKS TO SUGAR WORKERS

[Speech by Jose Ramon Machado Ventura, member of the Politburo of the CC of the PCC, at end of national ceremony for Sugar Worker Day held at the 30 de Noviembre sugar mill, Pinar del Rio Province, on 6 Aug 80, "Year of the Second Congress": "Party at All Levels Must Take Concrete Measures to Guarantee Present Repairs, Carry out Efficient Sugar Harvest in 1981"]

[Text] Fifty-year comrades and nationally distinguished workers:

Comrades:

Exactly 20 years ago, on 6 August 1960, our commander in chief, Fidel Castro, gave a historic and unforgettable speech at the closing of the First Latin American Youth Congress held in Havana. He announced to the world the nationalization of the major U.S. companies in our country including the 36 Yankee-owned sugar mills in Cuba.

Today, two decades after the revolution's strong response to the growing aggression of imperialism in its desire to frustrate the relentless advance of the revolutionary process of our people, it gives us immense satisfaction to celebrate Sugar Worker Day at the 30 de Noviembre sugar mill, the first mill constructed in our country after the January 1959 triumph and also the first mill constructed in the past 55 years.

No other place would be as propitious to commemorate such a significant event since this new mill, the pride of our sugar industry, is a symbol of the strength of the revolution and our people in their tenacious fight for economic development and for progress on the road to socialist construction in spite of the threatening presence of Yankee imperialism. At the very beginning of the Cuban revolutionary process, Yankee imperialism began to carry out criminal plans to defeat this process.

At the beginning, the imperialists did not even think that a true revolution had triumphed in Cuba. They relied on the possibility of maintaining control of the internal affairs of the country as they had done for more than 50 years under the subjugated republic. After verifying the extraordinary political dimension of the Cuban revolution and watching its stimulating effect on the oppressed peoples of America, they resorted to their traditional maneuvers and economic boycotts, formulas they had used on numerous occasions against progressive governments throughout the world.

Nevertheless, instead of destabilizing the revolution and weakening the conscience of the people, the continual Yankee aggression contributed to rapid radicalization of the Cuban revolutionary process which had penetrated the masses so deeply.

Our revolutionary government responded to the criminal suppression of the sugar quota which Cuba had supplied to U.S. markets for almost a century with the nationalization of the U.S. mills in our country. That was the revolutionary and energetic response of a people ready to defend their dignity, their sovereignty and their conquests after almost a century of unsuccessful struggle. That was the materialization of Fidel's warning concerning the imperialist threat: "They will take away our quota pound by pound and we will take away their mills one by one; we will take away all the U.S. investments in Cuba centavo by centavo."

We were merely recovering our legitimate right to the main economic sector of our country on which the support of millions of Cubans depended. We were merely returning to the people the goods and wealth snatched from them and offering them the basic prerogative of enjoying the fruits of their own labor.

For many years the sugar worker was subjected to the most inhuman living conditions. He earned a miserable wage paid in promissory notes that mortgaged his very existence; to this were added the terrible unemployed time, hunger, lack of housing and death while the fruits of his hard work filled the coffers of the native bourgeoisie and the Yankee capitalists.

One of the most beautiful achievements of the revolution in power was recovery for the people of the products of the sweat of men who had been robbed and deprived of all their rights from the field to the mill and from the evil era of slavery to the equally unjust time of capitalist exploitation.

Sugar Workers Celebrate This Date Marking Beginning of Process of Economic Foundation for Construction of Socialism in Our Country

That is the reason that the sugar workers celebrate this date which marks the beginning of the process of economic foundation for the construction of socialism in our country. On that historic 6 August, nationalization was announced not only of the sugar mills but also U.S. oil refineries and branches of different Yankee multinational companies in our country. Expropriating our primary industry to benefit the working people was a fatal blow to the foreign monopolies and filled the dispossessed for whom a new fatherland was being forged with hope. This was a true sign of the radical nature of the revolution.

Twenty years have passed during which there have been profound socioeconomic transformations in sugar production which have fully justified the confidence that the masses have placed in the revolution since the beginning.

In spite of our objective limitations, the U.S. blockade, U.S. aggression, the departure of technicians and our own inexperience in administering such complex agriculture and industry, the balance today between that past of misery, exploitation and uncertainty and our present is very favorable for the revolution.

The agricultural cane worker, the sugar worker and the cane peasant are no longer laborers discriminated against and humiliated as they were in previous generations. They are free men, owners of the means of production, who participate consciously in the production process since they know that the fruits of their labor do not enrich any national monopoly or exploiter. On the contrary, the wealth created by their work is used to benefit all the people through the construction of hospitals, schools, housing, highways, factories, power lines, etc.

All the sugar mills and 80 percent of the land used for cane cultivation are social property; that is, they belong to all the people. The remaining 20 percent of the land is in the hands of peasant workers, firm allies of the socialist revolution, who have already advanced toward superior forms of production by joining cooperatives.

Twenty years ago, almost all the land was prepared for cane by using oxen and small plows. Now almost all that land including the land belonging to the peasants is prepared by using tractors and more efficient plows.

Under capitalism, all the cane was cut and reaped manually and 85 percent was transported in oxcarts. Now more than 45 percent of the cane is cut with combines and more than 97 percent of the rest is reaped by machine; 85 percent of the total cane is harvested with motorized equipment.

Chemical fertilization and weeding have been introduced on a large scale in cane agriculture; they were hardly used under capitalism. New varieties of cane have been introduced, many of which have been created by Cuban technicians.

The irrigated area is more than five times larger. Large and small dams have been built and the use of subterranean water has increased.

In these 20 years, there has been a profound transformation in the means of production used in cane agriculture. There are now more than 2,000 crawler tractors, more than 30,000 rubber-tired tractors, some 3,800 cane reapers, more than 2,500 combines for cutting cane, some 8,000 trucks and tens of thousands of implements for mechanized cane cultivation.

In order to repair and maintain this equipment, a network of hundreds of shops has been established and a great quantity of portable shops has been acquired.

Some 500 collection stations have been constructed to increase the productivity of manual cutting and to complement mechanized cutting. This has also made it possible to extend electrification to large agricultural areas.

The greatest transformation has been in the men who carry out the production process. Under capitalism, the main work instruments were the hoe, machete, small plow and animal power. Now the agricultural cane worker uses a combine to cut the cane, tractors, reapers, fumigators, etc. The backward agricultural worker under capitalism has become an equipment operator, mechanic, welder, fumigation technician, etc.

Manual cane cutting has gone from individual cutters or pairs of cutters to brigades of 30 to 40 workers; this has increased the productivity of the cutter. The cane peasants have been incorporated into this system of cutting, changing their old individual work habits.

This brigade system of manual cutting has led to a powerful million-arroba movement which "today is one of the fundamental pillars in our battle for productivity and for the reduction of the work force required for the sugar harvest to the minimum," according to comrade Fidel in his report to the First Party Congress.

Under Capitalism 350,000 Workers Cut, Reaped Cane Manually; Now Only 150,000 Cutters Are Needed, a Decrease of 200,000 Cane Cutters

In these 20 years, due to the introduction of mechanization in cane agriculture, hundreds of thousands of workers have been freed from the hard work of cutting and reaping cane. Under capitalism, some 350,000 workers were used to cut and reap the cane manually; now only 150,000 cutters are used, a decrease of 200,000 cane cutters.

There have also been transformations in the sugar industry although they have not been as major as in agriculture. Large resources have been allocated to restore, modernize and expand the mills and automation has begun.

The system of bulk sugar handling which did not exist under capitalism has been introduced; now 80 percent of our raw sugar exports are shipped in this form.

Capacity in the mechanical industry which produces equipment and parts for the sugar industry has been expanded. This means that a major part of the components of the new mills can be nationally produced.

Also our universities and other national education centers and those in socialist countries have trained thousands of new specialists in cane agriculture and the sugar industry. More than 60 technical and polytechnical schools have been constructed near the mills to train the new skilled workers needed for cane agriculture and the sugar industry.

Our present level of development has permitted us to go on to the construction of new mills designed by Cuban technicians; a major part of their equipment is constructed by our mechanical industry.

Research centers have been established for the development of new varieties of cane, for the study of soils and fertilizers and for the development of new cane derivatives.

We can state, without fear of being mistaken, that in the past 20 years the Cuban working class has made glorious achievements in the maintenance and development of sugar production.

In his report to the First Party Congress, comrade Fidel stated: "At the beginning of the revolution, the sugar industry was badly hurt. The traditional markets were eliminated by imperialism. Purchases of equipment, parts and material from habitual suppliers became impossible and there was an extraordinary drain of skilled cadres."

Humble men of the people, frequently with less than a sixth-grade education, had to assume leadership functions in the industrial and agricultural processes.

In the first years of the revolution, unemployment was eliminated and cane cutters were needed; this was one of our country's most difficult problems. Our selfless workers and laborers mobilized for cane cutting along with soldiers and intermediate students made the harvests possible in those difficult years and also dignified this work.

During those difficult years and now, our country had the material support and the solidarity of the socialist countries, especially the Soviet Union, which bought all the sugar that the Yankees no longer bought. Today they buy larger quantities at a fair price, have supplied us with equipment, tractors and parts and have helped us develop mechanization. A combine factory has been built and the mechanical industry has been expanded.

Today no one questions the fact that the working class which made it possible to maintain and expand sugar production in spite of the blockade and imperialist aggression is in a better position now to confront the new tasks of the present stage.

As is known, sugar-cane rust had a serious effect on cane production. Combined with inadequate clearing in the past year and lack of fulfillment of the 1978 winter sowing quota, this caused a decrease in sugar production in 1980 compared to 1979.

To guarantee the greatest quantity of cane possible for the 1981 sugar harvest, we had the largest spring sowing of this 5-year period and also the largest clearing campaign. It is necessary to continue keeping the cane clear and free of weeds and to use the irrigation systems to the maximum.

It is necessary to make good repairs in the mills and harvest equipment, giving more attention to everything that caused problems in the past harvest.

One of the main problems in past repairs was the delayed arrival of supplies to the enterprises. Therefore, the administrative organizations must maintain strict supervision over this task and continue holding meetings in provinces to supervise and solve problems that can occur up until the beginning of the harvest.

As has already been stated, it is necessary to make an objective plan for the harvest, keeping in mind the criteria of the party organizations, the enterprises and the provinces. It is not possible to continue planning cutting capacity that cannot be met; this results in prolongation of the harvest which makes it difficult to sow and cultivate the cane.

According to the methodology of MINAZ [Ministry of the Sugar Industry], the provinces must determine the daily mechanized cutting capacity of the regular labor force and of the EJT [Youth Labor Army]. The difference compared to the potential quota of each mill will have to be met with volunteer forces. Each province will have to indicate which sectors it proposes to take these forces from in order to handle this with the central state organizations when necessary.

The wage laws governing the next sugar harvest must be dictated so that the worker movement can discuss the conditions with each worker who is mobilized.

The worker movement and the administrations must take measures to select the best cutters in order to guarantee productions that must be maintained.

The CTC [Central Organization of Cuban Trade Unions], the unions, ANAP [National Association of Small Farmers] and the EJT must work to organize the greatest number of workers possible in million-arroba brigades in order to increase discipline and productivity.

The CTC must also take measures to improve emulation in the sugar harvest, making it more dynamic and insuring good participation by the workers.

The cane enterprises and the people's government organs must take measures when possible to improve the living conditions of the harvest workers as well as supplies based on resources available. This is also true concerning housing, recreation, sanitation, etc.

Strategy for 1981 Harvest Is for All Mills to Begin on Schedule, Keep Grinding at Maximum Capacity

The strategy that will be followed in the 1981 harvest is for all the sugar mills to begin on the scheduled date and keep grinding at their maximum capacity. Therefore, they must be in good repair and have full supplies of cane.

It will be necessary to have an efficient harvest in order to obtain the maximum quantity of sugar from the available cane. Also the fight to improve the sugar quality will continue.

With respect to the 1982 sugar harvest which we must work on now, it is necessary to meet the 1980 winter sowing quota by 31 December; it is running behind now. It is necessary to intensify work with land preparation machinery and to plant well.

The largest spring sowing will be done in the first half of 1981--some 26,000 caballerias--so a number of organizational measures must be taken in time concerning machinery, training operators for the new equipment and cutting the leftover cane so that the land preparation equipment can be fully exploited.

We have a very important task at the end of October: the First Sugar Union Congress. It again unites the agricultural cane workers and the sugar industry workers under the glorious banners of Jesus Menendez' union which won so many conquests in the fight against imperialism and capitalist exploitation. The CTC and the party must give more attention to this assembly process so that this union can be strengthened and can face the great tasks it has before it.

As can be seen, the immediate tasks that the administration, the workers and the party must confront require maximum organization and explanation to the masses so that they know about them and can be mobilized to achieve the objectives outlined by the party leadership.

Comrades:

We know that, in spite of the efforts of the revolution to benefit the sugar workers, there are still things that are behind schedule such as the repair and construction of housing and the creation of recreational facilities and services in the areas where our workers live. This is due, first, to the fact that our country has had to create the material base for education and health and to defend the revolution during this time. Also it has had to develop highways and railways and to construct hundreds of factories and shops to expand other production necessary for our economy.

There are social problems in the agricultural cane areas and in the sugar mills and problems with services; some places do not have communications. There are also some problems with wages and their form of payment and weekly time off.

The proposed economic and social guidelines for the 5-year period 1981-1985 now being discussed will be submitted to the consideration of the Second Party Congress. They establish the need to resolve most of these problems based on available resources and to give them the treatment they deserve due to the importance of sugar production.

Also those guidelines propose to increase the agricultural yield of cane to 70,000 or 80,000 arrobas per caballeria and even 90,000 arrobas in some provinces.

They also propose to increase the capacity of the sugar industry through the construction of new mills and the expansion of existing ones and to improve their efficiency.

Both aspects are presented with the objective of producing between 10 million and 10.5 million metric tons of sugar base 96° by 1985.

To increase sugar production in the coming years until reaching the figures established for 1985 has become the basic economic task of the next 5-year period. The rest of our possibilities for economic and social development depend on this to a great extent.

To create the conditions for fulfillment of this task, the party and the government have taken and will continue to take measures aimed at that objective.

Cane agriculture and the sugar industry have been combined under a single state organization, MINAZ, which will direct all this activity.

As we said before, all the agricultural cane workers and the sugar industry workers will soon be united under a single union in order to work together for the same objectives.

The guidelines for the Second Party Congress show the need to begin to solve the housing, wage and other social problems that affect the cane and sugar workers to prevent their departure to other sectors and also to bring in new workers needed to expand this production.

These measures in themselves are not enough if the administrative and union leaders and party organizations do not try to solve the problems that we have in production today. For example, the country has provided the cane enterprises with large quantities of machines and equipment that are not used to their full capacity. Cane planting is done with poor quality and losses are high; cultivation, clearing, fertilizing and use of irrigation are inadequate.

All this leads to low yields per caballeria because of low amounts of cane per area. About 20 percent of our present cane fields are bare.

With the present resources and those that will be made available to cane agriculture in the next 5-year period, it is possible to meet and surpass the yields per caballeria planned for 1985.

To do this, it is necessary to increase discipline and demand as the party leadership has stated.

The sugar industry still has reserves in capacity and efficiency. With the resources allocated to it in the next 5-year period and working in an organized way, it can carry out the planned expansions for 1985.

As you know, one of the basic problems that we will have to solve for future sugar harvests will be cane cutting. It is necessary to prepare the present areas for mechanized cutting properly and to expand them as much as possible, to train personnel for mechanized cutting adequately, to organize forces for manual cutting and to increase their productivity.

We Are Confident that Sugar Workers, Worthy Heirs of Jesus Menendez' Struggle and Combat, Will Not Fail

If at the beginning of the 5-year period we make concrete, concise plans for each year of the 5-year period and for each production unit, cane enterprise and sugar mill, if we discuss them with the workers and if we specify the tasks we must fulfill, we are confident that the sugar workers, worthy heirs of Jesus Menendez' struggle and combat, will not fail.

Naturally, fulfillment of the sugar production quotas is the necessary premise in order to be able to satisfy the needs of the cane and sugar workers themselves as stated in the guidelines.

The sugar workers and cane workers must improve their discipline, comply with the workday, increase work productivity and help improve work organization.

The administration must increase its demand to make the entire productive process more efficient.

The new union must work more directly with the workers and defend their rights but also present the tasks that the workers must carry out. Through socialist emulation, it must lead them in the fight to fulfill the objectives of the next 5-year period.

The party has grown in all the mills and cane enterprises and has been strengthened organically and ideologically. It has greater influence among all the working masses.

The party at all levels must take concrete measures to guarantee present repairs, to carry out an efficient sugar harvest in 1981 and to meet the 1980 winter sowing quota.

It is also responsible for guaranteeing the sugar production objectives for the next 5-year period, organizing and demanding fulfillment of tasks, convincing the working masses and encouraging them in the fight to increase productivity and production as the only way to solve other social and wage problems. I must not end without first giving all of you warmest and most deserved congratulations in the name of our party.

We are convinced that the heroic sugar workers, through their dignity, their spirit of sacrifice, their history and their tradition as revolutionary workers, will fulfill all the guidelines of the party and Fidel. They will not fail in this great task.

Long live the sugar workers union!

Long live the PCC [Communist Party of Cuba]!

Long live Fidel!

ISOLATION OF NEW BOLIVIAN GOVERNMENT NOTED

Havana GRANMA WEEKLY REVIEW in English 31 Aug 80 p 11

[Text] There's no doubt that the fascist military junta is having a lot of trouble in its efforts to gain recognition. So far, few governments seem to be interested in dictator Luis Garcia Meza and his cohorts.

Garcia Meza will be hard put to find justification for the coup. First of all, a legitimate election was held in Bolivia on June 29 of this year, and the people elected the president and a Congress in keeping with a bourgeois democracy. And secondly, that was the third consecutive victory in the last three years for the Democratic People's Unity Party (UDP) and its presidential candidate Hernan Siles Suazo.

It's almost impossible to cast doubts on this triple victory and the desires of the Bolivian people. Three elections in a row, with the same results, constituted a resounding defeat for the fascist military.

It won't be easy for the governments of the area and the world as a whole to ignore this reality or to convince the public of the reasons for granting recognition to the putschists, who have been charged with being killers and drug traffickers.

Garcia Meza told the world that the fascists had staged the coup to save Bolivia from becoming "a satellite of international communism." Next, he invited all "friendly" countries to send delegations to Bolivia and see for themselves that human rights were respected there. However, it seems as if he's wasting his time because, barring a few exceptions, nobody has paid any attention to his pleas.

The first country to recognize the junta was Argentina, whose military regime has been accused by everybody in and outside Bolivia of being the instigator of the putsch.

In contrast to the wave of resignations by Bolivian ambassadors all over the world, Garcia Meza announced that the ambassador in Buenos Aires had remained in his post.

The next countries to recognize the junta were Brazil, Uruguay, Paraguay, Guatemala and El Salvador. Curiously enough, all of them are ruled by military regimes and none of them can boast of respecting human rights. Chile did not grant recognition on account of an old feud between the two countries that has to do with border problems. Shortly after the coup, the Bolivian dictator issued a statement to the effect that his country would reestrblish relations with Chile. This was followed by a denial which, to all appearances, was an attempt to remedy a faux pas.

Recognition from the other side of the world came first from South Africa, the country of apartheid, and Israel, spearhead of U. S. imperialism in the Middle East. Next came the acknowledgement from Anwar Sadat, the vilest most treacherous president Egypt ever had to put up with, followed by Taiwan, South Korea and Thailand, to complete the roster of the junta's "friends."

No other country has extended recognition, for the move would be so unpopular. There have been reports to the effect that some countries will soon recognize the Bolivian regime. But so far, the fascist military coup has aroused such feelings of indignation and condemnation that the international isolation of the junta has become a real headache for dictator Luis Garcia Meza.

ALMEIDA PROVINCIAL PLENUM ATTENDANCE--Commander of the Revolution Juan Almeida Bosque, member of the party Politburo, yesterday attended the 16th Plenum of the Provincial Party Committee in Camaguey which was chaired by Provincial Party First Secretary Lazaro Vasquez Garcia. The main report to the provincial [party] meeting, which will be held on 27 September, was read at the plenum. The report deals with the party work done since the previous party meeting in 1977. The second point on the plenum's agenda was an examination of objectives for the next period [as heard, presumably 3 years]. During the entire process of discussion and analysis of the two documents, the participants in the plenum made numerous presentations to propose changes and additions which helped to enhance the documents. Party Central Committee members Lino Carreras, Rene de los Santos and Facundo Martinez Vaillant--who is chairman of the party control and review committee in Camaguey Province--accompanied Commander of the Revolution Juan Almeida Bosque. PORTS CARGO HANDLING WORK--At a meeting with port terminal directors and dock workers union leaders at the national level, party secretariat member Jorge Risquet has declared that the cargo handling plan for the past 3 months was overfulfilled. He said that over that period a total of 2,218,000 tons of merchandise were unloaded o: 24 percent more than in the same period last year. Risquet added that Cuban ports began September with 367,000 tons abord ships [to be unloaded], stressing that this figure should be reduced to 250,000 tons to be considered normal and to preclude demurrage. He said that organizational deficiencies, irresponsibility, bureaucracy and lack of exigency should be eradicated. [FL112330 Havana Domestic Service in Spanish 1802 GMT 11 Sep 80]

CITRUS PRODUCTION INCREASE--Citrus production in this country doubled during the 1970 to 1979 decade with a production in 1979 of 285,000 metric tons. This was announced today at a citrus industry review meeting. Omar Fernandez, director of citrus and fruits in the Agriculture Ministry, reported at the meeting that fruit production in 1979 was two and one-half times more than in 1970. He noted the importance of citrus development to obtain foreign exchange and said that exports rose 4.4 times during the decade. [FL102336 Havana Domestic Service in Spanish 2300 GMT 10 Sep 80]

STATION SAYS U.S., SALVADORAN INTERESTS INCOMPATIBLE

PA030402 San Salvador La Voz Panamericana in Spanish 0237 GMT 2 Sep 80

[Station commentary: "The U.S. Attitude Towards El Salvador"]

[Excerpts] A 3-member commission headed by Monsignor McCarthy, bishop of Galveston, representing the U.S. Episcopal Conference, has come to El Salvador to learn about the country's situation. Its main concern is to understand the real significance of the general program of repression with reforms sponsored by the state department and the current military-christian democratic junta.

If the North Americans see that their control over Central America is in danger, they will not hesitate to intervene, either through the Marines, the OAS, Guatemala or a Bolivian-style coup; anything, rather than permit the Revolutionary Democratic Front to assume power. The United States does not want to admit two essential things: 1. That it is mainly responsible for the structural injustice in El Salvador. U.S. capitalism has essentially generated local capitalism and the country's main economic structures as necessary by-products. 2. U.S. police is mainly responsible for all the regimes we have experienced in the region. The North Americans supported Somoza and Somozism for 40 years. They overthrew Arbenz and his reformist government. They sponsored the solutions and the frauds of the National Conciliation Party in El Salvador. They trained almost all the military officers who have directed the repression in the region. The United States is the main promoter and defender of capitalism, a capitalism which is very beneficial for it but which has been disastrous for the Third World countries.

As a result of this, the United States and El Salvador cannot have common interests. To a great extent, they are opposites. Therefore, the United States can only expect from us neutrality or nonbelligerency. It cannot expect either our submission or support. There are many good people in the United States. There are many people who truly love us and help us but as a state, the United States continues to maintain interests contrary to ours.

CHURCH DEMANDS U.S. 'NOT INTERVENE'

PA312036 Panama City ACAN in Spanish 1650 GMT 31 Aug 80

[Text] San Salvador, 31 Aug (ACAN-EFE)--The Salvadoran Church demanded here today that U.S. President Jimmy Carter "not intervene" in El Salvador.

"We ask the United States not to intervene, please, just as we ask any type of Soviet or Cuban imperialism not to intervene in the problems of our country," Father Fabian Amaya Torres said on preaching the Sunday homily of the Salvadoran Archbishopric.

Msgr Arturo Rivera y Damas, apostolic administrator of the archdiocese, was at another Salvadoran diocese after his return from San Jose, Costa Rica, where he participated as a special guest in the meeting of presidents of Episcopolian conferences of Central America. The mass was held by Msgr John McCarthy, bishop of Galveston and Houston, Texas.

Amaya asked McCarthy and his companions, Fathers Bryan Hehir and Thomas Quigley, "to echo the voice of the martyr archbishop of El Salvador," Msgr Oscar Arnulfo Romero, who at the beginning of the year before he was assassinated demanded that the U.S. Government cease its military assistance to the ruling Salvadoran junta. Romero's request was not heeded by President Jimmy Carter, whose government has reiterated its support on various occasions to the ruling group in this Central American country.

Amaya also said that the church demands that the government "put an end to repression, lift the state of siege and the national emergency" in El Salvador as prior conditions for a dialogue to take place between the government and the leftists.

"The church cannot agree with the so-called 'executions' of the left, it cannot agree with the burning of buses or kidnappings or with those who kill those who are kidnapped. We do not agree that fear should be spread among the civilian population," Amaya said in one of the harshest condemnations in the past few months of the leftist groups' activities in El Salvador. "Therefore we cannot be in agreement with the repression, which is both collective and selective" by the government against the popular organizations, Amaya said.

"We also do not agree that military solutions should be applied to labor or political problems," he added.

Amaya said that "the United States shares a large part of the fault for the repression that is being maintained."

"The reforms have not been complemented with a halt to repression" in El Salvador, Amaya said, noting U.S. responsibility in the conflict.

"There is still time to halt this bloodbath" if a national dialogue is undertaken, added the priest, who is one of the people most closely identified with the progressive trend of the Catholic Church in El Salvador.

AGRARIAN REFORMS PRAISED, LEFTIST VIOLENCE CONDEMNED

San Salvador LA PRENSA GRAFICA in Spanish 29 Aug 80 pp 7, 39

[Article by Salvador Ajuria Guillen]

[Text] Since the Communist Party of El Salvador was founded, its major grievance and ambition has always been the agrarian reform, handing over the land to the men who farm it.

This was set forth in the works of Abel Cuenca, Alejandro D. Marroquin and Migeul Angel Vasquez, political science experts who advised the Salvadoran Communist Party from Mexico.

As far as Cuenca was concerned, the most urgent thing was to do away with the feudal system of tenant farmers and sharecroppers. Marroquin argued that the land and the means of farm production should be transferred to peasant farmer cooperative unions. Vasquez advocated that the state should market basic farm products.

These three major objectives, for the benefit or to the detriment of the Salvadoran people, have been accomplished by the Revolutionary Government Junta in a summary legal proceeding that was not devoid of errors but without the need to install a communist system. We have carried out a unique agrarian reform in Latin America that is expected to immediately benefit more than one quarter of the population. Exports of coffee, sugar, cotton, etc are now under state control. The banking system was nationalized.

The agrarian reform process destroyed the large landed estates and did away with "tenant farmers," "land rent" and other feudal holdovers. In a word, it freed peasant farmers from contemptible bonds and opened up new roads to the future for them.

State control of primary exports will help the country's economy by bringing in foreign exchange, and if the nationalized banking industry can be isolated from political deals, it could make loans available to segments of the population that it has never before benefited.

Strangely enough, Salvadoran Communists have reacted negatively to these changes. They are killing, as if they were enemies, the peasant farmers who have been freed from feudal bonds and who are finally the owners of the land that for generations they farmed for others. They have destroyed crops and burned down warehouses, ruining farm machinery and tools, etc. They enter the estates expropriated by the agrarian reform and shoot down the leaders and technical advisers of the cooperatives.

Those responsible for this massacre of peasant farmers are plainly insane. They suffer from what Lenin called "the infantile disease of communism," a disoriented extremism that goes beyond fanaticism and unprovoked hatred. Leftist leaders lack a strategic approach in keeping with current political realities.

I came to this country because the news being published in Mexico about the current situation in El Salvador distorts the facts and causes alarm. I have found a very thought-provoking process, substantial changes in old structures, changes based on an advanced democratic philosophy. What is being done ought to have the enthusiastic backing of the entire Salvadoran people, because the efforts are for their benefit.

It is a shame that violence is interrupting this process. If the policy of the right wing is reprehensible because it is obstinate, the policy of the left wing is negative, sectarian and devoid of political skill because it is blind. The far left is committing such serious mistakes that it has made its cause unpopular and its goals repulsive. In a process aiming at democratic revolution, a left wing blinded to the point of lapsing into a counterrevolutionary posture is inconceivable.

WORKING PEOPLE SEEN AS OPPOSED TO TERRORISM

PA031821 San Salvador Domestic Service in Spanish 1910 GMT 2 Sep 80

[Station commentary]

[Text] In their bulletins for foreign consumption the leftist extremist groups list the destruction of public utilities as accomplishments of their "prolonged war." The blowing up of highways to obstruct traffic, the sabotage of electric power transmission lines and other terrorist acts are part of a general plan the leftist guerrillas of the Revolutionary Democratic Front [FDR] are implementing in our country to inflict heavy damage on the revolutionary government.

These groups do not realize that what they destroy is not the property of the government but of all the people and that the damage is inflicted on the people, who provide the funds to construct these public utilities.

The political fanaticism of these terrorists makes them completely blind and prevents them from understanding that the people increasingly repudiate their destructive actions.

In the last few days the extremists have been threatening the lives and businesses of marketstall owners simply because they, people, do not support terrorism. All they want is to work and make a living from what they sell every day and support their children, virtues which have no ideology.

Therefore the directives of the FDR are off the mark and its groups are destroying things that belong to the people when they try to win support by coercion and terrorism. It is obvious that these individuals are desperate because they have lost the domestic battle due to the widespread rejection of their actions against the people.

NEGATIVE U.S. ARTICLE ON CENTRAL AMERICA SCORED

Guatemala City PRENSA LIBRE in Spanish 28 Aug 80 p 10

[Article by Alvaro Contreras Velez]

[Text] Even though, as Galileo Galilei would say, it is still afloat, one does not have to be a genius in political science or economics to realize by just taking a look at this explosive region that Central America is a ship that is sinking in sections as the storm of subversion grows, the first consequences of which were felt in Nicaragua and are now manifesting themselves in El Salvador.

As I said in yesterday's column, violence and its attendant crimes, terrorism and agitation is just one of the serious problems that have helped to project to our own people and to outsiders the image of a sort of tropical Titanic that will be unable to avoid shipwreck.

Such is the case, among so many others, of the article entitled "Central America, the Land of the Smoking Gun" that appeared in the 18 August issue of TIME and that begins with this offensive quote: "We are in the most savage country and among the most savage people that we have ever seen." According to the authors of the article in question, Hernando Cortes said this in 1524 about Guatemala.

"And this," the report adds, "was just one the many damaging stereotypes about Central America. In the 1850's in the United States, at the height of manifest destiny, the region was mainly regarded as 'an inviting target for territorial expansion.'"

The above is just an appetizer. The main courses come later, in the form of slanted and ill-intentioned descriptions of the situations in each of the five countries. Given this menu, any foreign businessman would obviously prefer to go without eating rather than invest a cent in the area.

This publicity offensive, with its accurate, high-caliber weapons, further agitates the waters around the sinking vessel, and even though things in Guatemala, Honduras and Costa Rica are not as calamitous as in Nicaragua and El Salvador, the economies of the former three are experiencing tough times.

With inflation galloping ahead, the specter of recession is beginning to loom from one end of the isthmus to the other. The common market, which was a great hope and which for a time yielded excellent fruit for all, is reminiscent today of the enormous, sad figure of old, sickly elephants that instinctively look for a place to die somewhere in the jungle.

And in the midst of a jungle of iron and cement, fraught with insecurity, fear and brutal, pitiless beasts with the appearance of human beings, millions of Central Americans see how the high cost of living is also an invitation to resentment and futile protests.

Passing through Guatemala recently, Mexican economist Luis Pazos, an expert on the situation and an analyst who, atypically, expresses himself clearly and courageously (even when talking about his own country), said, as an outsider, what everyone already knows. His diagnosis of the ills besetting our countries was accurate and sincere but hardly novel.

It is true that the tempest is lashing, and there are no signs of a letup. It grows more violent every day. The ship tosses about like a nutshell dragged along by the current, unable to get free. But despite the squall, the politicians are still battling for the captainship of the vessel because, whether afloat or on the bottom, they know how to profit from it.

FOREIGN MINISTER APPROVES TRAVEL TO COMMUNIST COUNTRIES

Guatemala City PRENSA LIBRE in Spanish 15 Aug 80 p 4

[Text] "I see no reason for not traveling to socialist countries when it involves beneficial activities which can be to the advantage of Guatemala," engineer Rafael Castillo Valdez, minister of foreign relations, has said in commenting on statements made by Leonel Sisniega Otero, MLN [National Liberation Movement] deputy.

As was reported in yesterday's edition, Sisneiga Otero has said: "It is unworthy of a minister of Guatemala or any other government official to go to communist countries which are considered enemies of our country."

The congressman was referring to a press report in which it was indicated that engineer Edgar Ponciano Castillo, minister of agriculture, will attend a meeting organized by the FAO which will take place in Havana, Cuba, in the early part of September.

It Can Be Beneficial

When asked about the statements by the MLN deputy, Minister Castillo Valdez said that Guatemala is 100 percent democratic, that this is guaranteed by President Lucas Garcia and that freedom of speech is one of its main characteristics.

"Every citizen," he said, "may express his opinions on any subject and all the more so when a deputy is involved who represents a large number of Guatemalans. On this basis, I respect congressman Sisneiga Otero's opinion.

"In this case, the event to be held in Havana includes important subjects which will benefit our country. It is being organized by the FAO, a UN agency.

"On many occasions, Guatemalan delegations have attended meetings at that level in socialist countries, including Russia, the PRC and others, in order to learn about the advances in technology applicable to certain activities.

"I consider it important that Guatemalans be brought up to date on advances in technology so that after returning to this country the things learned can be put into practice. If what is specifically involved is the acquisition of technical knowledge it is well worth while traveling to whatever country it may be."

Minister Castillo Valdez cited as an example the recent sports delegation which participated in the Olympics held in Moscow.

"I believe, therefore, that it is worthwhile for the minister of agriculture and other Guatemalan officials to attend the meeting which will take place in Havana, Cuba."

'SOCIALIST' SIGNIFICANCE OF SANDINIST ANNIVERSARY CITED

Guatemala City DIARIO DE CENTRO AMERICA in Spanish 21 Jul 80 pp 3, 6

[Editorial: "True Meaning of Sandinist Anniversary"]

[Text] Let us not be deceived. The United States is a thousand kilometers away, Guatemala is only a few hundred. Let us not lend a deaf ear nor make ill-advised remarks. Central America is going through a serious moment in its history. The characteristics, participating personalities, concepts employed, attitudes brought out and positions adopted at the commemorative ceremonies of the Sandinists which took place in Managua on Saturday, 19 July, call for a review of positions and very serious thinking about the historical circumstances existing in countries of the isthmus at this time.

A review of opinions in Guatemala provides the following kaleidoscope of political appraisals regarding the situation:

The U.S. Line

First, there is a certain attitude which resembles the current U.S. line and which could be defined as "nothing is happening," "all is well," "we have to keep close to the communists who are winning," "we have to join those who are helping in their victory," "we must be with them," "if they criticize and insult us, let us take those things as little vexations, as things that are unimportant," "let us join those who support the triumph of socialism," "let us praise the Soviet-Castroite penetration in America."

This may be the most danerous, risky and perhaps irresponsible political line that could be followed by the countries threatened by the advance of leftist forces whose goal is power, the takeover of the government, and the submission of more countries to the Communist aegis.

Other institutions and persons believe that the celebration of the first anniversary of the Sandinist victory dispelled many doubts: the socialist world celebrated a milestone in its advance.

The celebration of the first anniversary of the fall of the government presided over by Gen Anastasio Somoza in Nicaragua actually constituted an international festival of the socialist triumph, and more specifically of Soviet-Castroite penetration in America.

The Cuban leader, Fidel Castro, spoke out in a speech as if he had been speaking in his own country dominated by a longstanding 20-year-old dictatorship.

He used the same slogans, the same doctrines and the same abuses that he uses in Cuba. He spoke to the Nicaraguans in the same tone and with the same arguments that he uses on his own island. Anyone could gather that for Fidel Castro, Nicaragua is another Cuba now.

The members of Nicaragua's Government Junta expressed their support for the leftist movements of Angola, Namibia and Korea as well as for the Palestinian cause, the independence of Puerto Rico, and the subversive forces in El Salvador. They even went so far as to express their support for an anti-Central American cause, backing the presumptuous independence on Guatemalan soil of Belize.

Ortega said that he was against imperialism, Zionism, etc. It was a feast of socialist words and deeds. It was a show of splendor of what purports to be the triumph of socialism in America and throughout the world.

We should not be misled. With regard to Guatemala, Ortega alluded to Attorney Mario Sandoval Alarcon, leader of the National Liberation Movement (MLM), branding him as a murderer and hurling other insults at him.

The members of the Nicaraguan Government made sparkling allusions in their oratory to capitalistic injustice, to the exploitation of the poor nations and to the low prices paid for raw materials bought from these countries.

Bowdler, one of the schemers in the seizure of power by the Sandinists, had to tolerate and listen to 10 minutes of insults against his country plus the bluster from Castro during the celebration of Somoza's fall, to which he contributed in part.

Important sectors of opinion in Guatemala believe that the Sandinist Government of Nicaragua placed the United States of America in a dilemma in that on the one hand, the United States would feel it was committing an international faux pas by not participating in the celebration of the first anniversary of the overthrow of former President Somoza, while on the other, it ran the risk of being relegated to second place if it did attend. This did in fact place President Carter's government in a very difficult and conflicting situation.

It is considered here that the U.S. delegation had to deal with a critical moment that may possibly have no precedent in its history.

For more than 10 minutes the U.S. delegation--which had already been placed several rows behind the delegations from the socialist countries on the dais --had to listen to insults against its country and its policies, consisting in part of the aspersions cast by Fidel Castro, the foremost personality at that celebration. The harshest attack came during the 8 minutes that Sandinist Junta member Daniel Ortega Saavedra spent recounting a history of Nicaragua as the permanent victim of aggressive U.S. policies, the big stick, interventionism and the exploitation of little countries. He accused the United States of swallowing up Nicaragua, of conspiring with traitors who have committed murder, and of continuing to support dictators, such as Somoza, contrary to all the aspirations of countries subjugated to imperialism.

This version, which constituted a severe censure of the United States, had to be tolerated and listened to with stoic, or rather diplomatic patience by the neat and tidy delegation, headed by the current under secretary of state for Latin American Affairs, William Bowdler, one of the schemers in the seizure of power by the Sandinists in Nicaragua.

Castro spoke clearly: He announced the long calvary of penury and dictatorship that the people of Nicaragua can expect under the Sandinists.

The words spoken by Fidel Castro at the celebration of the first anniversary of the overthrow of former President Anastasio Somoza held in Managua on Saturday, 19 July, clearly illustrates for the Nicaraguan people the harsh calvary that awaits them as a result of the enthronement of a socialist dictatorship under the guise of Sandinism.

Castro told the Nicaraguans that "the road you will have to follow is long," in other words, that this road will be the same one that his regime has imposed in Cuba: 20 years of failure, 20 years of talking about hardships that will have to be overcome, 20 years of promising a higher standard of living, 20 years of presenting the hoax of freedom, of making illusionary promises, and of fantasies that never come true.

The only truth in Cuba is the massive wish of the Cubans to flee from the regime imposed by Castro. The anti-imperialism of which Castro spoke to the Nicaraguans is nothing more than submission to the harshest of true imperialisms, the imperialism of the Soviets.

Junta member Tomas Borge has already spoken about the deficit recorded in Nicaragua between production and consumption, and he has already begun to use the words of the Castroite jargon, pleading for work and discipline.

In other words, in the face of the exhaustion of private initiative and the spontaneous desire to produce, they appeal to discipline, which is based on the whip, submission, forced labor and an oppressive bureaucracy.

Borge and Ortega stressed the rank and file committees and the organization of the masses. It is logical that they should stress their only power base, the one that provides imposition of control over the people's freedom.

Private initiative is curtailed and government control grows. Just as the Junta members declared at the aforementioned ceremony, properties confiscated from the Somoza family are being managed by government organizations. There is no access by the people to ownership of the land, as was promised during the campaign that preceded the seizure of power.

In his plan to promote demagoguery Fidel Castro made childish mistakes in his long speech to the Nicaraguan people in Managua.

Talking about U.S. economic aid to Nicaragua, Castro said that instead of financing the armaments race, the U.S. should help countries in need, such as Nicaragua.

The fact is that according to several authroized sources, the United States now lags behind the Soviet Union in weaponry. It is the USSR that is ahead in the world armaments race at the moment.

Of course Castro would not say that instead of investing in arming itself, the USSR should use its funds to help the nations in need of assistance, such as Nicaragua. However, the mistake of making trite remarks critical of the United States based on the armaments race is also obvious.

Another very clear aspect of this Sandinist celebration was the revelation of clear support by the government of Nicaragua for the subversive activities in El Salvador.

Following the slogan of the extreme leftist forces that are fighting against the government Junta in El Salvador, Daniel Ortega urged all countries to condemn "the murders of farm workers, intellectuals and laborers," and to condemn "the genocide of which the Salvadoran people are the victims."

Pursuing the policy of giving free rein to the leftist forces, he said that Nicaragua was opposed to any intervention in El Salvador which "would open the wounds in Latin America even wider."

For this type of political alignment, "intervention" would be any aid tending to lead to a democratic system that could defend itself from leftist aggression, which would put an end to any freedom in that Central American country.

BOMB EXPLOSIONS--Approximately 10 bombs filled with subversive propaganda exploded yesterday in various parts of the country, including Quiche Department and this capital. It was, perhaps, at the city courthouse where the explosion of two of these bombs caused the worst panic. Many employees and other persons there ran up and down the stairways screaming. The bombs exploded on the 12th and 13th floors. The leaflets scattered by the bombs carried attacks on the government and urged the people not to participate in Sunday's demonstration. Other explosions occurred on 40th Street, Zone 8; 10th Avenue and 13th Street, Zone 1 and on 8th Street, between 10th and 11th Avenues, also in Zone 1. The explosions occurred at different times. An anonymous phone caller to the newspaper EL GRAFICO said that at 14th Street and 10th Avenue downtown there was a package containing a press communique. It turned out to be a bomb. No one was injured as a result of these actions. In Santa Cruz, Quiche Department, a bomb explosion seriously damaged a former police headquarters building. Finally, another bomb exploded in Chichicastenango, also in Quiche. The bombs were apparently part of a nationwide plan of the extreme left. PAPER HAILS U.S. SUPPORT OF COUNTRY DURING TRANSITION

[Text] The U.S. ambassador to our country, Mrs Mary Luci Jaramillo, reiterated on the 26th of this month in San Pedro Sula that her government is sympathetic to the transition from a de facto to a constitutional regime, which despite the violence surrounding us, is taking place in a climate of peace that is truly surprising.

The ambassador, who visited this city to inaugurate an Occupational Health and Safety course, said that "because the extremist movements in the Central American region are close by Honduras, they have had an impact on Hondurans' mood," but they have awakened a democratic interest in them, and therefore everyone is helping to maintain the calm that the nation is currently experiencing.

After commenting that in this evolution towards a democratic system everything is proceeding as expected, Dr Jaramillo underscored that what impresses her the most is the way that the entire nation is taking part in furthering the process of return to a constitutional order.

In spelling out the U.S. stand on what is happening in our midst, the ambassador said that "in point of fact, we are supporting Honduras, because we feel that accomplishing a radical change from a de facto to a constitutional government in a democratic and bloodless way is an example to the rest of the world."

In this regard, she added that "my government has tried to spur on this process to the extent that it has been able to show other countries that believe that changes are possible only through revolution that there are other ways. In a short while," she stressed, "Honduras will be a model that others can imitate."

In addition, the recently appointed undersecretary of state for inter-American affairs contended that even if former California Governor Ronald Reagan should get to the White House, the essence of U.S. foreign policy would be unlikely to change.

"The emphasis on human rights is basic as far as the U.S. Government is concerned, and that will not change," she maintained. There might be modifications in administrative methods and minor changes, but the essence will not be altered radically.

In conclusion, reflecting briefly on her new post in the State Department, she underscored that her ties with our country would grow stronger, not weaker, inasmuch as given her new status, "Hondurans should realize that they will have one more friend in Washington."

"After learning what Honduras is really like, I will always be willing to cooperate with you in whatever way I can," were Dr Jaramillo's final words.

Although the full text of her statements is remarkable, in that it clearly demonstrates the affection that the ambassador has developed for our country in the relatively short time that she was among us, the most noteworthy element, from a political standpoint, is the U.S. Government's clear-cut, express and firm decision to back our move towards democracy, not only as a solution tailored to the specific situation in Honduras, but also as a recipe for Latin American countries in general, which in recent decades have been the victims of ferociously repressive dictatorships.

The experience in Nicaragua, developments in El Salvador and the events in precommunist Cuba have taught Uncle Sam an important lesson: the persistence of oppressive conditions, institutionalized violence, lack of basic freedoms and mass poverty is the fundamental factor in the development of revolutions.

In an objective analysis of actual conditions on the subcontinent we cannot, of course, overlook that the agents of totalitarianism never rest and that they make use of Soviet money, propaganda and arms to set our countries afire, but experience shows all too clearly that extremism cannot flourish where there is freedom, democracy, justice and a serious struggle against underdevelopment.

To cite an old but obvious example: Why has Marxism never been able to expand in Costa Rica, even though the Communist Party is legal and participates regularly in elections?

Simply because these advocates of chaos have nothing to offer the people that democracy has not already given them: education, health care, jobs, social security, civil rights, human rights, in short, a decent, agreeable and ever-improving life.

In contrast, why were the radicals victorious in Nicaragua? Simply because the people could no longer tolerate an authoritarian, dynastic regime in power for almost half a century and took the risk of backing the people who were struggling against it, without knowing what would happen afterwards.

Honduras unquestionably has an extraordinary opportunity to undertake in peace the political, economic, social and cultural change that the times demand and that the people are justly calling for.

The only thing that we have to do is abolish corruption, create more jobs, abandon sectarianism, combat egoism and excessive ambition, reflect on our homeland with sincerity and devotion and dedicate our finest efforts to it.

Mary Luci Jaramillo tells us that we have a major ally in this undertaking: the people of the United States. Let us, then, do our share and enthusiastically build a nation that we, and those who come after us, can feel proud of because it is an oasis of freedom, democracy and justice in today's troubled world....

BRIEFS

JAMAICA BANK WORKERS STRIKE--Workers of Jamaica's Central Bank have been on strike for 3 days running. The 500 employees are demanding a wage increase in comparison to their counterparts in the commercial banking sector as well as other fringe benefits. However, efforts are being made by the Minister of Labor to resolve the dispute at a meeting between representatives of the workers union and the bank. The strike has already hampered Jamaica's foreign exchange transactions. [Text] [FL100051 St George's Radio Free Grenada in English 2330 GMT 9 Sep 80]

SALVADORAN PEOPLE'S STRUGGLE AGAINST IMPERIALISM HAILED

Managua BARRICADA in Spanish 17 Aug 80 p 3

[Article by Oswaldo Zuniga: "El Salvador--The People Have Shown That Victory Is Near"]

[Text] The fourth general strike of the Salvadoran people ended on 15 August. Without any doubt, this campaign of struggle will provide important experience and great lessons for the Unified Revolutionary Leadership and the people of El Salvador.

Unlike earlier strikes, this last one was strengthened by a major armed mobilization by the masses, better coordination and nationwide scope.

Finally, the people of El Salvador are learning from the blows dealt by the Christian democratic military dictatorship. There is talk now of dozens of guardsmen reported as casualties, while fewer were recorded among the revolutionary forces. We have also seen the desperation of the government leaders' efforts to separate the people of El Salvador from their legitimate leaders. If indeed this strike did not reach 100 percent, the steps taken thereby will be a positive contribution to future revolutionary action.

The deserted streets, empty shops, paralyzed factories, huge patrols, intensive vigilance by helicopters and planes, armed clashes of broad scope, economic sabotage, attacks and assaults upon military sections, seizures of settlements, barricades, militia incursions and, for the first time, the appearance of heavily armed and uniformed combatants, reveal a higher level of struggle.

The people of El Salvador, learning from history, have structured and put to the test in this strike a great mass front, the broadest ever in the history of this brotherly people--this is another of the most important steps forward. The Revolutionary Democratic Front (FDR) is now a belligerent force in El Salvador and the masses now recognize it as such, just as they recognize the Unified Revolutionary Leadership as their single vanguard.

The Christian Democratic Military Junta, for its part, has shown that it lacks legitimacy and only remains in power thanks to repression and the support of the imperialists.

New forms of struggle are also flourishing in the daily battle in El Salvador. The people's militia forces and the barricades defended by the settlers and combatants have appeared. During this strike, the army found itself forced to defend the capital, leaving other regions, for all practical purposes, in the hands of the revolutionaries, who also controlled some major highways.

At the cost of blood, sacrifice and heroism, the people of El Salvador have again here written one of the finest chapters in the history of their long liberation struggle.

In this new strike, the sectors suffering most were the eternal victims--the defenseless civilian population. The same thing has happened in our country. Everywhere in the world, when it becomes impossible to strike at the revolutionary forces, the repressive armies attack indiscriminately, causing heavy casualties among the civilian population, which they then label a guerrilla force.

The strong and vigorous workers' movement and the presence of the rural workers as basic pillars in this strike constitute another indication that the struggle in El Salvador has a broad popular base which will inevitably lead it to victory.

The international discredit earned by the junta, the brutal repression and the demagogy seem to be reaching their end. The United States, even with all its constributions in the economic, technical, military and media sectors, has been unable to force this heroic people into submission.

El Salvador is today the weakest link in the chain of imperialist domination in Latin America. The Salvadoran revolution will be decisive in changing the balance of forces in favor of peace in Central America, in favor of progress and democracy. Therefore the Latin American peoples can only view the struggle of our Salvadoran brothers with sympathy. The exploited and oppressed peoples of America are seeing their own struggle in that of the Salvadoran people.

And the people of Nicaragua have given and will continue to give their solidarity to the people of El Salvador in their just and heroic struggle.

TRANSITIONAL GOVERNMENT IN HONDURAS CRITICIZED

[Article by Gregorio Selser: "Power Games in Honduras"]

[Text] On 20 April 1980, elections were held in Honduras. A constituent national assembly was to be elected to draft a new constitution, and, simultaneously, to decide what should be done with the present government, that is whether a civilian should be appointed to replace the three military officers serving as chiefs of state, or if elections for this sole purpose should be immediately convoked.

As a constituent assembly, this body had the undisputed power to designate the president of the nation by a simple majority of votes, and a good part of the unexpected majority the Liberal Party (PL) won in the elections is explained by the desire of the electorate to have the military replaced in peaceful and legal fashion, by voting. For contrary to all predictions and presumptions, the liberals won 490,000 votes, exceeding the number won by the Nationalist Party (government and conservatives) by 74,000 votes. The Christian Democratic Party (PDC) was neatly excluded and a third group, the Innovation and Unity Party (PINU) won 32,000 votes.

The Annointing

The constituent national assembly was made up, then, on the basis of the 20 April results, of 35 liberal deputies, 33 nationalists and 3 from the PINU. The 35 from the PL and the 3 from the PINU made up the majority required to designate a president, and it was erroneously presumed that the leader of the PL, Roberto Suazo Cordova, would be the "annointed." He is a civilian apparently uncontaminated by any collaboration with the military, who were in power uninterruptedly from 1963 on, except for the brief 18-month term of engineer Ramon Ernesto Cruz.

But just a few days before the triumph was known, the first rumors about a compromise between the PL and the military began. Specifically, there were references to secret talks between Suazo Cardova and Gen Policarpo Paz Garcia, acting chief of the government military junta (the other two are Cols Amilcar Zelaya, chief of police, and Domingo Alvarez, commander of the air force). As a result, it was said, the PL would not object if the constituent assembly decided to retain the armed forces for a determined period, at the end of which and prior to the approval of another constitution, new elections, direct this time, would determine the new president.

In synthesis, it appeared that the triumphant PL, enabled to recover power without any violence and legally (it was known that during an interview between Carter and Paz Garcia in March, the latter promised the American president to respect the decision of the voters), indifferently abandoned that capacity and distorted the will of the majority in the country, agreeing to the plan whereby Paz Garcia and the armed forces would continue in power.

The opposition newspaper PATRIA, in Tegucigalpa, noted the following in its 12 July issue, i.e. 8 days before the formal establishment of the assembly, in connection with the negotiations being pursued to resolve the problem of the transitional government:

"These talks, in which the armed forces are participating like yet another political party, with similar claims against the traditional forces in Honduras, are a vulgar contest for the highest government posts. Except for the PINU, none of the participants have formulated a program or taken into account in any way the great problems and terrible needs of the people of Honduras."

The "Peruvianists"

At a time when the army had warned the PL and the PN that if they did not reach agreement between them about the new cabinet posts, Paz Garcia would resolve the matter on his own with a continuation of the present list, this leader carried out a bold preventive measure against any rebellion in the considerably disturbed military ranks. In fact, in his capacity as commander in chief, "Polo" Paz promulgated a decree on the night of Friday, 1 August, retiring 8 full colonels, 11 lieutenant colonels, a major and 4 captains, as well as 2 generals who in their day were president of Honduras.

In fact, all of those eliminated were regarded as dangerous to the current local power strucure, embodied in the junta and the Superior Defense Council, made up of 32 colonels and lieutenants with troop commands.

The existence of a group of "Peruvianist" officers, a term characterizing the nationalist progressivism of the military officers involved in the first part of the Peruvian process in the days of Gen Juan Velasco Alvarado, has always been a kind of specter.

This group was purged first by Melgar Castro, who believing he was "decommunizing" the armed forces himself destroyed the base of his support by exiling the most capable and enterprising officers, and allowing those most committed to the traditional, conservative order and even linked with the most disturbing aspects of public administration--embezzlement, smuggling and drug trafficking--to continue.

It was a troubled episode connected with this last aspect which gave rise to the removal of Melgar Castro as well. If history tends to repeat itself in some ways, this purge of the high command of the armed forces of Honduras now will leave Paz Garcia exposed to the voracity of--above all or at least--three colonels moving at full speed toward power:

1. Leonidas Torres Arias, head of G-2 (intelligence);
2. Gustavo Alvarez Martinez, commander of the San Pedro Sula region, the most important in the country; and 3. Huber Bodden Caceres, commander of the 11th infantry battalion, regarded as "the CIA's man." We must wait and see.

GOVERNMENT'S REFUSAL TO ESTABLISH TIES WITH CHINA DEPLORED

Managua LA PRENSA in Spanish 20 Aug 80 p 2

[Article by Jose Antonio Arguello A.: "No to China Is No to a Nonalined Nicaragua"]

[Text] Not long ago, a motion was brought before the Council of State that it suggest to the Government Junta the establishment of diplomatic relations between Nicaragua and the People's Republic of China. That motion was rejected.

This situation can but cause a certain sadness and disillusionment, in that we had believed ourselves to be a truly nonalined nation.

Could it be because China is imperialist? Then why do we maintain relations with the United States, and why does the United States maintain relations with Russia?

Could it be because China invaded Vietnam? But did Russia not invade Afghanistan, and yet we have good relations with the Russians?

I talked with a friend, an important member of the Council of State, to learn the true reason underlying the rejection of such an important motion, and the reply was the one I had already anticipated, one that in a few and plain words can be summarized as follows:

"Since Nicaragua has a new and sincere friendship with the Soviet Union, it cannot betray that friendship by establishing diplomatic relations with the People's Republic of China, which has been historically and continues being the Soviet Union's archenemy."

Can the Russian people have given us so much aid toward reconstruction as to mortgage our friendship to such a point?

It is right that we should have friendly relations with the Soviets, but why can we not also have them with the Chinese, in accordance with the proclamations of our leaders when they say: "We are a nonalined nation and we have won for ourselves the right to establish diplomatic relations with all the nations of the world."?

It is entirely admissible that we not have friendly relations with countries like Paraguay and other similar ones ruled by tyrants or gorillas, simply because that kind of government offends human dignity. But why not establish relations with one of the most important nations of the world that did not necessarily submit to the Moscow political line, launching its own authentic revolution, and even though the Soviets consider it a "deviationist" from the authentic Marxist-Leninist line? A relationship with the Chinese would not only benefit us in various fields in which they have achieved excellence, but would also prove to the world that we are genuinely not alined.

It is fitting that we should be grateful to Fidel Castro for the aid he so generously gave to our Revolution; however, it is not a reason why we must refuse to establish relations with those countries that do not have diplomatic relations with Cuba. Or is it that his help must be reciprocated secretly by mortgaging our independence of judgement?

It is proper that we should maintain an important political opening toward the Soviet Union; but it is not an acceptable reason for not establishing one with communist China simply because the two are political enemies.

Where, then, is our nonalinement? Where is our own personality reflected? Has everything then turned out to be but pure and authentic demagogy?

Is our nonalinement then to be a farce, while in practice we demonstrate that we are alined? Are we then alined (like the Cubans) among the nonalined? Are we then not going to have our own authentically Nicaraguan Revolution, which, characterized by our own initiative and personality, sets an example in Latin America?

When will we learn from Marshal Josif Broz Tito of Yugoslavia, who, with a personality and a courage very similar to those of our "General of Free Men," held in check the direct influence of the Russians and blazed his own trails without any "mecca" to which he must turn and humble himself not even in the least?

Our General Sandino must be somewhat upset by this attitude on the part of our government, as I am sure all nonalined Nicaraguans are.

JUNTA MEMBER CRUZ DISCUSSES CURRENT ISSUES

Managua LA PRENSA in Spanish 19 Aug 80 pp 1, 7

[Interview with Dr J. Arturo Cruz, member of the Government Junta, by Pedro J. Chamorro B.; date and place not given]

[Text] Dr J. Arturo Cruz, member of the Government Junta, granted LA PRENSA an interesting interview in which he discussed seven current issues of preemptive immediacy: the country's economic situation; Mrs Violeta's letter; prospects of Reagan's winning the election in the United States; the status of the famous "75 million"; the bill that would require all professionals to associate; the future of elections in Nicaragua; and lastly, the proposal to establish relations with China presented to the Council of State last week by Dr Alvaro Jerez.

1. Country's Economic Situation

[Question] How do you view the future? How is the Economic Reactivation Plan proceeding? Is it true that the private sector is to be the object of greater incentives?

[Answer] a) In my personal opinion, Nicaragua's economic future will depend on the attainment of two conditions that are essential to the achievement of a reasonable degree of overall development. The first of these is that we must consolidate a steadfast internal social peace, and the second is that we must carry on an intelligent foreign policy. In this regard, I feel very optimistic because there are clear signs that in our Revolution Christian justice and patriotic pragmatism will prevail.

A few days ago, I commented to various industry leaders that during a recent visit I made to Cuba I listened to Commander Fidel Castro Ruz as he said the following: "The golden rule that you Nicaraguans will need to follow is to do nothing that hurts your economy." It is advice that I feel is entirely correct in our revolutionary circumstances, since without sustained economic progress the social projects we have set out for ourselves become even more difficult to realize, as do also those of a preeminently political nature.

b) Nicaragua is in the process of a full-fledged reconstruction. However, the first stage is, as we all know, the most difficult. We are experiencing adjustments in a profound social transformation that has as its extraordinary and fortunate characteristic the fact that the Sandinist Revolution is carrying it out in a climate of individual freedom that permits all the social strata to exercise their right to demonstrate actively; and we have come a long way during this period of pluralistic consolidation. It is nevertheless true, however, that much remains to be done to refine some aspects of the official definitions and guidelines, to render them suitable for official action that will be constantly congruent. Besides which, there must also be on the part of the nonofficial sectors--that is, the political, labor and management groupings--a dedication in full, indeed a genuine devotion, to the revolutionary process. When we will have achieved that degree of perfection of our national unity, we will advance with even greater strides than we are now making toward the goals of the Revolution. Total reactivation of the economy will be a natural result of this process. I am certain we will achieve it thanks to the frank and constructive interchange the government leadership maintains with the leaders of the management organizations and of the mass organizations.

The results of the 1980 Economic Reactivation Plan are reasonably satisfactory, if one takes into account the situational difficulties we are facing. The central government's finances show a higher level of revenue in the first half of this year than in the two previous first half-years. We have started generating modest current account surpluses in our credit balance which are a start toward eventual success in our effort to gradually reduce our excessive dependence, inherited from the previous regime, on foreign financing of our investments.

Production in the farming and livestock sector is gaining momentum.

We have also, during this first half-year, improved our domestic credit controls and mechanisms for accelerating, from now on, the carrying out of projects. The reorganization and strengthening of our national financial system is making significant progress. The renegotiation of our foreign public indebtedness with commercial banks is on the verge of a satisfactory conclusion.

The statistics indicate that inflation has been kept below the maximum tolerable level established by the Plan. We have used foreign exchange to the extent it has been necessary to import food, and we have stimulated domestic food production. The harvests of basic grains have been promising and the government is taking the necessary steps to rationalize the supply situation by way of collection and distribution for the protection of the public as regards food supplies and prices.

We are having a hard time in the foreign sector and harder times are ahead in which, to avoid serious foreign exchange shortages, we are going to have to exercise even greater austerity in our imports. Above all else, we are going to have to increase production decisively to import less and export more. The financing we are able to get in support of our balance of payments is but a palliative, not a remedy for our foreign imbalance.

c) It is in our national interest to maintain incentives in the private sector as an inducement to enthusiastic investment and production. A mixed economic system has been established and I would also say that the state productive sector has already been brought into conformity with it. It is therefore in the state's own interest to continue facilitating to all sectors the guarantees they need to develop innovatively, efficiently and vigorously. In the final analysis, our primary concern is that there be the effective state leadership needed to optimize production and channel all surpluses toward the national well-being, which results in the peoples' well-being.

2. Mrs Violeta's Letter

[Question] A copy of that letter was addressed to you, and it has been published as a response to the campaign being waged against LA PRENSA, which has reached a saturation point. "It has now gone beyond that limit," said Mrs Violeta. What do you think of the campaign referred to in her letter?

[Answer] Mrs Violeta's letter has merited the attention of the Junta, in which she enjoys the esteem and respect of all its members. Within the system of freedoms that all we Nicaraguans are enjoying, that great lady of the Nicaraguan Revolution has protested publicly against what she deems to be a campaign against LA PRENSA, which in my opinion is occurring within that same climate of freedom. I of course understand the solidarity felt by the widow of Pedro Joaquin Chamorro Cardenal with the newspaper that served as a forum from which this illustrious and heroic founding father of our nation preached the freedom of the Nicaraguan people, a cause to which he frequently sacrificed his own freedom and finally gave his life.

3. Foreign Politics

[Question] What is your view of the possibilities that Reagan may become president of the United States?

[Answer] The possibilities seem very real at this point that Gov Ronald Reagan may become president of the United States.

Current polls, however, could result invalid in November, in that the Democrats could win if they all decidedly supported President Carter's reelection campaign, appealing to the electorate to vote for the party's philosophy rather than in accordance with the candidate's popularity standing.

Ironically, not only is the model of our Nicaraguan Revolution the one most advantageous to the political interests of the United States itself in a Latin America that day by day becomes more revolutionary, but our Revolution is also certain to be found acceptable by the majority of Americans as they gradually come to learn more about it.

It is to be supposed that if Mr Reagan is elected he will act rationally toward Nicaragua. It is also important that we Nicaraguans remain cognizant of that potential receptivity on the part of the Americans and do nothing to jeopardize it gratuitously.

4. Foreign Aid

[Answer] In the first place, you will recall that the United States has already advanced us $15 million.

In the second place, we are currently engaged in talks with the American Embassy, refining a few points, in preparation for the signing of the agreement.

Upon signature of the agreement, we are to receive $40 million more, and the rest subsequently.

5. Bill Requiring All Professionals To Associate

[Question] Do you not think this bill is contrary to the Basic Law on Freedom of Association? Do you not think it is dangerous for the state to exercise control over all members of the professions? Is this bill not at variance with the democratic principles of a pluralistic society?

I have not yet been able to familiarize myself with it sufficiently to analyze the bill, which may have positive aspects as well as conflictive ones. I therefore cannot properly express an opinion on it at this time. However, I do wish to state that I am certain it will be studied carefully to avoid unnecessary traumas among the professionals; such traumas could be deadly, since as we all know--and I have said it many times publicly-- the critical variable in our nation's economic reactivation is the qualified human factor.

6. The Elections

[Question] Could you tell us something about the future of the elections and whether it is true that they will not be the kind held in Costa Rica and the United States?

[Answer] The leaders of our revolutionary vanguard have said that suffrage is a right that the people have won for themselves. No one is trying to evade the fulfillment of that obligation. The profound sense of honor of the Revolution is to be trusted.

The form of elections that is to be used will have to be modeled on the principles and practices of a genuine democracy.

I believe that when this question is posed to any public official like myself who under normal conditions would have had to be elected by direct popular vote, his or her answer, to be complete, must include recognition of the fact that he or she occupies that position as the result of a state of emergency and that, like all emergencies, it is of a transitory nature.

Taking into account all these considerations, the Nicaraguan people should feel assured that the day is not far off when the Revolution will, by way of elections, consult them so that they can express freely who they wish their leaders to be and what kind of mandate they wish to confer upon those leaders.

7. Relations With China

[Answer] I fully respect the Council of State's decision to reject the establishment of diplomatic relations with the People's Republic of China proposed by Dr Alvaro Jerez. Nevertheless, I do not hesitate to state my personal opinion that a timely reevaluation of this important issue is in the national interest.

COMMANDER PASTORA DISCUSSES ACHIEVEMENTS OF REVOLUTION

Havana VERDE OLIVO in Spanish 3 Aug 80 p 19

[Report on an interview with Commander Eden Pastora by Javier Rodriguez, PL special correspondent; date and place not given]

[Text] The quantitative and qualitative leap made by the Sandinist Peoples Militias on a par with the development of our heroic Sandinist Peoples Army allows us to state that we are capable of confronting any internal or external aggression against our revolution and sovereignty.

The man speaking to Prensa Latina is one of the best known Nicraguan guerrilla commanders.

The mission which he led during the popular insurrection against the Anastasio Somoza tyranny shook the regime and also made many tremble with excitement. We are speaking of brigade commander Eden Pastora, "Commander Zero" of the taking of the National Palace in Managua in 1978.

On that day the daring Sandinist commander took as hostages within the official facilities almost 3,500 people, among them many officials, legislators of the Somozist Parliament and even some relatives of the dictator. This forced Somoza to free dozens of political prisoners who were members of the FSLN [Sandinist National Liberation Front].

Now Pastora is viceminister of Defense in the Government of National Reconstruction and commands the now strong Sandinist Peoples Militias. In an interview he speaks with enthusiasm about the people's own defense organization.

"The level of revolutionary awareness and political development among our people is high. The enthusiasm with which they have massively joined the militias both in the urban and rural areas has enabled us to gauge this. We already have tens of thousands of militiamen and our goal will be 200,000 Nicaraguans incorporated into this force and ready to defend their revolution."

A short pause and he continues:

"The Peoples Militias are the continuation of the army of Sandino and of the combatants in the insurrection against Somoza that forced the National Guard to flee. It is our workers and peasants who train themselves militarily as an expression of their support of the revolution and their love of the fatherland."

For the guerrilla commander internal counterrevolution is not a serious threat to the survival of the revolutionary process and the isolated outbreaks that have cropped up until now in the country have been rapidly crushed by the people.

"The greatest danger that Nicaragua would have to face would be foreign military intervention, be it from the imperialist armed forces or from Latin American armies which are members of reactionary military organizations. It is precisely because of this that arms are given to the people because one should never discount the possibility of a desperate attack by the ultrarightist forces or an adventurist attack. Anyway, if that were to happen here, the results would be the same as when Sandino defeated the Yankee interventionists."

Another role that Pastora assigns to the Peoples Militias is that of persuading a potential enemy because the realization that a whole people is on a war footing for the defense of its achievements will cause the false illusions to disappear in the minds of some who yearn for the return of their lost privileges.

In that respect he recalled the important work done by the militiamen in protecting the tens of thousands of literacy workers who are waging a successful battle against ignorance in the most isolated regions of that Central American nation and the vigilance over public property, work places and social facilities.

The conversation now turns to an analysis of the achievements obtained by Nicaragua in its first year of revolution:

"We have great quantities of marine resources. We have coffee, cotton, sugarcane and cattle. We are the granary Central America. We possess great resources in our mines, all the land is of first quality and we can count on a working people, which is the greatest treasure."

He thinks for a moment about a question. Yes, the commander misses his life as a guerrilla. According to his own words, he yearns for his life as a clandestine fighter. His last words refer to that topic:

"And I miss it most when I hear about the sufferings of other people, how students are killed in sister nations, how peasants are burned alive inside a seized embassy, how they kill a priest who was acting according to the mandates of the new Christ. At those moments I yearn for my rifle of the insurrection but I also reaffirm my trust in the desire for liberty among the Latin American peoples."

PSD HEAD RESPONDS TO PASTORA'S STATEMENT ON ELECTIONS

Managua LA PRENSA in Spanish 20 Aug 80 p 5

[Text] With reference to certain statements by Commander Eden Pastora on the issue of the elections, Mr Wilfredo Montalvan, secretary general of the PSD [Social Democratic Party], has responded with an open letter, which we publish below.

Commander Eden Pastora
National Head of the MPS [Sandinist Popular Militias]
Managua

My dear Eden:

It was with utmost surprise that I read your statement to the AGENCIA NUEVA NICARAGUA in which you say you are not in agreement with the holding of elections "at this very moment."

No one has demanded elections "at this very moment."

We are fully in agreement that the National Reconstruction Plan is the main task to which we Nicaraguans are all committed, but part of this Plan consists of a Political Reconstruction that can only begin to get under way when our people will have come to know the exact dates set for free, periodic and secret elections throughout the country.

Entirely on the contrary to what you state, those of us who are demanding free elections are not opposed to economic reactivation, but we are firmly convinced that setting the reference dates will contribute to creating the climate of confidence and credibility that is needed so that everyone can work in peace and tranquility, without uncertainty as to the future.

I am surprised that you refer to those who demand free elections as demagogues; from which it seems that you have already forgotten that we took part together in the 22 January 1967 Movement, the purpose of which was precisely to demand elections, and for the sake of which we suffered imprisonment and torture, and hundreds of our companions were cut down, massacred by Somozist bullets on Avenida Sandino for demanding that right which many of us Nicaraguans are demanding again today.

I am also surprised that you have expressed yourself in this way; for, I had the pleasure of seeing and hearing you interviewed by the Costa Rican television network just a few moments before the start of our victorious march on Managua on 19 July 1979. In that interview, you asserted that your greatest aspiration was "to some day see free elections take place in Nicaragua like those held periodically in Costa Rica."

Now then, Eden: Who are the demagogues? Those who yesterday, when they were not in power, said one thing, and today another, or those of us who, faithful to our principles, continue struggling to bring to reality the great aspirations of the Nicaraguans?

Fraternally,

PAPER DEFENDS GOVERNMENT'S NEW ELECTION LAW

Managua LA PRENSA in Spanish 26 Aug 80 p 2

[Text] In order for a revolution to take root and endure, it must be the result of a democratic process. Those that are imposed do not grow roots. We are, therefore, glad that the Sandinist Front proclaimed on the 23rd that a participatory democracy with elections would be one of the revolution's constitutional structures, a democracy of the people, not a statist one, a republican not a dictatorial democracy.

The ambition of all true democrats and progressive-minded persons in Nicaragua and the Americas is for the people "to participate in political, economic, social and cultural affairs" because "the more the people take part in these areas, the more democratic the system is," because democracy is economic as well as political and because its goal is to gradually do away with "social unequalities," and "for workers and peasant farmers to raise their standards of living." Furthermore, as the FSLN [Sandinist National Liberation Front] pronouncement says, this participation ought to be broadened so that "the people influence and determine their government," and in addition democracy means "participation by the workers in the management of factories, farms, cooperatives and cultural centers." (Participation is the opposite of exclusion, the opposite of relinquishing.)

Participatory democracy has been the democratic ideal of LA PRENSA, which has upheld and defended this concept editorially since the heroic times of Pedro Joaquin Chamorro. A participatory democracy entails pluralism and freedom of expression and opinion. Or, as the front's pronouncement says, "it reaffirms constructive criticism as the only fruitful criticism, and dissent and pluralism as essential components of Sandinist democracy."

Finally, the front puts the finishing touches on its definition of democracy by citing another essential part of it: elections, that irreplaceable form of participation by the people in the selection of their leaders and government.

Elections are decisive in the tradition of the Americas. Democracy cannot survive if authority, any authority, is allowed to remain outside the voting process and the will of the people. Without these controls and without changes, power immediately becomes entrenched and turns absolute and dictatorial. We see the emergence of irreplaceable men, "strong men," the predestined individuals who break down the democratic edifice from its foundations, destroying its two pillars of support: freedom and equality.

The ability to change governments through elections is the only known political antidote to the temptations of power. And those who have fought against one dictatorship must now erect, as a final element in the reconstruction process, legal structures so that the evil that we have just felled does not raise its head again.

"In 1984," the front says, "we must begin the electoral process through which the Nicaraguan people will decide the government that will continue building the new Nicaragua."

One can agree or disagree with the time period stipulated. We can debate the step-by-step process of participation, which must be in keeping with actual conditions here. But now that democratic structures have been proclaimed as part and parcel of the revolutionary process, the first thing that must be abolished is the aggressive language, the language of war not peace, the hostile and haughty language that unjustifiably creates enemies and misunderstandings both here and abroad.

Democracy is impossible with this separatist and unconciliatory language. Democracy means dialog.

If democracy has been proclaimed, let's speak its language. We cannot build a democracy with the language of a dictatorship.

ROLE OF POLITICAL PARTIES IN PAST CRITICIZED

Managua BARRICADA in Spanish 27 Aug 80 pp 3, 5

Our people's revolutionary struggle has historic grounds and sufficient legitimacy to invalidate any political claim by sectors responsible for our backwardness and exploitation.

The struggle of the people's movement was not just a rebellion to question a government. The purpose of the struggle by the people's movement was to construct a new Revolutionary Sandinist Government, a struggle to dislodge and destroy the longstanding instrument of domination by the oligarchs and the partners of transnational capital.

Our struggle never came down to replacing the men of that government. The vanguard always called for the destruction of the exploitative government so that we could pave our way towards social progress. This social force, with the FSLN [Sandinist National Liberation Front] in the vanguard, challenged the oppressor government with a revolutionary program to transform both social conditions and ideas. Thus emerged a new concept of government, of its makeup, of the procedures for running it and of the qualifications of men to administer it. The vanguard did not deceive the people. Today, revolutionary interests and reactionary interests are clearly defined in the arena of the political struggle. An organized people, their political development, the revolutionary program and the nature of its actions are the indispensable factors in a new, revolutionary and effective political movement, and this is what is prompting the minority that has been displaced from power to question the process. "The past" is now questioning the new building process.

The political struggle being waged is not just a struggle of political programs among "political parties," as the MDN [Nicaraguan Democratic Movement], PSC [Social Christian Party], PCD [Democratic Conservative Party] and the PSD [Social Democratic Party] would have us believe. Our people know that the struggle in the economic and political spheres is between two contradictory and distinct approaches to social progress and definitive liberation: that of the progressive forces and that of the sectors which assert that "the past was always better."

Our working people are today reminding these gentlemen of that past. Our people are saying: "They promised us everything at each election, but we have nothing." They "offered" the people a package of promises; the people did not have power.

Thus there is a historical explanation for why the radical nature of this revolution frightens the MDB, PSD, PSC, PCD and the other corporations. These sectors deceived the people for decades, either by legitimizing their class brother Somoza in power or by promising government programs that they could not carry out because it would have meant ceasing to exploit the people, which would have entailed their liquidation as a class. They thus supplanted action by the people, denied them their place in history, shattered their organization and values and expropriated them. That is why all of the people's convictions are becoming realities, because they are in power. This people believed in the historic possibility of constructing a people's government and undertook the revolution. This people believes in the new society and the new man and is building them. The people believed in the literacy campaign and carried it out. The people are convinced of the need to defend the revolution in order to continue moving forward and are organizing in militias, in an army, are generating unity to be victorious. The people believe in their vanguard because it has grasped and guided their ambitions and interests.

The vanguard has no commitments to the past and it is honest about the limitations that the former regime bequeathed us. It explains them to the people and makes no false promises. The FSLN is the vanguard because it does not propose "third ways" for overcoming our backwardness and exploitation. Those who do want only to disguise exploitation, by seeking one that has no stench.

While the vanguard busies itself with clarifying and explaining the new tasks of the revolution that aim at strengthening the working people, the political groups of the past promise the paradise and the "salvation" of "democracy," which for many long years they expropriated from the people. The battle lines are clearly drawn. The forces of the revolution are engaged in revolutionary tasks to meet the needs of of the present and to build the material base of the future, while the reactionary sectors are still worried about their "democracy" and their profits.

The revolution is strong, gentlemen; it cannot be expropriated.

VIOLETA CHAMORRO DEFENDS PAPER AGAINST ORTEGA ATTACK

Managua LA PRENSA in Spanish 12 Aug 80 pp 1,12

Open Letter

Commander Daniel Ortega S.

Member of the JCRN [National Reconstruction Government Junta] and of the National Directorate of the FSLN [Sandinist National Liberation Front]
Managua

Dear Daniel:

When I saw today, Sunday, 10 August, the program "Meet the People" which was televised in the Subtiava de Leon quarter, I was once again able to observe the unjust campaign which you are waging against the newspaper LA PRENSA--a campaign which has gone far enough.

As a member of LA PRENSA's board of directors, and completely in accord with its policies, I need only tell you that I disagree with your opinion of the newspaper LA PRENSA.

The people of Nicaragua and international opinion are witnesses to the fact that LA PRENSA has always wanted the best for its people, both before and after the cowardly assassination of my husband Pedro Joaquin by Somoza, and the destruction of the newspaper, and that is why the people continue to prefer it. Just as you say, the people are the best judge.

I want to tell you that those who are now working at LA PRENSA are honest people and true Nicaraguan patriots and do not wish our people any harm; quite the contrary, LA PRENSA will continue as long as it can to be the guide and mentor of our people, highly informative and independent, and not for the purpose of profit, as we have shown by risking all on several occasions.

You are well aware, as are the other members of the Junta and several ministers, that when I was working with you for our people, I saw proof that several newsmen, who at that time were employees of LA PRENSA and who are now working for other newspapers were corrupt. What does this mean?... Well, it means that they regularly received money from the Somoza government, and it was not just five cordobas but anywhere from 5 thousand to 100 thousand cordobas. They rendered those "publicity services" up to 3 months before my husband was killed. Fortunately, none of them is still working for LA PRENSA.

I say that the Nicaraguan people and revolutionary justice should judge them; perhaps you will find in them the real counterrevolutionaries which you so diligently are trying to find in LA PRENSA.

Respectfully,

Violeta B. De Chamorro

'LA PRENSA' ATTACKED FOR MISLEADING ARTICLE

Managua BARRICADA in Spanish 27 Aug 80 p 3

[Text] "Brother" Perez and LA PRENSA

It strikes no one as strange that although every so often LA PRENSA describes its "mistakes" as accidental and involuntary and even masquerades as a "scapegoat," it is waging an ongoing campaign of diversionism and sabotage against the revolution in its daily editions.

We often see how it doctors the news (in conformity with the stands of the reactionary parties) in a bid to trigger artificial confrontations between the revolution and patriotic businessmen or between the FSLN [Sandinist National Liberation Front] and the church, or to strike at the economic recovery program or to detract from the prestige of revolutionary institutions and to deny the vanguard role of the FSLN in the revolutionary process.

We find a typical example of how it expresses its intentions in the way in which it highlighted the news item about the "El Alba Home." In its 12 August edition it published a five-column news story under the headline: "Police Close Down Children's Home."

The first paragraph of the story explains that the Sandinist Police and State Security Forces "occupied and closed down" the "El Alba" Temporary Home, which was run by "Brother" Manuel Salvador Perez, Jose Hidalgo, a Salvadoran, and Denis Gonzalez.

The story obviously intended, by its tone, to equate the methods and objectives of the dictatorship's repressive forces with the revolutionary forces' firm and determined defense of our children and the values of our people. This was a good opportunity for LA PRENSA to speak ill of the Sandinist Police and to portray it as a repressive body that goes around arbitrarily closing down "children's homes," in this case, in fact, a religious "home." In other words, resorting to alarmism, the paper wanted to create the conditions for an artificial conflict between the revolution and the church.

But the distortion of the facts did not get very far. In a matter of days the revolution demonstrated that there were criminal designs behind the false priestly vestments of sexual deviate Manuel Salvador Perez, thus confirming LA PRENSA's reactionary and provocative intentions. It did them no good to question the police's charges against "Brother" Perez, in a crass attempt to detract from the legitimacy of this revolutionary organization, because the evidence is overwhelming. Everything has now been unmasked, and the defenders of the deviate Perez, those who hypocritically wanted to make us believe that the government was harming the children and mothers who had been deceived by the impostor, are keeping their mouths shut. We have not yet read in LA PRENSA the upshot of the "El Alba Home" incident, nor do we think that it is going to publish anything about it, because it is of no concern to the paper to acknowledge that "Brother" Perez is a sexual deviate, an impostor, and that the mass organizations and the Interior Ministry's forces acted in legitimate defense of our people and dealt a harsh blow to the reactionaries. The paper would rather remain silent and leave some of its readers with the notion that the revolution acted arbitrarily in this case.

But the people are not fooled, and LA PRENSA's ploy has been completely unmasked.

IMPORTANCE OF FIRM CHRISTIAN-REVOLUTIONARY TIES HIGHLIGHTED

Managua EL NUEVO DIARIO in Spanish 21 Aug 80 p 2

[Article by the CEPA [Agricultural Education and Promotion Center] Team: "Christians, Religious Rallies and Their Political Impact"]

The relationship between religion and politics, as well as the dividing line between them, has often been problematic, inasmuch as man is both religious and political.

The ruling classes in many of Latin America's dictatorships have accused church sectors that identify with the people of "getting involved in politics." On our continent, particularly in Central America, hundreds and thousands of Christians (priests, members of religious orders and lay persons) have sealed their true commitment to the poor with their own blood. These Christians, the priests, brothers and nuns in particular, have been accused of "getting involved in politics" for defending the most elementary rights of the poor, such as the right to life, to work and to freedom of expression. There have also been, however, numerous "military chaplains" (serving oppressive regimes) who justified an essentially unjust, criminal and corrupt order, such as the Somoza dictatorship and other military regimes on our continent.

The exploitative military governments never accused these "chaplains" of "getting involved in politics." There were instances of priests holding several posts in a regime of oppression and death...and let us remember Father Leon Pallais. No bishop asked him to resign from his posts.

The Catholic Church's official stand has been, in principle, one of neutrality towards the various political forces, but it is very difficult, practically impossible, to remain neutral in the midst of a dynamic social process in which competing forces are constantly shaping society. What is clear in the stand reflected in church documents is that it cannot link up unconditionally with any political system.

Neutrality? If the crimes of an oppressive regime are not denounced, there is complicity, not neutrality. If noble efforts such as the Great National Literacy Crusade are not supported, this means backwardness and counteraction against the Nicaraguan Revolution, not neutrality. Support for them means being on the side of the illiterate, exploited people.

We feel that the problem of the dividing line between religion and politics and the use of religion for political purposes necessarily entails an assessment of the goals towards which religious values are being channeled.

For example, "getting involved" in politics to run for a legislative seat held by one of many vote-seeking parties or to maintain a government post by justifying a despotic and anti-people's government, is not the same as involvement in a situation like Nicaragua's, in the construction of a new homeland, in taking up a government post to serve the people in a time of economic crisis.

There is a fundamental difference between a government position held by a priest in the Nicaraguan Revolution today (for example, Father Escoto in the Foreign Ministry, who is inspiring international confidence in our people's revolution so that Nicaragua can achieve greater world support and solidarity) and a post held by a priest as an official of the Somoza government, thus legitimizing a sinful situation to get rich, acquire power and gain privileges.

In short, the involvement of priests in politics cannot be judged in the abstract. We have to ask whom the person in the post is serving: himself and an exploitative minority, or the traditionally underprivileged and exploited masses.

We can say the same thing about mass religious demonstrations. It is an undeniable and objective fact that churches and their leaders (especially the Catholic Church) have a great ability to rally the people and to lend prestige to and legitimize our revolution around the world. Moreover, they can spur Christians towards more decisive involvement in the building of the New Nicaragua. The use of this ability cannot be neutral. It can be used either to defend the people and their interests, or to bring together, support and protect privileged minorities that seek to subjugate our revolutionary process through a system of "bourgeois democracy" in which the people have nothing else to say and decide after the solemn and discredited rite of "elections," which a number of parties are so insistently calling for.

We Nicaraguan Christians have a very great responsibility in consolidating our revolution and Latin America's revolution too. If we succeed in showing the world that Christians are harmoniously and resolutely taking part not only in an insurrection but in a reconstruction as well, we will be giving a decisive push to the liberation of Latin American peoples, and to Christians this means helping to reduce ignorance, exploitation, hunger, poverty, unsanitary conditions, torture and murder.

The lesson of what has happened in El Salvador and Guatemala is clear: the longer exploitative groups dominate, the more pain and death for the people. If we Nicaraguan Christians furnish clear-cut evidence of conscious and resolute involvement in a revolution that is gradually but steadfastly creating new living conditions for the masses, we will be giving a significant push to the revolutionary involvement of Christians in the liberation struggles in their respective countries, and this would give a definitive boost to the Latin American revolution, as "Che" Guevara proclaimed it more than 15 years ago.

This is a very serious responsibility. To a large extent it is up to us Nicaraguans to encourage Christians to get resolutely involved in the struggle for justice in their countries and to ward off much pain, exploitation and especially loss of life for all of our Latin American brothers. This responsibility belongs to our entire people, but especially to us Christians and to those who possess authority in Christian churches.

We have to view our process with new eyes, with a new look, not through the lenses of old anticommunist prejudices stemming from the experiences in Eastern Europe, which have nothing to do with Nicaragua.

We are witnessing today an intense ideological debate on the type of democracy that we are going to create in this country and on the role of churches and Christians in the current revolutionary process.

In this regard, we would like to make a number of observations regarding the solemn festivities being readied in Masaya for the coronation of Our Lady of the Assumption on 17 August.

We feel that celebrations such as these, staged at one of our country's most combative spots (Masaya-Monimbo) and with invitations to well-known figures such as President Cerezo, represent support for bourgeois electoral democracy, by forming a long caravan of "well-to-do Christians" (who have cars and can afford gasoline to travel from Costa Rica to Nicaragua) and by causing a major publicity flourish. They could well serve as a platform for a series of parties and minor groups that are questioning our revolution and calling it undemocratic because it is not at the moment organizing the traditional electoral machinery.

We feel that it is extremely dangerous for events such as the coronation of a revered image of the Virgin Mary to be turned into a sounding board for irresponsible attacks on our Nicaraguan Revolution.

Our religious leaders are ill-advised to consciously or unconsciously play into the hands of these tiny groups, which represent not the general interests of the people but the interests of the minorities who still have some privileges to lose.

If they appear to be giving their blessing to these tiny groups, it could confuse a segment of the people and, furthermore, shrink the social base of our religious leaders, because at this point the Nicaraguan people can see quite clearly who is on their side and who is not. We think that religious leaders have a very serious responsibility to see to it that Christians play as evangelical a role as possible in the building of the New Nicaragua.

In addition, the people worship the Gospel, the Christian faith and Mary the mother of the poor and the bearer of freedom, and thus it would be doubly treasonous to use this religious celebration as a sounding board for demands and interests that are not the people's. We say that it is doubly treasonous because Christian values and the Gospel are aimed primarily at the poor.

There has always been love and devotion for the Virgin Mary in Nicaragua and Latin America because our peoples have sought in her comfort from their afflictions and salvation and liberation from their specific problems. We cannot forget that the Virgin Mary was the banner of many independence struggles in Latin America, in Mexico in particular. The simple people of Nicaragua have always viewed Mary as a champion of liberation, and we cannot allow her to be used as a pretext for international commotion by those who are trying to preserve social inequality intact.

The relationship between faith and revolution, the conscious, resolute and discriminating involvement of Christians in this process is a strategic problem for the Nicaraguan and Latin American revolution. This is why many reactionaries are still striving to portray the Sandinist Revolution and the Christian faith as at odds. Our revolutionary actions are demonstrating the opposite.

We must not allow the propaganda and ploys of local reactionaries to hinder the harmonious incorporation of Christians into the revolution. We must not allow occasions such as the coronation of the Virgin at Monimbo to be used to detract from our revolution's prestige and to diminish international support for Nicaragua, as well as to isolate Christians from a process that by eliminating the causes of widespread hunger, thirst, disease, nakedness and sadness, is shaping a historical situation that draws nearer to the Kingdom of God. Managua, 15 August 1980, Feast of the Assumption.

BAPTIST PASTOR HAILS REVOLUTION'S CHRISTIAN TIES

[Article by Baptist Pastor Jose Miguel Torres; "The Sandinist Revolution and Religious Worship"]

[Text] We Christians must rejoice when we see signs and indications of new times. We had always said--and perhaps it did happen elsewhere -- that a new social change would bring with it persecution of the Christian faith, of the church and of the faithful.

During his recent visit on a study of our CDS's [Sandinist Defense Committees] in the San Judas district, Prof Michael Lowi of the University of Paris noted the vast number of Christians who, motivated by the District Church Communities, made up the large majority of the mass organizations down to their lowest echelons of expression of the people's power, and said that "the change in the relationships within the productive structure has not done away with religion as a superstructural institution. Rather, it has produced a change in the content of the latter."

As we approached the present season of religious feasts in Nicaragua, Commander Tomas Borge urged the public not to let liquor-consumption advertising degrade the meaning of religious feasts down to the level of vices and counterrevolutionary corruption.

Unfortunately, these moralizing initiatives at our feast times are not always accompanied by a Catholic or Protestant pastoral designed to serve as a soundboard for the appeals from the state.

It is sad to see that in places like Chile, the Virgin Mary Queen of the Heavens is at the same time General of the Armed Forces, thus legitimizing the repressions and massacres being suffered by the people; and the church has, over the many years, covered up such maneuvers.

In our Nicaraguan case, even though the state is laic and secular, the leaders of our revolution have always shown respect for the religious nature of our people and, what is more, have made every effort to ensure that our religious festivities do not become instruments of dirty or illegal business, or destroyers of morality.

In the Sandinist Revolution, moreover,the specific actions of its leaders have not stopped there. They have even attended masses and religious ceremonies, taken part in processions like that of Santo Domingo on 1 January, and when the case warranted it, as did the assassination of the well-remembered Archbishop Monsignor Romero, the Sandinist Front has convoked the entire population to a solemn outdoor mass.

Recently, the newspapers carried the story of a dinner attended by Christian businessmen, several national political leaders, representatives of private enterprise, intellectuals and commanders of the Revolution. This way of evangelization is very characteristic of American Protestant churches and, under auspices of World Vision, an international missionary organization, has been adopted in various countries. And although this dinner of the revolutionary commanders and businessmen gave rise to certain purist interpretations, the fact is that Christ himself did on some occasions dine with rich men and sinners. But in our case, what this brought out was the openness of the revolutionary leaders, even towards charismatic Christian sects and toward Protestant Christians devoted to the most diverse of Evangelization criteria.

Perhaps the more important thing would have been to get those Christian businessmen, who even claimed they had prayed for and asked God's blessing on our people and our Revolution, who recognized the validities of our struggle for justice and equality, to convey their testimony, through the extensive chains of the mass media, to the United States, to counter there the aggressive campaign of disparagement, isolation and lies with which some American transnationals and reactionary power groups are trying to smear the example and the hopes that our Sandinist Revolution have kindled.

We can confidently say that our Revolution is in no way antireligious and that at no time has there been the least sign of it. There has been hardly a single event, religious retreat, congress, seminar, lecture, religious meeting, whether Catholic or Protestant, to which the leaders of the Revolution or the officials of some government body have not been invited to contribute with an analysis of the situation, or to orient in some way the frame of reference for Christians. The few cases of friction that have occurred between church and state have not been questions of faith or of the Christian way of life, but rather misunderstandings revolving around the nature of the government. But in these cases, the church knows, as did its Lord, that its mission is to be the suffering servant of society, so that by dint of the love attested in the humility of the second mile, the Gospel will be believed. The attitude of the church, according to Jesus Christ, is not to seek to be saluted in public nor to occupy front row seats, but rather to carry the washbasin and towel and to bathe the people's feet. The power of God will always be manifested in the Cross, in weakness and in poverty.

Let us hope our experience as Christians in the Nicaraguan Revolution will be a workshop of lasting apprenticeship, such that our celebrations of feasts will not become mere folkloric attractions because of a failure on our part to endow them with deeply meaningful content, nor be turned into instrumentalities, seeking thereby to make of them expressions of power. The meaning of the Gospel must be preserved, or we will be bringing about a loss of faith and a loss of confidence in our authenticity.

MARACAIBO OIL DEPOSIT DISCOVERED

Caracas EL NACIONAL in Spanish 21 Aug 80 p D-18

[Article by Argenis Bravo]

[Text] Maracaibo, 20 Aug (Special)--LAGOVEN has discovered 476 million barrels of oil in the Lake Maracaibo basin and is now pursuing its explorations in search of light crudes.

This information was provided by an authorized spokesman for the above enterprise, a subsidiary of the PDVSA [Venezuelan Petroleum, Inc], upon being consulted on the new programs being carried out by LAGOVEN in its traditional areas as well as its newly added ones such as the so-called "Urdaneta Corridor."

The spokesman indicated that LAGOVEN is currently carrying on exploratory work in the Lake Maracaibo basin in search of light crudes.

Exploratory work is being conducted especially in the Cretaceous bed, and particularly the Cretaceous limestones, which are the basin's deepest oil-bearing rocks.

"That exploration," said the spokesman, "in the decade of the 1970's, could be termed 'the exploration of the Cretaceous,' in that all activity has been centered on the drilling of deep wells."

As a new aspect, he mentioned that in 1978 the PDVSA established the basic exploratory planning areas, and that LAGOVEN had immediately begun wildcat drilling activity in the designated new areas, such as the Urdaneta Corridor, southwest of the Lake (both in the Lake Maracaibo region) and Perija.

Under this new policy, the company was given more than 1 million hectares of additional area to be explored, which is equivalent to 90 percent of Lake Maracaibo's area, thus increasing substantially the extent of LAGOVEN's exploratory operations.

Cretaceous Limestones Altered

One aspect worth mentioning is that revised studies of the historical or evolutionary geology of the Lake Maracaibo sedimentary basin reveal clearly that its Cretaceous limestones have been altered over geological time by processes of a technical* type, which deformed them and, in suitable combination with conditions of strategic* type, created favorable situations for the entrapment of hydrocarbons.

According to data collected and verified by LAGOVEN's authorized spokesman, the principal Cretaceous structures in Perija are: Santa Rosa o Tokuko, San Jose, San Julian, Alturitas and Aricaiza.

As regards Lake Maracaibo, the principal structures are: Urdaneta, Icotea, Lama, Lamar, Lago Central, Tia Juana and Bachaquero.

LAGOVEN's exploratory effort in the Lake has as its purpose or basic objective the Cretaceous limestones, whereas in Perija oil is being sought in the Cretaceous. Drilling of shallower wells is to start very soon in Perija, to evaluate the Paleocene and Eocene.

"In 1979," the spokesman said, "LAGOVEN found oil in the recently assigned area of the Urdaneta Corridor and in Perija. We started drilling activities in that district with the Alturitas-6 well, which produced more than 3,000 barrels a day.

"To date, through drillings in Perija with highly satisfactory results, Altos de Alturitas, San Jose and Aricuaiza [as published--see previous spelling] have been evaluated.

"In San Julian, drilling of the San Julian-1 well started on 20 July, and this year Alto de Machiques will be evaluated. Alto de Santa Rosa o Tokuko will be evaluated later. Current seismic surveys and the results of drillings will help to define new prospection areas or to better delineate known ones for the planning of future programs."

* Translator's note: The terms "technical" and "strategic" in this passage are as published. Author's intended reference was probably to "tectonic" and "stratification" processes respectively.

 Translator's note: Author's intended distinction between "the Cretaceous limestones" and "the Cretaceous" in this passage, as published, is unclear, in that "the Cretaceous" used generically in a geological context such as this must be taken to mean the Cretaceous sedimentary sequence, which includes shale, sandstone, limestone, etc., one of which is generally predominant in any one zone.

By way of detail, according to LAGOVEN's authorized spokesman, we understand that LAGOVEN has discovered, through its exploratory work in the Lake Maracaibo basin, 476 million barrels of oil.

The breakdown is as follows: 407 million in previous concessions; 38 million in newly assigned areas or the Urdaneta Corridor; 31 million in areas of exploratory responsibility (Alturitas and San Jose).

"Up to now," our informant reiterated, "we have drilled 83 wells down to the Cretaceous limestones, including wildcat and development wells, and have come up with 65 producers, 13 dry wells, and 5 under current evaluation.

"As regards wildcat wells, our percentage of successes has been high--in the order of 60 percent.

"All of this intense activity has involved an investment in wildcat drilling of the order of 780 million bolivars, which represents a discovery cost of 1.63 bolivars per barrel, and which makes exploration of the Cretaceous attractive from the economic standpoint."

ARGENTINE AMBASSADOR ON BOLIVIAN RELATIONS WITH CHURCH, U.S.

FY151910 Buenos Aires NOTICIAS ARGENTINAS in Spanish 1526 GMT 13 Sep 80

[Text] Buenos Aires, 13 Sep (NA)--Brig Jose Maria Romero, Argentine Ambassador to Bolivia, stated today that he believes the relations between the Catholic Church and the Bolivian Government will "be clarified" because "prudence" prevails within "the two parties." He also said he believes that once "the changes" which prove "the consolidation of President Garcia Meza's government" take place, "the United States will have to recognize the Bolivian Government or strengthen its relations with it." Romero made these statements just before returning to La Paz after spending a week in Buenos Aires to brief the foreign ministry on his mission.

He reiterated that the current situation in Bolivia "is totally calm" and that the "armed forces have full control" of the country since they ousted constitutional President Lidia Gueiler. The ambassador also pointed out that "there has been no report on violations of human rights" under the government of Garcia Meza, which is one of the reasons that moved the Argentine Government to recognize it.

Asked about the criticism and denunciations the Bolivian Church has made against Garcia Meza's regime, Romero said he had learned about them "through the foreign media and admitted that relations between the church and government had been very difficult in the first stage," but he believes they will "be clarified" in the future.

Regarding future relations between Bolivia and the United States, he also believes they will improve as Garcia Meza's government strengthens.

REPORTAGE ON AGRICULTURAL DEVELOPMENTS, TRENDS

'Negative Conditions' Scored

Buenos Aires LA PRENSA in Spanish 19 Aug 80 p 12

[Text] Santa Fe (NA)—The president of the Argentine Rural Confederation (CRA), Jorge Aguado, complained that many economic sectors "are trying to pull themselves up on the basis of the agricultural sector's just demands," describing that objective as "unspeakable."

Aguado spoke in Rafaela, some 80 kilometers from here, at the opening of the 74th National Livestock, Agriculture and Industry Fair and the 60th Milch Cow Competition, which brought in producers from all over the province.

The rural leader underscored "the difficult situation that the agricultural and livestock sector is going through," but he said that we must not forget "the situation that prevailed from 1973 to 1976, in order to draw comparisons that will enable us to define and clarify our judgments."

Aguado justified "the goals that the National Reorganization Process has established to give the country the order and prosperity that we all require."

The agricultural and livestock sector initially received a positive response from economic authorities, in the form of the continued state marketing fees and differential exchange rates, he stated.

Negative Conditions

He went on to say that after the sector received this positive response, which was reflected in the results from 1977 and half of 1978, it is now facing "negative conditions."

He recalled that in 1977 the country recorded its largest crop area, [sic] 21,400 hectares, with prices bouncing back in 1977 and part of 1978 from their 1976 levels, which were negative.

Inability To Reinvest

Aguado pointed out a series of difficulties that "have made the agricultural and livestock sector obviously incapable of reinvesting or reoutfitting itself." He cited as an example that 12,100 tractors were purchased during the first half of 1977, whereas during the same period this year only 2,400 were marketed.

In his address Aguado did an exhaustive analysis of the inflationary impact of higher prices for steers at Liniers, remarking that "it is so minimal as to be insignificant."

Lastly, Aguado urged producers to struggle for the enhancement of the countryside and the nation "without permitting a return to government intervention in the market and to political prices, which are an attack on the right to work and on property itself."

Agricultural Trends Cited

Buenos Aires CLARIN in Spanish 21 Aug 80 p 14

[Text] With the official estimates of corn production (6.4 million tons), soybean production (3.24 million) and millet production (188,000 tons) for the 1979/80 season, which were made public in recent days, we now have final estimates of grain output for the recently concluded agricultural year.

The harvest totaled 24,463,700 tons, 6,849,300 tons less than in the previous season, a decline of 21.9 percent.

Most of the decline in output was due to the drop in the coarse grain crop, which totaled 30 percent, whereas the fine grain crop was down by just 5.2 percent. There are two reasons for the difference. First, the former crops (corn, sorghum, millet, rice, soybeans, sunflower and peanuts) were harder hit by the climatic difficulties in late 1979 and early 1980 (the fine grain crop was practically harvested or about to be). In addition, these crops were also harder hit by the drop in farm prices; this had an impact on their ultimate profit margin, which cut down on the incentive to harvest. With regard to corn, for example, 75 percent of the acreage was harvested, as compared to 85 percent for the 3 previous years.

Moreover, we can see differing trends if we break down the coarse grain crop into cereals and oilseeds. The falloff in the first category was 36.5 percent, whereas the oilseed harvest was down 12 percent.

Key:

1. Farm production (thousands of tons)
2. Wheat
3. Miscellaneous
4. Grains (cereals)
5. Fine grain crop
6. Coarse grain crop
7. Oilseeds

The difference is that the profit margin on grains (mainly corn and sorghum, the two biggest crops) has lagged; in fact, it had already dropped 11.5 percent in the 1978/79 season. In contrast, problems with oilseed prices became evident only since late last year. Until the 1978/79 season they were the most profitable crops in agriculture, which was why their output was boosted that farm year by 28.5 percent, continuing a trend of several years. In other words, an approximately 5-year expansion in these crops, based mainly on the soybean boom, has been reversed.

1. Agricultural yields (kilos per hectare)
2. Comparison
3. Wheat
4. Flax
5. Corn
6. Sorghum
7. Millet
8. Soybeans
9. Sunflowers
10. Peanuts

Yields

Farm production is determined by two factors: acreage and yield. In both instances we see a downward trend in the 1979/80 season. If we limit our analysis to the eight major crops (wheat, flax, corn, sorghum, millet, soybeans, sunflowers and peanuts), the area harvested (which is a more accurate indication than crop area of anticipated grower profit margin at the time of harvest) shows a decline of 5.4 percent, with this area being the smallest of the last 4 years (around 13 million hectares).

This negative trend has spread to all crops, however, even the ones least affected by the weather, if we analyze unit yields (kilograms per hectare). Except for flax, which showed a 3.5 percent rise in yield (760 kilos), the yield for every other crop was down.

The smallest drop was in wheat (1.2 percent), but the figures rise steadily: sunflowers, 8.1 percent; corn, 17.6; millet, 20.8; soybeans, 21.1; sorghum, 24.1, and peanuts with a drop of 40.6 percent. Except in the case of soybeans, sunflowers (because of the oilseed expansion in recent years) and wheat, the 1979/80 season yields are among the lowest of the decade. Even the soybean yield is the smallest of the last 4 years.

Leasing Law Discussed

Buenos Aires CONVICCION in Spanish 22 Aug 80 p 15

[Text] Buenos Aires—The secretary of agriculture and livestock, Jorge Zorreguieta, confirmed yesterday that the proposed amendments to Law 13,246, the Rural Leasing Law, have been submitted to the Legislative Advisory Commission (CAL) for its examination and assessment.

Zorreguieta pointed out that one of the most significant amendments is the limitation of the leasing period to 3 years, instead of 5 with an option for 3 more, "which made it almost impossible for the leasing market to be as smooth as it has to be."

The secretary asserted that what "legislation must reflect and what a decision like this must illustrate is that the country has changed since Law 13,246 was passed."

"No longer do we have owners with 10,000 or 20,000 hectares who apportion their land among 200 tenants, who came here as immigrants and were the settlers of the time."

He added that they worked the land themselves, behind plows pulled by horses over small 50-hectare plots, but now "the situation has changed, and the property is very much subdivided."

"At present," he pointed out, "50 or 100-hectare plots are rented to tenants who have technology, capital and several tractors and harvesters. In reality, they are the big businessmen, whereas the owner of the land is the small-scale capitalist."

When asked whether grower organizations had been consulted, Zorreguieta asserted that "we are familiar with the views of the growers organizations. "Don't forget that I come from one of them." He was referring to the Argentine Rural Association.

He said, however, that "like any bill, it can be improved, and opinions of it could vary in a number of ways, but the bill's general philosophy will lead to a revitalized legal status for tenants."

"I think," he emphasized, "that the bill is in keeping with realities in Argentina as of now, and it is very difficult to defy realities. People will argue that the bill should be even more liberal, and perhaps that is the stand of a number of organizations, but we have drawn up this bill in conjunction with the economy minister and tried to make it reasonable in accordance with the country's needs."

He also recalled that from the beginning of this century until about 1940 "the legal category of leasing made possible upward social mobility, as well as access to property for a person who was first a worker, then a tenant and finally the owner of the land."

"In practice," he noted, "this was stricken from Argentine legislation, because a series of clauses were introduced into the Leasing Law that made it impossible for this category to exist, among them the famous term of contract clause."

He explained that this clause stipulated a minimum term of 5 years for a contract, with an option for another 3, which in practice meant an 8-year lease for the owner of the land.

The measure will unquestionably streamline the mobility of leasings. However, it does not seem to be the best way to achieve stable settlements.

Because of the major amounts of capital needed to bring out the value of a given tract of land, the restricted leasing period will favor leasing companies at the expense of individual settlers, who, since they lack capital, do not have access to high technologies.

Corn Crop Declines

Buenos Aires LA OPINION in Spanish 22 Aug 80 p 11

[Text] There has been a major drop in this year's corn crop; official estimates are that output this year will total just 6.4 million tons, off 26.3 percent from the 1978/79 season.

According to the estimate of the National Rural Economy and Sociology Service, this is the smallest crop since the 1976 harvest and 35 percent below the 1971 crop, which was the largest of the past decade.

In addition, output is estimated at 20.4 percent below the average for the last 5 years and 24.6 percent below the previous 10 farm seasons.

Acreage was almost identical to the previous season's, but climatic factors, which were especially adverse in the provinces of Buenos Aires, Cordoba and Santa Fe, caused a 13 percent fall in the crop area and a 15.5 percenrt drop in the average yield.

According to official estimates, the falloff could reach 28.6 percent (1.05 million tons) in Buenos Aires, the main producing province; 28.1 percent (590,000 tons) in Santa Fe; 36.6 percent (702,000 tons) in Cordoba, and 59.4 percent (184,000 tons) in La Pampa. Offsetting these drops are anticipated increases in output of 35.5 percent (98,000 tons) in San Luis and 14.3 percent in Santiago del Estero.

Farm Equipment Manufacturer Problems

Buenos Aires LA NACION in Spanish 20 Aug 80 p 12

[Text] (NA)--Bernardin of Santa Fe, a manufacturer of harvesters and other farm equipment, reported officially to the Stock Exchange in this capital that it recorded a deficit of more than 4 billion pesos over the first 6 months of the year and that it is seeking a foreign currency loan to cope with the situation.

This information was relayed in a note to the Stock Exchange's director of bonds and securities, Jose Fernandez. It disclosed that the balance sheet for the first quarter showed a deficit of 1,938,362,070 pesos, "due basically to the recognized contraction in the demand for farm machinery."

In analyzing the first 45 days of the third quarter, the report, signed by Alfredo Marzioni as president and Eduardo Candiotti as auditor, indicates that the situation remains unchanged and that, therefore, the company's financial standing "has become extremely critical," adding that "the Board of Directors is negotiating a sizable foreign currency loan to restructure its liabilities and to enable the firm to expand."

BRIEFS

POLICE RAID PERONIST DINNER--Catamarca, 14 Sep (TELAM)--Approximately 50 members of the Justicialist Party [PJ] who were participating in a dinner being held in a downtown restaurant of this city were detained and taken to the investigations directorate, after they were identified. The majority of them were released. Usually well-informed sources indicated to TELAM that the detentions took place in view of an alleged violation of laws that ban meetings of a political nature. The raid took place when police personnel entered the restaurant where the dinner was taking place and ordered the detention of all those who were dining. The diners accepted the order and offered no resistance. They were taken in two black marias to the investigations directorate, where they were identified. Later, the services headquarters of the provincial police reported that the majority of them were released after being appropriately identified. The former president of the provincial chamber of deputies, who was one of the detainees, was also released. An official communique will reportedly be released tomorrow. MAIDANA'S ARREST DENOUNCED--(NOTICIAS ARGENTINAS)--The arrest in Buenos Aires of two Paraguayan communist leaders was denounced yesterday by politicians of many different parties. In a statement asking for the release of party Secretary-General Antonio Maidana and Emilio Roa, the political leaders note that Maidana was imprisoned in his country for 19 years and is in poor health. The statement was signed by Peronists Paulino Niembro, Julio Barbara and Ricardo Falu; radicals Raul Alfonsin and Roberto Capiche; intransigents Oscar Alende, Raul Rabanaque Caballero, Mariano Lorences, Rafael Marino, Diego May Zuviria and Miguel Valles as well as Developmentists, Popular Christians, Unified Socialists, a Popular Conservative, Popular Socialists, a National Yrigoyenist and communists. FURTHER REPORTAGE ON MILITARY DRUG CONNECTION

Cocaine Threat to United States

Mexico City EL DIA in Spanish 5 Aug 80 p 11

[Article by Gregorio Selser: "Drug-Junta Threatens to Flood United States With Cocaine"]

[Text] In an interview granted to the Bolivian daily newspaper ULTIMA HORA, which that journal published on 30 July, Minister of Interior Luis Arce Gomez warned, speaking in Spanish:

"The full responsibility for the problem involved in drug trafficking and the increase in the export of drugs will fall to President Carter, since currently, having eliminated aid, he will be solely responsible for the increase in cocaine consumption in the United States. This suggests that the motives are purely political. This aid (to combat drug traffic) is regarded as more important than military aid, which means nothing. The military junta will have to reorganize the Narcotics Office, since there are no resources to sustain it in its former position."

$2 Million Less

Colonel Arce Gomez is, in the full sense of the term and with well-earned fame as such in Bolivia, a two-legged beast. A torturer and murderer since the days of Gen Alfredo Ovando Candia, he is best known as a psychopath. In recent months it has been his duty to head Section 2 (military intelligence) and in that capacity, duly advised by the Argentine experts whose names were provided when the occasion arose by Marcelo Quiroga Santa Cruz, he prepared the mechanism for extreme repression which he put to use in April, with the murder of the priest Luis Espinal, whose weekly AQUI had become the most critical means of reporting on the smuggling and drug trafficking processes in which civilians and the military were involved. It also denounced the escalating violence and the preparations of the armed forces to attack the regime.

Arce Gomez is moreover the inspirer and implementor of the plan, already put into practice, to establish pseudo-independent bodies of pseudo-civilians in the pseudo-military fashion, the purpose of which is to cause the "disappearance" through arrest justified by police or military credentials of political or trade union opponents. This "disappearance" is followed by torture and death. Only in exceptional cases does it develop that the victim is being detained in a public prison.

The mechanism for this development is based on the fundamental concept that the armed forces as such are innocent of such practices. In no way would the gentlemen in the armies, navies and air forces besmirch their hands or consciences with such crimes or the theft of the belongings of the victims which customarily goes with them. War booty, these thefts are termed. Thus the specialized bodies in which the military personnel of the three armed branches or the police abandon their uniforms for the time it takes to carry out the chore of kidnaping, torture and murder, for which they wear civilian clothing, can be ambiguously termed "para-military" or "para-police." A variation already traditional in Guatemala and El Salvador (and now in use in Bolivia) involves calling these bodies "ultra-rightist groups."

Arce's "Gestapo"

The fact that these bodies are made up of military and police officers does not prevent the dregs of the prison population from participating in them, thus enjoying a guarantee of impunity as valid as that who give the orders. The shock troops of the Bolivian Socialist Falange (FSB) were always basically lower-class, and it is their amorality which gives a decent appearance to the presumably political outrages. The most typical example is found in a famous FSB gunman, Fernando "Mosca" Monroy, a relative of the cocaine-rich colonel who headed a rebellion in Trinidad on 17 July. "Mosca" has now reappeared as the head of execution squads carrying out the instructions of gestapo head Arce, who like his comrades, Cols Alberto Natusch Busch and Carlos Estrada Estrada and Gen Juan Pereda Asbun, alternate between their drug addiction and their dipsomania.

What Arce told the United States beats all records for impudence and cynicism. The threat of flooding that nation with cocaine paste in reprisal for the suspension of economic and military aid provides a just measure of the true aspect of the seizers of power in Bolivia. Arce, as is known on the high plateau, takes greater pride in his personal efficiency as a torturer than in his limited appetite for power as such. He is a psychopath--as we have already said--with a necrophiliac perversion which is revived daily thanks to the omnipotent power he has been enjoying in recent years. This does not prevent him from simultaneously seeing to his pilot training business, which, as is the case with his comrade Col Norberto Salomon, who owns an air taxi company, provides him with a front for the transport of drugs.

The Bolivian Connection

The magnitude of this traffic cannot be understood without having an idea at the same time that it is only possible to pursue it thanks to the hundreds of secret landing strips in El Beni and Santa Cruz de la Sierra, the centers for the production and processing of the coca leaves into cocaine paste. Among the first steps Gen Luis Garcia Meza took was the removal of his peer, Gen Hugo Echeverria, commander of the VI Division, headquartered in Santa Cruz, when it appeared that he had a mafia affiliation other than the "Bolivian connection."

It is really laughable that gestapo chief Arce should come forth to announce a resurgence of drug trafficking--which will be possible precisely because the military involved in the business have been assigned to key posts in the state security apparatus, justifying it on the pretext that if the United States eliminates its $2-or-$3-million-a-year subsidy for the battle against this crime, the Bolivian Narcotics Office will not have the economic resources to function. It is laughable, we say, because the volume of the cocaine traffic in Bolivia, in comparison to this ridiculous sum, annually exceeds $1 billion, and as a recent cable report by the France Presse agency said, has now surpassed $1.5 billion.

To give some idea, if only approximate, of the magnitude of this fabulous business, let us quote the following text carried in the weekly APERTURA ("The Cocaine Magnates," La Paz, Year 1, No 7, 11 July 1980, p 11):

"Bolivia, already known throughout the world as one of the leading world centers of supply of the raw materials for the production of cocaine, is linked with the increasingly powerful drug smuggling network made up of Bolivians of seeming respectability and others, less reputable, making up the 'new family' functioning in the United States and Europe.

"Recently a cable report datelined Miami told of the arrest of Bolivians Jose Roberto Gasser Terrazas and Alfred Gutierrez, mainly responsible for the largest lot of cocaine to be smuggled into the United States. The two were trying to bring in no less than 530 kilograms of cocaine, the sale of which on the black market in the United States would have brought income far in excess of the entire legal Bolivian national trade, in other words more than $1 billion. After being charged by the prosecutor of the state of Florida, Gasser Terrazas was released on bail after paying $1 million, without blinking an eye, while bail for Gutierrez was set at $3 million."

The Military Connection

The existence of this traffic, the volume it has reached and even Colonel Arce's threat to the United States itself, which, if he is in a position to carry it out, can only be explained by the links between the Bolivian drug mafia and the military, who since the Banzer era have been willing to enmesh themselves in it. The provisional list which we will subsequently provide, obtained from various reliable sources, is in itself illustrative. Equally so is the fact that this Gasser Terrazas, who paid $1 million without blinking, is a member of one of the richest families in Santa Cruz.

Bolivian Connection

Mexico City EL DIA in Spanish 17 Aug 80 p 11

[Text] 1. General Hugo Banzer Suarez, former dictator. Operates through his son-in-law, Fernando "Chito" Valle Urena and his nephew, Guillermo "Willy" Banzer Abastoflor, who has a record as a drug trafficker in the United States.

2. Gen Juan Pereda Asbun, former dictator, drug addict. Operates through his relative Jorge Nemer Chavez, among others.

3. Gen Luis Garcia Meza, present dictator, chosen to guarantee greater operational efficiency for the drug traffic in El Beni and Santa Cruz de la Sierra. His contact with the cocaine-paste underworld is Jose Abraham Baptista, a former chief of police.

4. Col Luis Arce Gomez, former head of Section 2 (military intelligence) and currently minister of interior. Responsible for the murders of the two main figures who denounced the thefts, smuggling and drug traffic involving a sector of the military hierarchy--the priest Luis Espinal and Marcelo Quiroga Santa Cruz, leader of Socialist Party-1. The light aircraft of his "civil aviation" school, one of his private businesses, engage in drug trafficking and smuggling indiscriminately.

5. Air Force Gen Waldo Bernal Pereira, air force commander. His appointment will make the operations of the hundreds of aircraft and light planes smuggling contraband from Paraguay and cocaine paste to the department of Caqueta, Colombia, much more efficient.

6. Col Ariel Coca, the man with the "predestined name." Currently minister of education, no less. He was involved in the smuggling of 100 kilograms of cocaine paste into Panama in 1979.

7. Col Norberto "Bubi" Salomon, military attache at the Bolivian embassy in Venezuela, a post which enables him to take action in the event of "accidents" to the planes and pilots coming into this country with cocaine paste. As owner of an air taxi company, he was involved in drug trafficking and smuggling charges.

8. Col Mario Oxa Bustos, former prefect of La Paz, charged with dealings seriously threatening the state, smuggling and drug trafficking, and with defrauding the sports club The Strongest.

9. Col Oscar Angulo Torne, commander of the Colorado Division in La Paz.

10. Col Carlos Mena Burgos, former chief of intelligence under Banzer, currently commanding one of the military groups functioning as "para-military" civilians active in political repression, while at the same time serving as a middleman in the drug traffic.

11. Col Saul Becerra, publicly accused of drug trafficking and smuggling weapons by police informer Ricardo Dip Garcia in Santa Cruz de la Sierra.

12. Gen Hugo Echeverria Tardio, commander of the VII Division, headquartered in Santa Cruz. On 17 June he facilitated the takeover of the city by members of the Bolivian Socialist Falange and local drug trafficking elements, who seized the records concerning drugs at the prefecture and the mayor's office and burned them. As the representative of one of the drug-trafficking mafias, he rejected the orders of Garcia Meza replacing him at the time of the cocaine-dollar uprising.

13. Police Col Hugo Benavidez, a man in the confidence of Colonel Arce Gomez, presumably personally responsible for the murders of the priest Espinal and trade union leader Quiroga Santa Cruz.

14. Col Arturo Doria Medina, commander of the Tarapaca Regiment, an alcoholic and a psychopath, mainly responsible for the machine-gunning of civilians in La Paz during the Alberto Natusch Busch uprising at the beginning of November 1979. As a participant in another "wing" of the drug trafficking mafia, he was about to be relieved by Garcia Meza.

15. Col Francisco Monroy, commander of the El Beni garrison, a key position in the drug traffic.

16. Col Rafael Loayza, a member of the intimate circle of Arce Gomez through his involvement in drug trafficking.

17. Possible U.S. Measures

Mexico City EL DIA in Spanish 17 Aug 80 p 11

[Article by Gregorio Selser: "Can the United States Prevent the Bolivian Junta's Cocaine Flood?"]

[Text] This reporter has been warning since the end of 1979 that smuggling and drug trafficking were an important part, although not the only or the priority one, of all the efforts at institutional destabilization which have followed one upon the other in Bolivia since the 1979 elections, in which the candidate Hernan Siles Zuazo won by a narrow margin (despite the fraud perpetrated by the military in favor of Victor Paz Estenssoro).

These rebellions--that of 10-11 October, that on 1 November, and others of lesser importance, which were frustrated during the first half of 1980--finally culminated in what we have taken the liberty of giving the name which fits it best--the cocaine-dollar mutiny, in which the smuggling and drug trafficking mafia placed three dubious individuals in whom it has confidence in key positions. For the moment. For now the inevitable period of "adjusting" commands and positions will come. These individuals are Gens Luis Garcia Meza and Waldo Bernal Pereira and Col Luis Arce Gomez.

Bravado on the Part of Arce Gomez

The latter, consistent with his well-earned notoriety as a very macho fellow, made an improbable threat to the United States which was reported in the world press: if the Carter government suspends economic aid to the drug junta, it will flood its chastiser in massive reprisal with cocaine paste. In statements published by the newspaper ULTIMA HORA on 30 July, Arce Gomez emphasized: "The full responsibility for the problem involved in drug traffic and the increase in the export of drugs will fall to President Carter, since currently, having eliminated aid, he will be solely responsible for the increase in cocaine consumption in the United States."

If there remained any doubt about the awareness of the Bolivian military of the role drug traffic plays in the domestic and international life of the country, these irresponsible words dispel them. In the case of Arce Gomez, he had already been indicated as one of the key figures in this traffic before the series of rebellions in 1979, since the days when he created a pilot training school, which provided him with a suitable front for the trips his fleet of planes made in smuggling operations from Paraguay and drug trafficking to Colombia, which is one of the stops en route to the final destination in the state of Florida, in the United States.

In the same fashion, a fleet of air taxis has been facilitating similar missions for Col Norberto Salomon, who was strategically assigned as military attache in Venezuela, while the more profitable activities of his light plane rental business were publicized. In one of them, which crashed "accidentally" on 2 June, presidential candidate Hernan Siles Zuazo was a scheduled passenger, and the crash caused the death of crew members and passengers and seriously wounded the vice-presidential candidate, Jaime Paz Zamora.

The Denunciations by Father Espinal

During the electoral campaign, and months before the July 1979 elections, a supposedly "para-military" organization, one of the many invented by the FSB, a pseudo-political shock group made up of gunmen involved in smuggling and drug trafficking, threatened to kill candidate Hernan Siles Zuazo if he announced his candidacy in Santa Cruz de la Sierra. This city is one of the focal points for both illegal activities, and at its head was the commander of the II army corps, Gen Hugo Echeverria Tardio, who was for the eastern part of Bolivia what Arce Gomez is for the high plateau.

"No cocaine-smuggling mafia will frighten this candidate," a spokesman for the People's Democratic Union (UDP) said. However, on learning that the mafia had offered $50,000 for "whoever kills" Siles, the then-minister of interior, Col Raul Lopez, persuaded the candidate not to travel there because adequate safeguards could not be provided for him.[1] Only the smuggling and drug-trafficking mafia could afford such a sizable reward.

Siles Zuazo won, as is known, although the post-election machinations, in which the regime of Gen David Padilla Arancibia and candidate Paz Estenssoro were implicated, falsified the results and compelled the parliament to appoint Walter Guevara Arze as provisional president. Then came the attempted coups of October and November and the later appointment of Lidia Gueiler to replace Guevara Arze. Under this government the preparations for rebellion intensified and the crimes ordered from the office of Arce Gomez, then head of S-2, against those who denounced the military, began. The priest Luis Espinal was the most notable victim during these months, but not the only one.

Cocaine and the Para-Military

In the weekly publication AQUI, headed by Fr Luis Espinal, an item entitled "Cocaine and the Para-Military" was published on page 7 of the 23 February 1980 issue. It read:

"Curiously, in the zone in which General Bang Bang (a reference to Hugo Banzer Suarez) has his hacienda in San Javier, in the province of Nuflo Chavez de Santa Cruz, Ministry of Interior agents seized 89 kilograms of cocaine base and two light planes with Colombian registration, and arrested the occupants.

"The operation, the result apparently of an anonymous call, has to do not only with the internal mafia struggles but also is linked with the para-military gangs of the ADN [Nationalist Democratic Action] (Banzer's party) and the international cosa nostra.

"Minister Jorge Selum explained, although few details about the operation are known as yet, that the drug is being exchanged for military uniforms and automatic weapons. This information should surprise no one in the eastern part of the country. It is common to see individuals in downtown Santa Cruz or Trinidad whom everyone knows to be drug traffickers.

"Not only are they left in peace, but they are respected because 'they have heavy money.' Thinking is a crime for which Banzer made us pay very dear, but being a high-flying criminal earns a reward, and if this can be said of Edwin Tapia Frontanilla or the young men who ended up in the United States and are now parading along El Prado, it is even truer of a relative of the dictator.[2]

"Under repression, the media--apart from the fact that many of them are linked with this profitable business--can do nothing but print a five-line report in a newspaper, which is then thrown away.

"Where is Hugo Estensscro, who carried two suitcases full of dum-dum bullets? Where is Mosca Monroy? Where are the Alarcon brothers? Where are those responsible for the attack on AQUI? You, Mr Minister, know who they are or how they operate. You must answer the people."[3]

Minister Jorge Selum resigned shortly afterward under pressure from the army. And as for Father Espinal, as is now known, he was the victim of an atrocious murder the month after this article was written.

Permanent Assembly on Human Rights

In June of 1980, many weeks before the cocaine-dollars mutiny, the Permanent Assembly on Human Rights (APDH) of Bolivia published a statement in PRESENCIA, in La Paz, listing the names of military and police officers and civilians involved equally in smuggling, drug trafficking and the terrorist attacks ordered by Arce Gomez for the purpose of creating the atmosphere needed for the cocaine-dollars mutiny. The list included a number of military and police officials named on the list we are providing separately, but also Abraham Baptista (who has now been named by Republican Senator Dennis de Concini of the United States as a middleman between the drug traffickers and Garcia Meza), "Coco" Ballvian (a former member of the ELN [Army of National Liberation] guerrilla force and later tortured under the Barrientos and Banzer regimes), Melquiades Pamo, a certain "Jemio," Victor Barrenechea, "Dany" Cuentas, Raul Fuentes, Alberto Camacho, Teofilo Mendez, Luis Peredo, Carlos Valverde Barbery, Alfonso Dalence, Widen Razuc, "El Mosca" Monroy, Mario Jordan, Guido Alarcon, Gary Alarcon and many others.

The difficult local political circumstances made it more than unlikely that Lidia Gueiler's government could take steps against all those mentioned, two of whom, Valverde and Dalence, were PCB candidates. In any case, Arce Gomez is already taking his revenge against the regime. The elderly priest Julio Tumiri, president of the Permanent Assembly on Human Rights, was arrested in the premises of the COB [Bolivian Labor Federation], in the same incident in which Juan Lechin was seized and Marcel Quiroga Santa Cruz was treacherously wounded, to be tortured and murdered later in the premises of the Miraflores barracks.

What Will the United States Do?

The Carter administration is concerned about the threat by Colonel Arce Gomez, and the Congress has already asked for an urgent investigation of the drug traffic originating in Bolivia.

In December 1975, the Banzer government asked for United Nations aid for a multi-disciplinary program to control the improper use of drugs, with the clear purpose of supervising the production and sale of coca, combating illegal traffic in cocaine and other drugs and treating and rehabilitating drug addicts. In February of 1977 a new agreement in this regard was signed.[4] The United States for its part agreed to assign sums annually to contribute to the prevention and punishment of trafficking in drugs, but in practice these allocations proved laughable ($2 to 3 million) in comparison to the volume of cocaine dollars changing hands in Bolivia in just 1 year, which the AFP [Association of Port Officials] estimated at almost $2 billion.

Can the United States really face up to the announced cocaine flood? Has it been possible to do anything in the similar Colombian case?

It suffices to mention two other facts to indicate our skepticism. There are 24 nations on the American continent and in the Caribbean involved in the Single 1961 Convention on Narcotics (signatories and ratifying parties), while 20 nations are involved in the 1971 Agreement on Psychotropic

Substances for the same region. Bolivia is not a signatory of either of these two international regulations.[5]

What more can be said?

Cocaine, Bolivian Regime

Bogota EL ESPECTADOR in Spanish 16 Aug 80 p 2-A

[Editorial]

[Text] The American nations and the whole world must open their eyes to what is happening in Bolivia, where the evidence that the surprise attack by General Garcia Meza had as its main goal the bold conversion of the government into the most prosperous and efficient agency on earth for promoting, processing and developing coca production is increasing day by day. The corruption in the regime is no new phenomenon, and has been noted repeatedly, but the singular scandal in the Bolivian case demands that preventive and housecleaning measures be taken, such as those being adopted by the State Department itself, despite the stubborn short-sightedness of many of its officials and its "experts." The United States, according to reports, will suspend all kinds of aid to the strong-arm regime and will maintain only extremely cool relations with it. Indeed, the government of Garcia Meza certainly does not merit any cordiality or respect from those who--without being perfect--have some decent origins and intentions.

The attack on the regime by Garcia Meza and his vandals was so coarse that it can only serve as a categorical indication of the presence of cocaine dealings interlining the events. The case was not and could not be merely political, because had it been thus, there would have been no lack of arguments to maintain the military supremacy. But a gamble was taken on the elections. And simply because the results were honest and would lead to the installation of a clean government under the guidance of the most illustrious of the Bolivians of this era, Dr Hernan Siles Zuazo, the cocaine dealers and their agents in uniform--who are bringing dishonor to the noble military career--abandoned their last inhibitions and the "cocaine-dollar coup" occurred. President Lidia Gueiler was forced out of the Quemado Palace in La Paz in infamous fashion, and the additional precaution of killing the man who was the socialist candidate, Marcelo Quiroga, was taken, because he relied on the broad coverage of democratic guarantees in making devastating accusations about the financial-military axis of the coca business.

With heavy documentation, the Argentine writer Gregorio Selser has synthesized the drama of immorality in Bolivia in the following terms: "Officers in the three branches of the armed forces are involved in the business of smuggling and drugs. The smuggling developed in the era of Gen Rene Barrientos. The drug business gained impetus as soon as Gen Hugo Banzer seized power with the help of the mafia in Santa Cruz." And today the determination of the imposter Garcia Meza to serve as a screen for the drug traffic in which an organization headed by Gen Hugo Echeverria, commander of the garrison in Santa Cruz, is engaging, is obvious.

In addition to the displeasure of the United States with this kind of "partner" with such an evil aspect, the governments in the "Andean group" are showing their unease at the strong-arm attack on the Bolivian regime, which only pleases Argentina, and to a lesser extent Brazil, so long as they have a docile neighbor wrapped up in its own plundering and incapable of a gesture of national independence and therefore easy for them to manage. But within the framework of the OAS itself there is a rising wave against Garcia Meza and his gang, against the institutionalization of cocaine as the central objective of a government. Intervention? It is prohibited, it is not advisable, and it is usually counterproductive. But a regime with such repugnant characteristics must give rise to general revulsion, and the maintenance of any legal or diplomatic relations with it must be reduced to a minimum. This mixture of cocaine with the regime surpasses anything previously known in the realm of governmental immorality throughout the world--which is saying a good deal, and therefore the moral sanctions by the peoples and governments preclude any hesitation, ambiguity or extenuating circumstances.

CABINET RESHUFFLE SAID TO BE IN OFFING

Sao Paulo VEJA in Portuguese 13 Aug 80 pp 20-21

[Text] President Joao Figueiredo must have forgotten General Joao Baptista Figueiredo who, 2 years ago, said: "A bad minister, I get rid of." Government is a very complicated thing and today even the drapes in Planalto Palace know that at least three members of the team have flunked the public administration exam and have been waiting for dismissal for months. Their names are widely known: Waldir Arcoverde, of health; Cesar Cals, of mines and energy; and Amaury Stabile, of agriculture. Since they have not left, it is concluded that they are being kept in store to render a last service to the government: namely, leaving together and giving the executive the opportunity for a face-lift known as cabinet reform, and giving the PDS politicians a chance to enter the executive once the party organization has been consolidated.

Pending the reform, the cabinet--divided between strong ministers and weak ministers, ministries solidly occupied and some already practically vacant --squabbles. In the first place, Planning Minister Delfim Netto and Labor Minister Murillo Macedo have been fighting in recent weeks, the pretext being wage policy. Delfim, who has not seen eye-to-eye with Macedo since the former assumed the Planning Secretariat (SEPLAN) took the liberty of announcing the end of the semiannual adjustments for high salaries--which was a creation of Macedo's.

Since they began to discuss the subject in public, all appearances indicate that the labor minister has won because the measure, which had earlier been announced as certain is now officially "under study." Appearances are deceiving. In government rhetoric, when it is said that a controversial measure is "under study," the country can prepare for it.

Delfim Will Not Fall--As Figueiredo himself taught PDS leaders during lunch at the Torto Grance on Thursday, Delfim Netto no longer has the power he used to have--of the time when "if need be, I would order businessmen arrested." But he is immune to internal defeats. Unlike Cesar Cals, who fired his son in order not to be dismissed from the Ministry of Mines and Energy, and Macedo himself, who let the planning minister remove his relative, Jofre de Carvalho, Delfim will remain in SEPLAN only as long as he is winning. And winning not necessarily against inflation, which is erroneously ascribed the power to topple him, but against the rivals in the team.

Balancing between those extreme of behavior is Education Minister Eduardo Portella. He came weak into the administration, within it, all he got was heavyweight adversaries--Gen Octavio Medeiros, chief of the National Intelligence Service (SNI), whose intervention has already made him cancel lectures and halt the granting of appropriations for a teachers conference; and Minister Delfim Netto, with whom he argues about the lack of money for the Ministry fo Education and Culture (MEC). In those disputes, he has shown loyalty to the government by giving in. But he has already shown that beyond a certain point, he will not give in, he goes away. He announced at a lecture in Recife 2 weeks ago that "education cannot pay for inflation."

SEPLAN Versus SECOM--Incidentally, a typical division of this government is between all the ministers who need to spend to show results, and consequently ask for budget increases, versus Delfim, whose objective is precisely the opposite, and who denies them. Although Interior Minister Mario Andreazza is a personal friend of Delfim's, he asks General Medeiros for help to convince the planning minister to open his pocket, which according to a classic Delfinian definition is "the most sensitive organ in the human body."

A short time ago, Communications Minister Said Farhat entered that ring. He is a singular case in the government: he is weak in all the offices in Planalto Palace except in his own and in Figueiredo's. First, Farhat released a survey that cost the Secretariat of Communications (SECOM) 4 million cruzeiros, showing that the public approves of the president but not his cabinet--read Delfim. Delfim responded by charging irregularities in the contracting of journalists by the Brazilian News Company (EBN), a creation of SECOM. Furthermore, EBN has erred more than once in reporting measures of the Planning Secretariat (SEPLAN). But that second level crisis ended at Thursday's meeting of the Social Development Council, where both posed in an embrace for pictures that were distributed by EBN.

Budget Time--It is not by chance that all that is happening now, 1 year after the cabinet wave that caused the dismissal of Mario Henrique Simonsen from the Planning Ministry. Nor because it is August. This is the season when the discussion of the next budget begins--a time when SEPLAN has to defend itself tooth and nail against deficits.

That is why there are symptoms that the competition between Murillo Macedo and Delfim Netto over the wage policy reform has been left on the back burners, with an illusory advantage for Macedo. Everything leads one to believe that it will return to the government agenda with redoubled force after the budget season and before the disputes in the various union sectors that will come up at the end of the year.

The cabinet reform will also remain frozen; besides, it is not the result of all that turmoil but its point of departure. The speculation and denials about the advisability of the reform are a false question. The real question is when is President Figueiredo going to patch the cabinet. It will certainly be before the time of the second cabinet reform--the one at the end of 1981 when ministers with political aspirations begin to leave their positions, unencumbering themselves to qualify for gubernatorial elections in 1982. Falling into the case are Jair Soares, of social welfare, who wants Rio Grande do Sul and Eliseu Rezende of Transportation, who hopes to run in Minas Gerais if there is a sub-slate.

New Generation of Ministers Is Already in the Oven

The story goes that Gen Golbery do Couto e Silva, chief of the Civilian Household, has an old notebook near at hand full of the names of people who may be appointed to positions in the public administration and, when needed, he goes down to the president's office with the old notebook to discuss the succession of ministers and high-level officials. It is not known if that notebook exists much less what names it contains. Nevertheless, one senses in Planalto Palace that a new batch of names is in the reserve banks ready to be lit up in the firmament of power.

Below are some of those names, grouped by ministry, along with old candidates who might come up:

Health--If Minister Waldir Arcoverde gets the axe, there are four candidates; bionic Senator Nilo Coelho of Pernambuco, Federal Deputy Jorge Maluly Neto of Sao Paulo, Rio Doctor Clementino Fraga Filho, and Doctor Jose Paula Lopes Pontes, director of the school of medicine of Ilha do Fundao, in Fio de Janeiro.

Mines and Energy--Arnaldo Barbalho, present secretary general of the ministry, and de facto minister. If Cals leaves, the promotion of Barbalho will be a mere formality.

Finance--On the shelf are: Jose Flavio Pecora, present secretary general of the Planning Secretariat of the Presidency of the Republic; and Alfonso Celso Pastore, secretary of finance of Sao Paulo. Eduardo Carvalho, the secretary general of the Finance Ministry is vying for the position with less chance because he has clashed with Delfim Netto, of whom he is a great friend. He has served as a shock absorber between Delfim and Galveas.

Agriculture--Eduardo Carvalho may be moved to replace Minister Amaury Stabile. Angelo Calmon de Sa, former minister of industry and commerce in the Geisel administration is on the shelf with his eye on the position.

SECOM--It will return to the status of agency, losing the status of ministry. Heitor Ferreira de Aquino, private secretary of the Presidency of the Republic could head it. But neither is he interested in the position nor does President Figueiredo seem disposed to dispense with his secretary, who also moves about with great self-assurance in the political area.

Education--The rector of the University of Brasilia, Jose Carlos Azevedo is the perennial candidate for the position.

PLANNING MINISTER SEEKS FINANCING IN FRG

PY122118 Rio de Janeiro JORNAL DO BRASIL in Portuguese 9 Sep 80 p 18

[Report by correspondent William Wanck]

[Excerpts] Frankfurt--Seeking money to cover the deficit was the main objective of the brief visit which Brazilian Planning Minister Antonio Delfim Netto made yesterday to German bankers. He declined to provide further details on their talks, but he continues to spread optimism on the situation of the Brazilian economy. The minister feels that the DM100-million loan (3.1 billion cruzeiros) granted yesterday by the Deutsche Bank to Nuclebras [Brazilian Nuclear Corporation] is proof of the confidence of the main German financiers in Brazil.

Netto even tried to say that the sole objective of his trip to Germany was to attend the signing ceremony of the loan to Nuclebras, "taking the opportunity to visit Hermann Abs, the president of the Deutsche Bank." According to one of his advisers, Delfim Netto came to Germany to explain to the bankers how he intends to pull Brazil out of its crisis and especially to try and achieve in the international market a financing for the unpredicted deficit in the trade balance this year. He will leave for London today, then go to Paris and later to New York.

SAO PAULO GOVERNOR MALUF INTERVIEWED

[VEJA staff interview with Sao Paulo Governor Paulo Maluf; in Sao Paulo, date not given]

[Text] Two years after challenging and defeating Laudo Natel, the favorite candidate of Planalto Palace in the Sao Paulo National Renewal Alliance (ARENA) convention, Governor Paulo Maluf has become on of the chief villains of the Brazilians left; he is accused of being one of the visible rallying points of the group of governors and military men who oppose the holding of direct elections in 1982 and who dream of a political regression. Those suspicions emerge at a time when, after savoring the successive entries of opposition elements into the government party, the Sao Paulo governor is facing the concentrated fire of the adversaries deployed in the Legislative Assembly or in the streets which the governor visits with his "itinerant government." Disregarding the intensification of the opposition campaign, Maluf displays the same broad smile he did when he was a candidate and maintains an exhausting work pace--he normally works on Saturdays and Sunday morning and visits cities in the interior for opening ceremonies or feasts of patron saints. Last week, Maluf spoke to VEJA for 3 hours, denying that he was an apostle of the right and guaranteeing that at the end of his administration, he will go down in the history of San Paulo as one of its most industrious administrators. (He has not smoked for a month, "since that Genie got me.")

I Do Not Want to Patrol the Deputies

[Question] It is regarded as a fact in Brasilia that you are against direct elections for state governors in 1982. Why?

[Answer] That is a point that must be discussed very honestly. It is congress that decides that matter, not any governor. There are 28 Social Democratic Party (PDS) deputies in Sao Paulo. Ask any of them if they have received any appeal from Governor Maluf to vote this way or that on the constitutional amendment reestablishing direct elections. What I cannot say is that direct elections are the only valid way. If that were so, I would not be legitimizing my mandate, which is indirect and absolutely legitimate within the law. I would like to point out that the prime minister of countries such as Great Britain, Germany and Japan were not elected by the people but by parliament. Each country has its own system. So, to say that the only democratic system is that of direct elections would not be recognizing the majority of the regimes that exist in the world.

[Answer] I am in favor of congress deciding. I reiterate; I have no objection to direct elections. If it comes within constitutional rules, it will get my applause. And we are going to try to find a good candidate to win the election in Sao Paulo.

[Answer] Each federal deputy must vote according to his own conscience, I cannot conduct an ideological patrol. What I can do is, in informal talks, to convey my position--which is in favor of approval of the amendment--to the members of the bloc.

[Answer] It is the constitution, election legislation and the Regional Electoral Court that installs the person elected. The governor, as the representative of the executive, is a slave of the law.

[Answer] Senator Franco Montoro is a staid politician, which is not always true of the men of the opposition. He supports different positions from mine but he has never attacked me personally and I have never attacked him. We respect one another. But I want to stress that an election is won in the ballot box. There are no election winners in advance.

[Question] With indirect elections, you will probably win the election in Sao Paulo, being your own successor in the governorship of the state. With direction elections, you are going to lose. Is it not natural that you should prefer the former?

[Answer] They already told me that I would lose in 1970 when I supported Orlando Zancaner for the senate. He was the dark horse, so to speak. He stayed in Brasilia as long as he wanted to, and he was elected. I hope that in the next 2 years, the candidate will emerge from the bottom up. That will be the PDS candidate in Sao Paulo.

[Answer] For the time being, I do not believe that there have been assaults or that they have been perpetrated by the far right or the far left. I will only make a judgment after the investigations have been concluded. If I should say something now I might influence the officials involved in the inquiry. The governor cannot pass judgment since he is the final judge. But I would like to point out that, compared to what has happened in other countries, the situation in Sao Paulo is quiet.

I Never Insulted Doctor Dallari

[Question] You were instructed by Minister Abi-Ackel to exert every effort to investigate the kidnaping of jurist Dalmo Dallari. How is the investigation going?

[Answer] That is true. The minister phoned me asking me to exert the greatest effort in the case. I immediately phoned the secretary of public security, who went to the hospital, put on that sterilized clothing to enter the intensive care unit and was with Doctor Dallari. The case has been turned over to the Secretariat of Public Security and a police commissioner has been assigned to follow up the investigation, in addition to a public prosecutor named by the attorney general. For the time being, I cannot say anything in that regard.

[Question] During the mass celebrated by the Pope in Campo Marte, you reportedly said that Doctor Dallari was putting on a show. Was that not an expression of opinion by the governor?

[Question] The public prosecutor asked to see pictures of the Department of Domestic Operations-Internal Defense Operations Center (DOIL-CODI) agents of the First and Second Armies so that the victim might try to identify his kidnapers. The State Department of Political and Social Order (DEOPS) commissioner denied the request. Do you consider that refusal correct?

[Answer] If the public prosecutor considers the decision of the DEOPS commissioner unconvincing, let him have recourse to the secretary of security. It does not behoove me to express an opinion.

[Question] You, who have already referred to yourself in an interview as a man of the center-left, are accused by your adversaries of belonging to the far right. How do you view your ideological position?

[Answer] I am in favor of social capitalism in which the old figure of the boss gives way to the figure of the qualified professional administrator. Today, the company belongs much more to its employees, workers and directors than to its stockholders. The fulcrum, the objective of a company's growth is that it produce, pay taxes, be profitable enough to remunerate its stockholders, but that it not forget that the most important part is its employees payroll. I am frankly favorable to the center position, but leaning a few degrees to the left.

[Question] The story continues to circulate that you were practically forced to agree to the construction of the nuclear power plants in Sao Paulo in order to be able to purchase the light company. Is that true?

[Answer] That story is completely unfounded. The federal government does not need the state government to build plants. The greater the capability, the less the influence. It was not the government of Sao Paulo that determined the installation of those plants near Sao Paulo, nor the federal nor even the experts. The decisive factor in determining the site of the plants was the degree of industrialization of Sao Paulo. The basic electric energy sources in Sao Paulo have been practically exhausted. The nuclear plants will operate together with the hydroelectric plants.

[Question] Installing a nuclear plant in one of the last ecological reserves in the state is not something that pleases the ecologists. How do you view the reaction of those sectors?

[Answer] I know the area where the plants will be built very well; for that matter, I know the state of Sao Paulo from end to end. It is a 23,000-hectare area that is completely uninhabited. There are only a few families of Indians, and they are assimilated Indians who speak Portuguese. So it was a correct choice. The environment will not be affected.

[Question] In the first year of your administration, you attracted many people to join the government party both in the Legislative Assembly and in the Federal Chamber. Recently you have suffered some losses. What is happening?

[Answer] Deputy Castello Branco left the PDS because his philosophy was not in tune with the basic philosophy of the party. That's all. Deputy Renato Cordeiro wanted to be a state secretary. It so happens that there are 79 state deputies and I do not have 79 state secretariats at my disposal. Even if I did, it would not be fair for a person to be elected and not want to serve his term of office. And I want to make it quite clear that the selection of a state secretary is an inherent prerogative of the governor's, and I will not relinquish that.

The Criticism Is Pure Jealousy

[Answer] It was my selection also.

[Answer] The name of Judge Octavio Gonzaga Junior was duly approved on merit, including by the military authorities. The secretary has been here with me since March 1979; he merits my support and is going to remain with me until 15 March 1983.

[Question] During the last ABC strike, the impression was left that General Milton Tavares de Souza had acted as a sort of military governor of Sao Paulo....

[Answer] General Milton Tavares de Souza is a military man of exceptional qualities and whenever a question arises that involves matters of security, he consults me.

[Question] If you get a majority in the assembly, some politician immediately comes up and says that the governor offered advantages or positions. If you purchase the light company, the suspicion arises that there was some deal. Is there a credibility crisis involving the governor of Sao Paulo?

[Answer] If you don't do, you don't err, and I am a human being. It it possible that in the course of my public life, I have committed some mistakes. But I want to make it clear that an insult is the argument of one who does not have any agrument. The great men were always the most criticized while they lived. I am criticized because I do things, because I desire to do. I take a plane in Sao Paulo at 2 p.m., to to Brasilia, and am back at 5:30. I am not lazy. I was also criticized for the 60 overpasses I built in the capital. But if those overpasses did not exist, Sao Paulo would not move. The reason for that criticism is not the governor's lack of credibility. The reason is pure jealousy.

I Can No Longer Take a Walk in my Neighborhood

[Answer] I respect the press and nobody in this world desired the freedom of the press as much as I did. Despite the insults and some stories that did not conform to the facts, I never sued anybody. In that respect, I was always liberal. Furthermore, what is most persishable is not lettuce, tomatoes, cucumbers or carrots; it is a false report. The only thing I do not permit is for anyone to touch my honor. When that happens, I react.

[Question] You have remained quiet about the so-called "Lutfalla case." Don't the stories about it touch the governor's honor?

[Question] That case was nothing but political intrigue. Every day, scores of firms, thousands per month, tens of thousands per year resort to receivership or bankruptcy. Suffice it to read the DIARIO DO COMERCIO to verify that. In the case of Lutfalla Textile, there was an attempt at political involvement. The whole Sao Paulo business world--which elected me with 80 percent of its votes to the presidency of the commercial association--knows which are my companies and from what I derive income.

[Answer] Instead of presenting their petitions in the meetings which I hold with deputies the present minority parties organize groups of 20 or 30 persons for some demonstration. In Campo Limpo, I was kissed, embraced and applauded by old ladies, young girls, humble people. Those who went to Campo Limpo in hired buses obviously were not residents of that neighborhood. Those were the ones who booed me. But booing me is foolishness. I am going to continue doing what I have always done.

[Question] You turned a good part of the state public administration upside down on Thursday, dismissing two secretaries and closing down four public enterprises. What happened?

[Answer] Nothing much. Two secretaries were replaced: the secretary of metropolitan affairs and the secretary of transportation. Appointing and dismissing secretaries is a governor's prerogative. Their replacements have already been working since Friday. In addition to that, I eliminated four public enterprises. I did that for elementary reasons. The Metropolitan Urban Transportation Company (EMTU) duplicated the work of the Greater Sao Paulo Metropolitan Planning Corporation (EMPLASA), that is, it dealt with transportation in the metropolitan areas. What did I do? I shut down EMTU and incorporated its functions in EMPLASA. I, thereby, save 320 million cruzeiros per year. The State Low-Cost Housing Company (CECAP), as the name implies, built houses. So did the Public Savings Bank. I shut down CECAP and incorporated its functions in the Public Savings Bank, thereby saving 500 million. The Sao Paulo State Special Telecommunications Services (SETASA) installed TV towers in the interior. The Father Anchieta Foundation did likewise. I eliminated SETASA and now the foundation takes care of that function. I saved 60 million cruzeiros. BRASVACIN conducted inoculations and so did the Butanta Institute. In addition, the Low-Cost Medicine Foundation (FURP) handled medicines. Now the institute is going to conduct inoculations and FURP will get the facilities of BRASVACIN. That is, where I found two companies doing the same thing, I eliminated one. Nothing will cease to be done as a result of the elimination of the companies. As a matter of fact, suffice it to examine the activity of all those agencies to see that I made a mistake: I should have done all that on the first day of my administration.

[Answer] It is obvious that there are couples that do not get along together and, consequently, the only recourse is separation, legal or otherwise, and the freedom to choose a new life. There are countless cases in which the person is emotionally more stable, happier in the second marriage. But I do not think divorce should be facilitated in Brazil for a very simple reason: at the beginning of married life, there is always a minor maladjustment. That is absolutely normal. But one has to try to get along so that the children tomorrow will not be like American movie stars, "married for the seventh time with so-and-so," as a result of excessive freedom.

[Answer] I do not see why I should receive them. If they have something important to take care of, there is the secretary of social advancement, the secretary of health, the secretary of education. In some cases, incidentally, they have gone to the secretary of public security.... Recently they have even been a little upset because of the cleanup that has been carried out in the center of the city. I recall that when I got married I lived in the same neighborhood where I live today and at that time I could go out at night with my wife, walk around the block. Today, you cannot do that any more.

I Prefer To Invest in More Schools

[Answer] I am against the "death squadron" as an organization because nobody has the right to take the law into his own hands; not society, the police, or professionally contracted people. But I also feel that society must defend itself. It aroused great astonishment when the secretary of public security of Sao Paulo declared that everyone should have a revolver on his night-table. That is real ignorance of the law, because it permits anyone to purchase a weapon, go to the police and register it and have it in the house for legitimate defense.

[Answer] I do not need that today because the position of governor requires external security. But the day I am no longer in the position of governor, I will do what I always did: contract a private night security guard.

[Answer] You have to think of the budget balance. I prefer to invest in schools rather than prison. There is no surplus of police in Sao Paulo but neither is there a shortage. I would not say the number is sufficient, but not far from it.

BOMB EXPLODES IN RESTAURANT--Another attack took place early this morning, this time in Sao Paulo. The target was the restaurant (Bar da Terra) located at 940 (Mourada Coelho) Street, in the Pinheiro District. At 0130 this morning, when approximately 150 persons were in the bar, a bomb was hurled through a window and hit one of the customers in the head. But the bomb exploded only when it fell to the ground. It filled the room with a strong odor of gas. At least two persons were wounded. Police experts have concluded that the bomb is not homemade and that those who made it are experts. [Excerpts] [PY130222 Sao Paulo Radio Bandeirantes Network in Portuguese 1000 GMT 12 Sep 80]

PETROBRAS INDUSTRIAL FUEL STUDIES--The Brazilian Petroleum Corporation [Petrobras] is studying the possibility of mixing coal and fuel oil for use as an industrial fuel. Tests will be made in the near future to determine the efficiency of the mixture, the use of which would represent a saving of foreign exchange for the country on the order of $700 million per year. Since the objective is saving foreign exchange, domestic coal will be used, but its percentage in the mixture will not be as high as 50 percent, as is being tested in the United States for oil-burning boilers. The ash content of domestic coal is high, and the tests will determine the percentage in which it can be mixed fuel oil. This mixture has come to be known in the United States as COM, the abbreviation for coal-oil mixture. Technicians are making an educated guess that domestic coal could be used in a 20-percent proportion in the mixture to be prepared in Brazil. Calculations made on the basis of this proportion and the current fuel oil consumption at $30 per barrel in Brazil show the possibility of saving $700 million in foreign exchange per year. SPANISH CORTES CONDEMNS PLEBISCITE--Madrid, 12 Sep (LATIN-REUTER)--The Cortes (Parliament) of Spain yesterday approved a motion condemning as a "farce" the constitutional plebiscite carried out yesterday in Chile. The motion, submitted by the Spanish Socialist Workers Party (PSOE), the main political opposition force, states that the plebiscite "lacked sufficient political guarantees to be considered an expression of the free opinion of the Chilean people. Therefore, we condemn it as farce," it states. The motion was approved 237 votes to 3. [Text] [PY121558 Buenos Aires LATIN in Spanish 1056 GMT 12 Sep 80]

CHILEANS EXPELLED FROM ARGENTINA--Punta Arenas, Chile, 15 Sep (AFP)--Eleven Chileans have been violently expelled from Argentina, and it was unofficially reported here that this action was taken in retaliation for the new dispute which has broken out between the two countries in the Strait of Magellan. Santiago newspapers this morning report that this event occurred in the Argentine city of Rio Grande, in Patagonia, and that the Chileans were transferred to the Chilean zone of Tierra del Fuego. Some of the Chileans told the newspaper LA TERCERA that they were held 4 days without food and that in some cases they were forced to wash military and private vehicles in a heavy rain. BUSINESSMEN CREATE COMMITTEE FOR DEFENSE OF DEMOCRACY

San Jose LA NACION in Spanish 22 Aug 80 p 8 A

[Text] The Committee for the Defense of Democracy, created on Wednesday evening at a meeting of businessmen, issued an appeal yesterday to all citizens of Costa Rica to join in the struggle to defend the traditional political system in the country.

At a press conference held in the premises of the Costa Rican Chamber of Commerce, the officers of the new movement spoke of what they regard as dangers threatening Costa Rican democracy, and of the need to prevent Marxism from continuing to advance.

All of the officers spoke to the journalists: Don Armando Guardia Villalaz, president; Don Edmondo Gerli, treasurer; Enrique Chavarria, controller; and voting members Rodrigo Jimenez Vega, William Barrantes Cartin, Rafael Angel Ulloa and Dr Rodrigo Paris Steffens. The secretary, Julio Ugarte T., who is in Honduras, was not present.

They explained that the committee is a permanent one, and that in its first struggle to maintain the Costa Rican institutional system and traditions it will seek to create an awareness in the citizens of the developing facts with regard to the banana strike in the southern part of the country and other similar solidarity movements through which the Marxist forces in the country have posed a threat.

Campaign

Don Guardia Villalaz said that an effort is being made through a broad publicity campaign to encourage demonstration of the rejection by the country as a whole "of these most antidemocratic and antipatriotic developments."

He explained that the committee is a national one, not representing private business alone. "It represents all the forces in the country in the struggle against communist activity," he said.

Don Rafael Angel Ulloa said that he agreed to take part in this movement as a citizen who feels that much in the democratic system is being lost.

He stressed that the struggle is a hard one, inasmuch as the extremes to which the communists have gone will not be allowed. The battle, he added, will be a frontal one, without fear of Marxism.

Don Edmondo Gerli said that the requirement for belonging to the committee is to be a citizen, a Costa Rican. "No trade union rights of any kind will be advanced," he said, and he indicated that in view of current events "we support the government because it represents the Costa Ricans." He made it clear that this decision has nothing to do with officials of any given political party.

He also said that the committee supports the decree promulgated last week by the government ordering provisional intervention at the premises of the Costa Rican Banana Company for the resolution of the labor crisis, because this provision defends the interests of the Costa Rican majority. "We are Costa Ricans and therefore democrats," he stressed.

Enrique Chavarria said that the current problem has its main origins in the apathy and indifference of the citizens, and that its resolution requires the concern of all Costa Ricans.

He spoke of the need to halt the present situation "before we have to bemoan other more difficult ones in the future."

Dr Paris stated that the committee is more in favor of Costa Rica than against anything. He said that Costa Rican democracy and the institutional system are being undermined by a minority but very well-organized group, the Marxists. "The time has come to say enough," he emphasized.

War

Mr Barrantes said that "we are at war, not because we wanted it, but because national and international communism have declared it." He said that the outbreak of this war occurred with the beginning of the strike in the South.

"Defense of the traditions and the system of life we have enjoyed requires the participation of all Costa Ricans," Mr Jimenez Vega said for his part.

Don Edmondo Gerli said in a second address that a high communist leader stated last December that the Marxist movement planned to seize power through the trade unions.

The president of the committee, Don Armando Guardia, asked in conclusion that all Costa Ricans contribute their economic support. He gave assurance that the movement will be "a free rostrum for any Costa Rican who wants to express his unease, his worry and his rejection of what is happening. Democracy is the gift of the brave," he concluded.

Democracy Taken for Granted

San Jose LA NACION in Spanish 28 Aug 80 p 14 A

[Editorial: "The Defense of Democracy"]

[Text] The concerns and reasons which led the sponsors of the group called the Committee for the Defense of Democracy are without a doubt consistent with a dramatic current reality wherein democracy, as an ideal form of government, once defined by Winston Churchill as "the worst except for all the others," is suffering internally and externally from the onslaughts of its enemies on the far left or the far right.

It has become imperative today to adopt a more vigilant attitude concerning what is happening not only in our country, but also outside it, so that we can realize fully what is really happening to our basic institutions, the full exercise of our rights and respect for our traditional values, as well as the political forces beyond our frontiers vying for power for the purpose not of a more open democratic approach but in order to impose a totalitarian regime.

It is for these reasons that the defense of democracy becomes so difficult and delicate. The peoples who enjoy it, as ours do, very often are not fully aware of what it means until they lose it, and therefore their conviction and their zeal to prevent democracy from deteriorating are neglected or abandoned when it continues to function steadily. It is necessary thus to remind the citizens of what they have and at the same time point to the institutional shortcomings, especially those mechanisms which tend to strengthen the real and active participation of the people in the national tasks of greatest importance to the fate of the country.

Democracy is based on the liberal philosophy, a vision of man and of life in which freedom, the right to dissent, respect for personal dignity and the functioning of a popular will free of any fear or subjection to dogmatic and sectarian doctrines play a leading role. There is nothing more contrary to democracy than sectarianism and extremism. Therefore, as a form of political life, it is situated at a point equidistant from the extreme left and the extreme right. But precisely because its essence is respect for the opinions of others, tolerance for all ways of thinking, the defense of it must be waged on the level of ideas and the pedagogical exercise of a clear, vigorous and humanist policy.

If the Committee for the Defense of Democracy takes its place in this realm, as we hope it will, and not that of futile and exclusive opposition, nor that of adamant attitudes of a McCarthyist ilk, we are certain that it will carry out highly educational and consciousness-raising work contributing to the maintenance of our precious democratic system.

Democratic Values Defended

San Jose LA REPUBLICA in Spanish 24 Aug 80 p 6

[Editorial: "Committee for the Defense of Democracy"]

[Text] A group of businessmen agreed to establish the Committee for the Defense of Democracy for the purpose of encouraging a national movement to strengthen the human values on which freedom and the dignity of man rest.

If a foreigner were to come to our country now, without knowledge of the historical background which has made our fatherland a culturally, economically and socially highly developed nation, he might think that the political forces of communism and anticommunism on our territory have begun to polarize and to move toward a clash. However this is not the fact, although the communists are engaged in an escalation of violence with a view to seizing political power in order to replace democracy with Marxist imperialism through the dictatorship of their party. In truth, the Committee for the Defense of Democracy has its reason for being in the need to revitalize certain concepts and attitudes which, precisely, were those which motivated the peaceful and harmonious development which has placed us in a privileged position among the nations of the world seeking social justice and humane distribution of the wealth.

For we believe that the Committee for the Defense of Democracy is more than a shock-force against communism, the promoter of a movement to bring back the eternal values of our national heritage, and it is for this reason that we are inclined to support it, persuaded that the country must return to certain channels, somewhat abandoned today, such as adherence to the law, to the principles of respect for international commitments assumed, individual freedoms, and other persons, which have been the basis of one of the societies which best implements justice.

If we realize that in order to win an 8-hour working day, other peoples have had to endure great suffering, while here, thanks to democratic evolution and the concept of love of one's fellow man, not only have we had this but also, for more than a century, free education, and subsequently insurance covering labor accidents, illness, maternity, disability, old age and death, paid vacations, the 13th wage, paid pre- and post-natal leave, a wage minimum established by law, compensation for unjustified dismissal, etc., we must agree that if we can continue this harmonious and democratic development, retaining individual freedoms and respect for others, giving the spirit its true value and material things that which they merit, we should do this.

One cannot ignore the fact that the communists' aggressive attitude and disrespect for the laws could well polarize forces and lead to a struggle which can be avoided if the entire people join vigorously and with loyal conviction in the struggle to defend democracy, involving the strengthening of the basic values of man, and such small and insignificant efforts as voting in the general, trade union or cell elections held in order to elect, in all cases, individuals with firm democratic convictions, thus preventing infiltration by the extremists who seek a place in them in order to destroy them.

HEAD OF LEFTIST COALITION DISCUSSES REGIONAL, LOCAL ISSUES

San Jose LA REPUBLICA in Spanish 27 Aug 80 p 9

[Interview with United People coalition member Dr Rodrigo Gutierrez, by Wilmer Murillo in the column "Political Wednesdays in the Republic"; date and place not given]

[Text] The electoral mechanism which will culminate in October with the election of presidential candidate has also been put in motion in the United People leftist coalition sector. A physician, Dr Rodrigo Gutierrez, who is not regarded as a communist, appears to have the greatest chance of winning the nomination as the United People coalition's presidential candidate.

The leftist bloc leaders have started to organize a convention at which they believe some 160,000 persons will be voting.

In connection with that and other matters, we held an interview with Dr Rodrigo Gutierrez this week.

[Answer] No, I am not a member of any of the Marxist parties in the United People coalition. It is simply that those organizations are in agreement concerning my potential candidacy.

[Answer] I would not say so. It has been used pejoratively, based on all the propaganda put out by the news media and the big businessmen. All this propaganda has caused the term communist to be interpreted as something bad in a large portion of the country.

[Question] You belong to a coalition in which there are communists. How can Costa Rica's struggles for democracy and the zeal for the communist cause be reconciled?

[Answer] We have in the coalition the Popular Vanguard Party [Costa Rican Communist Party], the Costa Rican Socialist Party and the workers' party. There is also an extensive group of independent sympathizers who are not affiliated with any of those parties and are not militants in those organizations, comprising a group in the coalition. In the last campaign, individuals of all origins gave us backing as representatives of various sectors. On that occasion, in a major speech Prof Carlos Monge, who at the time was dean of the University of Costa Rica, put forth the views of those who were not members of the leftist parties as part of the plan that we want for United People, which is the only alternative for a real change from what exists. At that time, they fit together well. If you note the program of the three parties, you will find the reflection of a democratic base which is far broader and operational than what is normally interpreted as Costa Rican democracy. You find there this group which was formed for the defense of democracy. It is comprised of individuals acting in the defense of what they consider to be democracy. It is democracy to them. However, they regard any massive participation by the people in national decision-making as subversion. For example, they want a democracy wherein chambers of business owners meet, associate and protect their interests; but they disapprove of the workers' organization into unions. They consider that antidemocratic. And they are far less inclined to give this basic mass that we call the people an opportunity to participate and manage national institutions such as the CCSS [Costa Rican Social Security Institute]. I cannot understand why it should not be the people who decide, in the final analysis, whether the quality of medicine is good or bad, in the management of a national institution. We have a good democracy; it has developed sufficiently. Democratic rights have certainly been obtained from the oligarchy. The Labor Code, the social demands, and financing for higher education: those have been the cause of major battles on the part of the people. And that is why we have a better democracy. But it does not mean that this democracy must stop there. We have to struggle to enable the people to develop the means for their self-government. That is why the communists are battling for democracy. The United People's program has that goal. It is attempting to demand rights which the people do not have yet. There may be a different concept of democracy among that group. In order to defend it, the first thing they think of is taking away the workers' rights. That is a fascist position. In the defense of a democracy as they understand it, they make mistakes at odds with rights and liberties.

[Question] The design of a revolution unfolds as the struggle of oppressing classes against oppressed classes. Could such a revolution occur in Costa Rica?

[Answer] Contemporary history is proving that the great oppressed masses must necessarily acquire a greater consciousness of their rights, and of the possibility of liberating themselves from the ruling class. Every day, in Costa Rica, we observe signs of the acquisition of consciousness by those sectors of the people, through the strengthening of their organization. They are more clearly aware of their own rights and, at the same time, they are better establishing their position with respect to the other type of domination, stemming from foreign interests. So, there is no reason for Costa Rica to be an exception, in comparison with the rest of mankind.

[Question] There is a possibility that communism is receiving support from the popular majorities to make their social changes. In such an event, would you attempt to maintain and strengthen the capitalist democracy that we know?

[Answer] We believe that, as the situation stands, we are using the mechanism of legal struggle to participate in the elections. That is the course of action which we shall use. We would, indeed, like the bourgeoisie, and the foreign interests that are exploiting this country, to respect that course of action; because we are growing, and we shall come to power. This will happen if they do not interfere. Fascism is a legitimate offspring of capitalism. When the people make progress toward taking power, their form of government is eliminated, and replaced by fascism.

[Question] Do you think that the revolutionary movements in Latin America have advanced or retrogressed? Where do you perceive the areas of greatest tension?

[Answer] There is no doubt that they have advanced, despite the enormous pressure from the armies of each country and the State Department; sometimes with direct military occupation, as occurred in Haiti, the Dominican Republic, Cuba or Guatemala, directly with the Marines, or, as during the past 15 years, through the organization, training and supplying of repressive armies.

[Question] If it had not been for that repression, the Latin American peoples would now be governing themselves. Is it true that the communists control the strike movements?

[Answer] I was in the south, to observe what was happening. The majority of the strike committees are not comprised of communists. There are members of the Popular Vanguard in the administration of the confederations; but to claim that it is controlled means depriving the workers of the capacity to run their own organization. That is what the chambers in our country and the press claim, as a means of influencing public opinion against the strike. But there is the same relationship that might exist between the Democratic Workers Confederation and the PLN, or between the CTC [Confederation of Workers of Costa Rica] and the Christian Democrats. There is unquestionably a front in which the leftist parties attach importance to the advancement of the workers in unions.

[Question] The communists have been accused of following the Kremlin's instructions to cause agitation in the country. How would you prove that this is untrue?

[Answer] It is very difficult to offer proof. But I am quite certain that there has not been the slightest interference from Moscow with regard to our struggle, for two reasons: The first is that our organizations are quite clearly aware of how to manage and what to do in connection with our popular struggle in the country. It would be impractical for them to be analyzing there, and telling us what to do. That is something that would occur only to the oligarchy, but it is helpful to the latter from a propaganda standpoint. I would say that parties such as the PLN or the Christian Socialist Party are currently receiving money from abroad, and there are practical ways of proving that they receive instructions from and cater to interests outside of the country.

[Question] Do you believe that the so-called committee for defense of democracy is a shock force against communism? What dangers do you discern in a confrontation between the extremes?

[Answer] That committee is the organization of this country's oligarchy, with the backing or consent of the State Department, to protect its economic interests. We shall never fall into the trap of battling with those gentlemen, in the first place, because, within 10 minutes, they could collect half a million colones with which to make propaganda. It would be another campaign, like so many others that have occurred, only revealing the first signs of fascism when they observe that the people are beginning to acquire a consciousness of their rights.

[Question] The issue of relations with the Soviet Union has always caused controversy. There is still a distrust of Russian intentions. Don't you think that, by making some of their old mistakes, the Russians are jeopardizing relations with Latin America?

[Answer] In the United People program, we have a very clearcut point dealing with foreign relations. As an independent country, we shall have relations with all the nations of the world, relations marked by mutual respect and reciprocal advantage. The relations with the USSR and other countries are beneficial to Costa Rica.

[Question] It is admitted that the possibilities for commercial exchanges with Russia are limited. So what is the reason for Russia's interest in maintaining embassies, for example, in Costa Rica?

[Answer] I am not thoroughly familiar with the matter, but I think that the relations have not developed further because of the lack of interest on the part of local commerce. It simply sold coffee, and attempted to sell bananas. The economic relations were not encouraged; but they are here, and could be developed. In any event, I do not think that the principle is solely one of an economic nature. International relations are a little more complex than mere commercial exchange.

[Answer] Yes, and it is quite possible that I will be the presidential candidate. At the moment, an extensive national survey is going to be started, for confirmation, and also a search for another candidate. A kind of convention will be held in October. Work has started on the collection of some 100,000 signatures, to ratify my candidacy. In addition, we are in the process of organizing other independent forces, which are beginning to realize that the so-called change that the traditional parties have been controlling over the past 30 years is making very little difference, and are starting to view us as the path toward the real change.

COMMENTARY DENOUNCES U.S. INTERVENTION IN CENTRAL AMERICA

PA151219 Havana International Service in Spanish 0000 GMT 15 Sep 80

["Our America"]

[Excerpts] If some unwary soul still doubts that the U.S. imperialist government and some of its henchmen in Latin America and in other parts of the world are openly interfering in the domestic affairs of the Central American nations, the evidence revealed in the past few weeks would surely clear those doubts away. A war bulletin released by the Salvadoran Armed Forces of National Resistance [FARN] recently reported that on 15 August an American military instructor was killed in fighting in Santa Ana, in the western part of the country.

The bulletin adds that the incident occurred when several guerrilla units ambushed a rural police jeep and as a result of the operation, in addition to the American adviser, eight policemen were killed and four more were wounded. The bulletin says that the presence of these Yankee instructors shows the servility of the military-Christian Democratic tyranny. It notes that U.S. military intervention in El Salvador is so brazen that these individuals are openly involved in repressing the people. They are even giving orders in their own language, in English, and they do not bother to hide their physical appearance, which is quite different from that of Salvadorans.

Concerning the crisis in the upper military echelons of the tyranny, the FARN says the U.S. Embassy in El Savlador is pulling the strings of its criminal monsters in the armed forces.

Far from defending human rights, the U.S. reactionary circles are defending the right of the transnational companies to continue fleecing the so-called Third World nations in close collusion with the national oligarchies, which are satisfied with a small portion of the booty. The only right U.S. imperialism recognizes for the peoples of our America is the right to a slow death from hunger; the right to illiteracy and lack of education; the right to be tortured, imprisoned or killed; the right to renounce the beautiful ideal of a homeland, and the right to slavery.

DORTICOS CLOSES MATANZAS PARTY MEETING

FL151031 Havana Domestic Service in Spanish 1000 GMT 15 Sep 80

[Text] Osvaldo Dorticos Torrado, member of the party Politburo, has made the closing remarks at the provincial party review meeting in Matanzas which was held at the Heroes de Playa Grion Theater.

Dorticos stressed the achievements of the province in milk production and livestock development and the contribution of Matanzas to the increase of the country's export goods. In this regard, he emphasized the success of the Jaguey Grande citrus project.

Dorticos also referred to the fundamental role which Matanzas plays in the country's sugar economy and its position in comparison to the other provinces [presumably with regard to sugar production]. He expressed the party's confidence that Matanzas sugar workers will overcome successfully the difficulties of the previous harvest.

He mentioned the modest progress made in the implementation of the economic management and planning system. He said that many of the presentations made by delegates to the meeting showed maturity in economic awareness which is still modest although promising. [Havana Domestic Service in Spanish at 1100 GMT on 15 September reporting on the meeting says that Julian Rizo Alvarez was reelected party first secretary in Matanzas Province.]

NEW INVENTORY CONTROL REGULATION ISSUED

[Text of Decree No 68 of Executive Committee of Council of Ministers]

[Text] Whereas: Within the national economy there have been cases of accumulated inventories of production and consumer goods that exceed the real needs of the enterprises or are not used because their specifications do not correspond to the requirements of present consumption or because they have lost some of their physical or chemical properties;

Whereas: These accumulated inventories are due in part to changes in technology or decisions made outside the enterprises and due in part to such causes as acquisition of products for investments whose timetables were not based on real possibilities of execution, nonexistence of consumption or inventory standards or their incorrect application in planning or contracting, inadequate storage, unilateral sales without agreement with the alleged buyer, incorrect estimate of popular demand and lack until recently of centralized specifications for technical and material supply and for centralized circulation of products in the state sector as well as lack of credit mechanisms to help prevent excessive accumulation of rotating means;

Whereas: The frequent arrival of products imported irregularly or in concentrated form because of the proportion of our foreign trade that is with very distant countries, standardized distribution of some products concentrated on a date or brief period and the creation of exportable stock require temporary excessive inventories; and

Whereas: The idle inventories affect the economy of the enterprises and make the implementation of economic calculation difficult since efforts must be made to solve problems outside their main activity and usually outside their scope, it becomes necessary to take centralized measures to eliminate the present unnecessary accumulated inventories as quickly as possible and with the greatest benefit for the national economy and also, along with the application of the mechanisms of the Economic Management and Planning System, to aid strict compliance with the provisions on enterprises and budgeted units and the activity of the organizations of the Central State Administration and the local people's government organs to prevent new unnecessary accumulations;

Therefore: In use of the prerogatives conferred on it, the Executive Committee of the Council of Ministers decrees the following:

Regulation on Idle Inventories

Article 1. The objective of the present regulation is to establish the required regulations:

a) To clean out, consolidate, finance and eliminate idle inventories in the possession of the state enterprises as of 31 December 1979; and

b) To establish the treatment of idle inventories created in the state enterprises beginning 1 January 1980.

Article 2. For the effects of this regulation, idle inventories are classified as:

a) Obsolete or defective idle inventories; and

b) Excessive idle inventories.

Inventories defined as idle in resolutions of the State Committee for Material and Technical Supply and the Ministry of Domestic Trade will be included in these two categories.

Chapter I. Elimination of Idle Inventories Existing at End of 1979

Section 1. Cleaning Out, Consolidating Idle Inventories Existing at End of 1979

Article 3. Supply and sales enterprises, wholesale consumer goods enterprises and specialized supply enterprises are obliged to buy all the idle inventories existing as of 31 December 1979 that are in the possession of production and service enterprises, wholesale circulation enterprises, territorial or provincial enterprises or retail circulation enterprises which these offer for sale in accord with Articles 5 to 13 of the present regulation.

Article 4. The following terms will be used in the present regulation:

a) "Purchasing enterprise(s)" refers in the singular to any of the enterprises obliged to buy according to Article 3 and, in the plural, to all of them;

b) "Selling enterprise(s)" refers in the singular to any of the enterprises that offer idle inventories for sale according to Article 3 and, in the plural, to all of them;

c) "Idle inventories" without further specification refers to idle inventories existing as of 31 December 1979 in the possession of selling enterprises. This can also be called "idle merchandise" or "idle products"; and ch) "Governing organizations" refers to the Central State Administration organizations which are the superior national circulation organizations for the product involved.

Article 5. The selling enterprises are obliged to offer their idle inventories for sale in the following way:

a) To the purchasing enterprises which should buy them, according to the governing organizations;

b) Within 6 months after the date this regulation goes into effect with the exception of sales offers made to wholesale circulation enterprises or territorial or provincial enterprises in which case the obligation is extended for 6 months more;

c) Including in the offer the declaration of the idle products with their respective descriptions, place and date of delivery and other delivery conditions as well as other pertinent rights and obligations of the parties; and

ch) In writing with the approval of the director of the corresponding selling enterprise.

The governing organizations will regulate the procedures for the sales offer and develop and specify the provisions of this Article 5.

Article 6. The purchasing enterprise, within 45 days after the date of the sales offer made to it, must respond to that offer, including in the response a proposal for the sales contract to be signed by the parties.

The sales proposal will specify the products that will not be delivered immediately and must remain in storage at the selling enterprise.

Article 7. The parties will sign the contract within 90 days after the date of the sales offer.

Article 8. If it is agreed that the idle products are not to be delivered immediately to the purchasing enterprise:

a) They will remain in storage at the selling enterprise which will be responsible for their care and preservation and must report on them periodically, certifying their integrity and condition to the purchasing enterprise. The purchasing enterprise will pay the selling enterprise for storage expenses and any other related expenses; and

b) The contract will include the storage and subsequent delivery conditions for the products as agreed on by the parties.

Article 9. If the purchasing enterprise has not responded to the sales offer within the term mentioned in Article 6 or has not sent the corresponding sales proposal or has responded partially in any other way, it must be understood that it totally accepts the conditions of the sales offer. In that case, that offer will become the contract and under those terms the selling enterprise will bill and collect the amount for the idle inventories which will remain in storage at the expense of the purchasing enterprise, applying clause a of Article 8 at that time.

Article 10. When consumer goods for the people which retail and wholesale enterprises sell are involved, the idle merchandise which is defective and the merchandise which the governing organization determines cannot be sold during the present year because of the nature of its distribution must be bought by the circulation enterprise that sent them to the selling enterprise. In this case, the provisions on contracts in Articles 5 to 9 of this regulation are in effect with the sole exception of clause a of Article 5.

The determination of unsellable merchandise for 1980 must be made 45 days after the date this regulation goes into effect.

Article 11. The central circulation enterprises are obliged:

a) To declare the idle inventories in their possession as of 31 December 1979 to their respective superior organizations within 6 months after the date this regulation goes into effect; and

b) To buy in 1980 idle inventories existing as of 31 December 1979 from the enterprises that have them in their possession, whether they are purchasing or selling enterprises.

These obligatory purchases by the central circulation enterprises will be governed by the above articles in Chapter I of this regulation.

Article 12. The purchasing enterprises will not have to acquire excessive idle inventories that the selling enterprises offer for sale through the obligatory sales mechanism of this regulation if they are inventories that must be consumed or sold by this enterprise in 1980 according to the supply plan of the enterprise that has them in its possession.

The enterprises that refuse the offer in such cases can request corresponding adjustments to the supply contracts that they have pending as suppliers to the enterprises that have these idle inventories.

Article 13. The purchasing enterprises will maintain strict accounting, statistical and physical control over the idle products in stock as well as over the idle products that they buy in 1980 in order to guarantee their integrity and preservation and they will report on them periodically to their superior organizations and to the National Bank of Cuba.

Section 2. Financing, Elimination of Idle Inventories Existing at End of 1979

Article 14. The National Bank of Cuba will grant financing to the central circulation enterprises for up to 5 years without interest for amounts equivalent to the value of the idle inventories that they declare and acquire through Article 11.

Article 15. The central circulation enterprises and their superior organizations are obliged to negotiate and eliminate all idle inventories declared or acquired by them through Article 11. After consultation with the National Bank of Cuba, they will present to the government their proposals of elimination or rapid reduction of these inventories through exports, replacement of imports, use as raw materials for secondary production or for new articles by local industries or for sales to agricultural cooperatives, farmers, organizations, associations, individual workers or the people.

Article 16. The National Bank of Cuba will supervise the elimination of idle inventories, demanding that it be done in the shortest time possible and be justified economically. The central circulation enterprises and their superior organizations will draw up and present their plans to the bank, detailing volumes to be sold, timetables and forms of sale.

The bank will cancel financing when appropriate negotiations to reduce or eliminate the idle inventories are not carried out according to these plans, requiring immediate payment or transferring the amount to loans due when monetary funds are not available.

Article 17. Once negotiations for the use or sale of obsolete or defective idle inventories have been exhausted based on Article 11 of this regulation, the central circulation enterprises that have declared or acquired these products will certify this, report in writing on the negotiations to their superior organization or organ and ask for a declaration of total loss or allocation of the products for raw materials or other uses.

The superior organization or organ will accept or refuse this request within 60 days after its presentation. If it does not accept it, it will indicate the way to handle the products. If it accepts the declaration of total loss, it will indicate the method for applying for the destruction of the products. If it agrees to allocate them as raw materials, it will establish the deadline for that measure to be carried out.

If the request is accepted, the enterprise will cancel the value of those inventories in its books, requesting corresponding budgetary financing based on Article 19.

If the amount of the total loss of an enterprise does not exceed 500 pesos, the director of the enterprise is empowered to authorize the cancellation of the inventory and the destruction of the useless products.

Article 18. Every sale of idle inventories by the state enterprises that maintain them, whether obligatory or not, must be done at official established prices or through the specific procedures dictated by the State Committee for Prices for these objectives.

Article 19. The national, provincial or municipal budget, depending on the case, will finance 100 percent of the loss which is the result of any sales for the enterprise through its superior organization or organ. The request for this financing will be done according to the procedure established by the State Committee for Finance.

Chapter II. Treatment of Idle Inventories Created Beginning This Year

Article 20. The idle inventories created beginning on 1 January 1980 will receive the treatment established in Articles 21 to 26 of this regulation, depending on the case, with Articles 27 and 28 applicable to all cases.

Article 21. The excessive idle inventories produced beginning this year for reasons covered by the Single Plan for Economic and Social Development will be financed totally through the national budget.

Those inventories, independent of their location, will be recorded and controlled by the central circulation enterprises of the products involved or by the exporting enterprises if they are products to be exported, according to established procedure.

The Central Planning Board will inform the State Committee for Finance of the products included in the plan where these accumulations will occur, the volume these will reach and the organizations that will administer them.

Article 22. The excessive idle inventories produced in the enterprises beginning this year by superior decisions but not included in the Single Plan for Economic and Social Development will be financed by the national budget after approval by the Council of Ministers at the request of the Central State Administration organization that administers them. The administrating organization will request approval of the volume of these inventories from the Council of Ministers.

In the planned cases, the idle products, independent of their location, must be recorded as provided in the previous article.

Article 23. To determine the method of preservation, storage, handling and sale of the created idle inventories in the cases covered by Articles 21 and 22, the enterprises will be governed by the procedure established by the appropriate organization.

The holder of these inventories will collect storage expenses and other related expenses which will also be financed by the national budget.

Article 24. The enterprise that has recorded the merchandise considered as idle inventory under Articles 21 and 22 will receive the value of the existing inventories declared as such from the national budget through its superior organization or organ. Once the national budget gives the enterprise the value of these inventories through its superior organization or organ, they will be considered to have been acquired by the state.

The organization or organ appointed administrator of the inventories mentioned above will notify the holder of the value and volume of the released inventory as well as its destinations through the enterprise that has them recorded.

Once the authorizations for release are received, the enterprise that has these inventories recorded will pay the national budget the total value of the sales made, excluding the amount of the commercial surcharge or discount.

Article 25. The obsolete idle inventories that occur after 1 January 1980 can be sold by the enterprise to any other state enterprise that is interested in buying them.

The production or service enterprise that has defective idle inventories can also allocate them for secondary production or sell them directly to other state enterprises, especially to local industrial enterprises, or to agricultural cooperatives, farmers, organizations, associations, individual workers or the people.

In the sales mentioned in the two previous paragraphs of this clause, the enterprise does not need prior authorization from its superior organization or organ nor from the enterprises or organizations in charge of the circulation of this product.

If this merchandise is sold with adjustments in price based on present instructions of the State Committee for Prices, the losses that this causes will be financed according to the procedure established by the State Committee for Finance with the participation of the State Committee for Prices and the National Bank of Cuba as well as other organizations chosen by the State Committee for Finance.

Article 26. Stock that exceeds inventory standards can be sold to the enterprises from which they were received or, with their authorization, to other enterprises that need them.

The State Committee for Prices--with the participation of the State Committee for Finance, the Central Planning Board and the State Committee for Statistics--will establish the procedure to determine the expenses caused by the sale of products that exceed inventory standards. These expenses, as a general rule, must be assumed by the enterprise that has the inventories.

Article 27. Purchasing enterprises and budgeted units can refuse and return merchandise remitted to them which was not contracted as to assortment, size or other specifications.

Article 28. Production and service enterprises, wholesale circulation enterprises, territorial or provincial enterprises and retail circulation enterprises can request modification or rescission of their supply contracts based on the Regulation of General Conditions of Supply Contracts which is considered applicable to sales under this regulation.

Final Provisions

First: The National Bank of Cuba can, as an exception and because of the present stage of transition in the gradual implementation of the Economic Management and Planning System, grant credits to enterprises for up to 2 years with a special interest rate that will be fixed in each case by the president of the bank after specific requests to him by the head of the superior organization or organ of the corresponding enterprise. This will be done to resolve special and temporary situations of accumulated inventories not included in technical-economic plans through outside decisions.

Second: The National Bank of Cuba is obliged not to accept goods that are not adequately stored or well preserved and accumulated merchandise that is not economically sound and in line with the approved plans of the enterprises as material support for the short-term credits that it grants.

Third: The state organizations and organs and their subordinate enterprises, obliged to comply with the present regulation, will apply the appropriate administrative and disciplinary measures on those responsible for lack of compliance with its provisions or its complementary regulations.

Fourth: The State Committee for Finance is empowered to dictate the necessary regulations to clean out the idle inventories at budgeted units as of 31 December 1979.

Fifth: The placement and destination of idle inventories related to armaments, military technology and other areas related to defense or domestic order will be subject to the regulations of the Ministry of the Revolutionary Armed Forces and the Ministry of Interior in agreement with the principles of this regulation.

Sixth: The Central Planning Board, the State Committee for Prices, the State Committee for Finance, the National Bank of Cuba, the State Committee for Material and Technical Supply, the Ministry of Domestic Trade and the other organizations of the Central State Administration which control circulation of products will dictate complementary regulations required for the fulfillment of the present regulation within their jurisdiction.

Seventh: Any provision contrary to the present regulation which will go into effect upon publication in the GACETA OFICIAL DE LA REPUBLICA is repealed.

IMPORTANCE OF FULFILLING DUTY IN FAR NOTED

Havana VERDE OLIVO in Spanish 3 Aug 80 p 30-33

[Article by Mario Rodriguez: "Guidance Support for Troops"]

[Text] The officers from the general staff and the political section were visiting the small unit for the purpose of checking on the organization of the training process.

Among other aspects, the commission looked into the status of personnel training for guard duty.

During the inspection, personnel demonstrated good knowledge and also responded skillfully in the various situations that were created.

However, a whole series of shortcomings also came out, such as, for example, the lack of proper attention to the high fighting spirit of personnel reporting for guard duty and the failure to observe the kind of solemnity which must characterize the ceremony involved in the performance of this important duty.

Many think that guard duty is nothing more than something quite routine, a daily activity, just another assignment that does not require the mobilization of spiritual forces, willpower and true stoicism.

We believe that, behind all of the shortcomings pointed out, there is a lack of knowledge as to the regulations that govern the performance of this important activity without which it is impossible to speak of a high level of combat readiness.

The above paragraphs were taken from an article which was published recently under the title "A High Spirit on Guard Duty" by the newspaper KRASNAYA ZVEZDA, the central organ of the USSR Defense Ministry.

The material, written by Maj Gen A. Kostin, contains a large number of practical examples showing that strict compliance with all regulations is becoming ever more necessary.

This article undoubtedly is very much in line with our intention here to present, even though rather only summarily, some comments on important documents which govern military activities in our FAR [Revolutionary Armed Forces], in other words, general military regulations.

They constitute the legal setup which serves as the guideline for military organization and they are made up of the Interior Duty Regulations, the Garrison and Guard Duty Regulations, and the Disciplinary Regulations. All of them are closely tied together and each of them is part of an integral organism.

By way of example we might make reference to some significant aspects here.

The Guard Duty and Garrison Service Regulations, which we might take up here by way of example, took effect by virtue of Order 46 of 1976, issued by the Minister of the FAR; Article 183 provides for the following:

"The sentry is an inviolable person" and it defines what that inviolability consists of; it is of extraordinary importance and constitutes an indispensable requirement so that guard duty may accomplish its role as a combat mission.

The Interior Service Regulations, a document made effective by virtue of Order 45 of 1976 issued by the Minister of the FAR, in turn is an obligatory consultation document which furthermore requires profound and meticulous study.

In its 15 chapters, 17 annexes, and more than 400 articles, the member of the military establishment and especially the officer, as the person who holds highest responsibility for the education of fighting men, can find the central outlines governing the life and activities of any military unit. As is to be assumed, of course, where all of the provisions are complied with completely, there is no reason for any deficiencies in terms of internal duty, an aspect which constitutes the personality of any military group.

However it is necessary to underscore one particular detail which tells us that strict compliance with provisions alone is not enough to obtain the best results.

According to the regulations themselves, overall compliance with their precepts must be accompanied by high moral and fighting qualities, a profound ideological conviction, and total devotion to the cause of socialism and communism. Without that, the study and application of their content would become something mechanical and meaningless.

In Chapter 1, Article 1, the Interior Service Regulations state the following:

"The member of the Revolutionary Armed Forces of the Republic of Cuba is a defender of the socialist fatherland, its sovereignty, its territorial integrity, and the socialist revolution." Later on they point out the following:

"The member of the Revolutionary Armed Forces must consider it an honorable duty strictly to comply with the laws and requirements of the military oath; he must be disciplined, honest, valiant, and he must spare no effort, not even his own life, in doing his military duty."

Strict compliance with this precept of course cannot be achieved without good work from the political and ideological viewpoint.

This does not mean that the fighting man must blindly practice what has been spelled out in these provisions; instead, each of his actions must be backed up by a high level of consciousness and fidelity to the cause which he defends.

The above is fully demonstrated through the experience of the units which march in the vanguard of the competition process above all in the socialist competition initiator units.

In inspecting an artillery unit in the Western Region recently, a unit which initiated socialist competition in the FAR, we inquired as to the motivations of the fighting men in strictly carrying out the duties spelled out in the regulations.

The deputy chief for political activities answered our questions:

"In reality," he told us, "this has not been easy because it took quite some time and dedication to achieve the results which today are reality.

"I can tell you that a part of the secret of our success regarding unit service is due to the close link between that which must be carried out strictly and the full knowledge of its objective necessity. In my judgment, this is one of the causes behind the stable character of our results."

Work Tool

General military regulations, like all of the other orders and directives, constitute a valuable work tool and an important guide for action.

It is true, for example, that the commander is the direct organizer of the regulation and the order contained in it and that his activity is backed up by the laws, regulations, orders, and instructions from higher commanders.

In the same manner, there is no denying that the commander enjoys a high level of confidence given to him by the party and the government and that he is personally responsible for the combat readiness of the minor units

(unit) entrusted to his command. The Interior Service Regulations clearly spell out his functions in Article 14:

"Commanders have the right to issue orders to all subordinates and they have the duty to check into their execution, with the subordinates being obligated strictly to obey such orders."

We can thus infer that the regulations govern the sphere of action involving both commanders and subordinates as well as relations between them. Hence, their importance as an outstanding document providing guidance and standards.

As we may logically assume, it is impossible, in a few short paragraphs to bring out their full and varied content since their influence extends throughout the full wealth and problem complex of military activities.

The character of these regulations as a valuable working instrument is detected throughout their content.

Chapter 3, for example, precisely spells out the duties of military personnel who hold certain functions starting at the regimental level which is why consulting that passage is a first-ranking necessity.

Could one perhaps deny that the real causes of shortcomings in combat and political training many times spring precisely from a lack of knowledge of some of these duties?

This is why one of the first concerns of any commander must be to have a thorough knowledge of the authority conferred upon him by the regulations, in addition to having a mastery of his own specialty and the pedagogic principles which govern the training of fighting men.

This aspect is sometimes deficient in young officers who have recently graduated from military training centers since, as is quite natural, work in a new assignment always presents obstacles at the beginning. This is why the experience of officers with longer service must be used as a big help in this sense.

But there is certainly another aspect which is fundamental in the reliable and consistent implementation of regulations. The most important thing here is by all means possible to avoid simplifications in the organization of unit service, as well as violations of military regulations in general.

"In some units," it says in the article entitled "The General Staff and Unit Service," published in the newspaper KRASNAYA ZVEZDA, 12 June 1979, "instead of enhancing the responsibility of guard duty, of company billets, of the unit guard officer, of the motor pool guard officer, and of the enlisted man on guard duty at the gate, checking passes, additional responsibilities are assigned to those who already have enough to do or strict compliance with duties is not demanded; this sort of thing can not only create difficulties and problems but also leads to the violation of the requirements established for these types of duty performance."

The political and party organizations carry fundamental weight in the practical materialization of the general outlines contained in the regulations.

This is why their activities must among other things be aimed at rendering active assistance to the commanders and staffs in terms of improving the organization and implementation of everything regarding unit service. One of their main tasks at all times must be to support the demanding commanders, to strengthen their authority, to show the personal example set by communists and Young Communists in strict compliance with everything established in general military regulations, orders, and directives.

The importance of this aspect must be stressed at party and Union of Young Communists meetings regarding everything having to do with compliance with unit service because this will help strengthen work in this respect and will constitute an important educational resource.

Raising the level of consciousness regarding overall compliance with general military regulations and all other documents governing military activities undoubtedly is a responsibility of everybody and a practical way of complying with the provisions backing socialist legality within the FAR.

The systematic study of regulations by all personnel must be a priority task so that they may employ diverse and highly varied forms political media, and military education.

Attaining this objective means study and thorough research on regulations and the conscious and strict application of their content is more than just an urgent requirement for military activities--it is a necessity that cannot be neglected.

In his Order 117 of 1979, the Minister of the FAR establishes the measures which must be applied for this purpose.

It is necessary for the materialization of regulations to be turned into something normal, into a habit which runs parallel to the conduct of any activity and which is included in the conduct of every serviceman because, according to the provisions of Article 3, Interior Service Regulations:

"All military personnel must highly value the honor and fighting tradition of the FAR and their own military unit, as well as the dignity of their military rank. All military personnel must do their duty toward the socialist fatherland and the Republic of Cuba, in combat, to the end."

NATIONAL AIR TRAFFIC CONTROL CENTER DESCRIBED

Havana JUVENTUD TECNICA in Spanish Apr 80 pp 51-52

[Text] The National Air Traffic Control Center has the task of controlling and directing flights, using telecommunications with planes and all national and international airports, as well as control areas adjacent to Cuba, such as Jamaica, Merida, Miami and Houston (Texas).

The purpose of control is basically to guarantee safety and prevent collisions between planes and crashes. In order to carry out its functions, the Center assigns the routes to be followed and specific altitudes (from sea level to 19,812 meters), while taking the operational features of every plane into account. In order to ensure adequate separation between planes, the Center takes care of requests for deviations, ascents and descents and gives precise instructions enabling pilots to make rapid, comfortable and safe flights.

The Center also provides the latest meteorological information and in necessary cases, carries out search-and-rescue operations for lost planes or in complex situations requiring speed in operations and decisions in order to save lives.

The Center has 7 supervisors, 6 coordinators, 16 controllers and 17 assistants, who are intermediate-level technicians and specialists in air transit with good mastery of English. There is a rigorous annual medical physical which stresses psychological aspects because of the need to handle changing situations in a brief amount of time with great expertise. Air traffic controllers also give air directions from the ground, resolving emergency problems that are presented.

The Center's systems are of great electronic complexity, which requires that they be maintained by a corps of engineers and technicians with a high level of reliability and availability. This personnel also handle the system of directional radio beacons, nondirectional and telemetric beacons that mark the system of air routes and paths used by planes in their navigation. The system of aids also helps the controller to direct flights.

Control panels are transistorized and on them, one can choose desired frequencies based on the corresponding sector of work. There is a system of intercommunication with acoustic and luminous signals and it is possible to maintain several panels in conference at the same time.

Their installation permits changeovers so that any interruption can be solved in a brief amount of time. All systems at the Center are duplicated so that in case of breakdown, the reserve system goes into operation, allowing maintenance personnel to work on the faulty system without interrupting work at the panel.

The Center has a technical room equipped with control panels making it possible to ensure that work parameters are adequately complied with and detect whether difficulties are in the internal system of the panels or in an external section of the circuit.

The panels have a system of batteries with the capacity to work 24 hours without a break if there is any interruption in the power supply.

Communications of the panels are connected with advance stations located in Sandino, Pinar del Rio, Managua and another in Florida, Camaguey, through the microwave system of the Ministry of Communications. These advance stations make it possible to have communication cover of the entire control area assigned to Cuba.

The advance systems are double and also have reserve plants so as to guarantee uninterrupted operation.

These systems mean a leap in quality for air transit services because of the modern techniques involved and the scale achieved in sectorization of the air space. It is now possible to integrate radar and automatized systems, which will in the future be capable of assimilating growth in international air operations.

NEW FISHING VESSEL BEING BUILT IN LOCAL SHIPYARD

Havana MAR Y PESCA in Spanish Jul 80 p 27

[Text]

Technical sketch of the new perch boat designed by the Naval Projects Center of the Ministry of the Fishing Industry and already under construction by a Cuban shipyard.

The Naval Projects Center of the Cuban Ministry of the Fishing Industry has designed a vessel capable of carrying six plastic perch boats 7 meters long of the type used for perch and porgy fishing in the Gulf of Mexico. The launching and hoisting of the boats will be done by a hydraulic crane, which will greatly ease the work of fishermen.

The vessel, already being built by a Cuban shipyard, has its engine room abaft, with capacity for the main 340-hp engine, two 80-kWh generators and three cold compressors.

In front of the engine room is the processing chamber, equipped to freeze catches. Its capacity is approximately 1.5 tons per day.

Cabins and other facilities for the crew's use are in the prow superstructure, where there is a lounge-dining room, kitchen, cabins for crew members and a dispensary, all with the necessary equipment for air temperature control.

The vessel was designed to provide greater comfort for fishermen and ensure all hygienic and safety considerations for men living at sea.

The main features of this new fishing vessel are as follows: total length, 32 meters; length between perpendiculars, 28 meters; total beam, 8.5 meters; maximum draught, 2.5 meters; depth of hold, 4.1 meters; displacement, 360 tons; capacity of refrigerated hold, 90 tons; range, 2,500 nautical miles; power of main engine, 340 hp; and crew, 35 men.

PINAR CIVIL DEFENSE CHIEF NOTES ECONOMIC, SOCIAL WORKS

Havana VERDE OLIVO in Spanish 10 Aug 80 pp 39-41

[Text] On the approach of the date for the celebration of the 18th anniversary of the establishment of Civil Defense--31 July--its National General Staff announced that Pinar del Rio occupied first place during the 1979-1980 training year.

New and valuable achievements were recorded during the year now ending in factories, organizations, ministries, economic facilities of various types, in the formations and staffs throughout the land.

This victory of Pinar del Rio is a symbol of the development of civil defense which keeps up with the pace of the nation's economic and social impetus. This is why VERDE OLIVO interviewed the civil defense head in that province, his chief of staff, and the two militia members who are the founders of that outfit.

Comrade Orlando Lugo Fonte, president of the people's government in Pinar del Rio, is head of civil defense. In answering our question concerning the causes of the success achieved, he said that he considered the main causes to be the tenacity, enthusiasm, and seriousness of the staffs, both in drawing up wartime plans and plans against hurricanes, as well as in practical activities.

First of all I have to report the conviction of the cadres in civil defense, in the people's government, and the party regarding the importance of this type of work," he said, "along with the benefits to the country deriving coordination in case of natural disaster or enemy attack. This can be seen by the support given by the mass organizations and the staffs of the various organizations, the close relations with the FAR [Revolutionary Armed Forces], the Army Corps, and the Ministry of the Interior.

"This awareness and the love of all comrades in the accomplishment of their tasks is another one of the reasons why we achieved these triumphs. In spite of everything, we have quite a way to go yet and more triumphs to harvest.

"In a word, the conviction that we have regarding civil defense work, relations with government agencies and with the party--these determine the organizational and operational successes of civil defense in our province."

The effort of improving combat readiness is being accomplished along with routine tasks in the production of industrial establishments, services, and agriculture. The next question involved the factors which in practice contributed to the attainment of high levels of combat training during the year.

"We believe that some questions of a practical character helped us," he replied, "including the exercises we carried out, the natural phenomena, the supervision and substantial aid given by the Civil Defense National General Staff, its recommendations; all of that helped us in perfecting our plans.

"There is one important thing I must mention: the close connection between the entire people and civil defense work and the role which the printed and electronic press of our province has played. We have had a series of practical examples during the latest atmospheric phenomena: the electronic press--Radio Guama--did a tremendous job in providing guidance, it really mobilized everybody, it provided information and guidance for the people all along. This facilitated permanent communication with the masses and helped produce rapid responses at the necessary moment. Not a single area was left without instructions as to what to do.

"Under these circumstances we were able to see how the comrades grow in their performance as they face the difficulties and how they implement their work plans."

"How do the workers and peasants carry out these activities?" we asked next.

In view of the presence of natural phenomena, we had an opportunity to put into practice what we had learned theoretically. To perform our functions and to carry out our plans, we had to do good work at the base, in the various base staffs, and at the places of work. Since we are a mostly rural province, work in the field is decisive regarding what we are going to do.

"We were able to see that for ourselves in our struggle to save human lives. For the sake of preventing personal misfortunes, we made sure that every delegate was familiar with his district, first of all, the families who would have to be evacuated, the members of those nuclei, the location of their homes, the place where those persons are to be taken, the driver of the vehicle who must bring them there, the shelter conditions, the shelter managers, the cooks, the nurse, etc. Then, when the order is given, the delegate does not have to worry about these things because he knows that evacuation is guaranteed.

"That has not been a theoretical problem but involved practical work in all areas of the province, in the agricultural enterprises and cooperatives. The peasants know where to take their animals and everything they have to do in order to safeguard the various sectors of the economy.

"There are no great differences between what we plan and what we do afterwards. But we must continue in our effort to consolidate each aspect of our work plans.

"The readiness, the enthusiasm of the workers, peasants, the service employees, students, the entire people of Pinar del Rio in effectively carrying out civil defense tasks and missions are evident. They demonstrate that each year when necessary."

"What was the final result in social-economic terms in the province and to what factors do you attribute it? What is the relationship between this and civil defense?"

"This year important work was done in the tobacco and sugar harvest, in the health field, in education, in services in general, in construction work and in sports. All of the successes on these fronts, over the past two decades, have changed the panorama of the province which once upon a time was called 'Cinderella.'

"I must stress," he added, "the great work done by the mass organizations in achieving these economic and social results. This effort by the mass organizations is manifested through assistance to civil defense and support for its tasks and missions. This is what permitted all of the successes which enable us to celebrate the 18th anniversary in Pinar del Rio."

Capt Ignacio Camara Castillo, chief of staff in Pinar del Rio, said that this has been one of the best years in terms of the levels of organization and combat and political training achieved.

"I believe that this is due to the interest of each and every one of the members of our formations in the activities we carried out. We gave instruction on the levels of CDR [Committees for the Defense of the Revolution], the peasant bases; we had achievements in connection with the exercises involving the participation of the people and coordination with the FAR and the Ministry of Interior.

"Each soldier, each officer, each member of civil defense demonstrates his interest in training so as to act effectively in case of war or natural disasters. Modern war presents us with complex situations and we must know how to respond to them, we must know how to solve the problems that arise, and this is why we emphasize the attainment of ever higher levels of combat training. The party and the government are devoting special attention to these activities and we can see the results here. As evidence of this we are accepting pledges at the meetings of the executive committee in support of civil defense.

"One interesting aspect of our work is the training process at the peasant bases. On that score we can say that the entire population of Pinar del Rio has become aware of the measures and steps that must be taken in response to natural phenomena.

"This has been a tremendous instruction effort. We gained valuable experience in practice. We also used the mass media to issue guidelines, to brief the people on missions and to mobilize everybody for exercises, practice sessions, or in case of natural disaster."

In concluding the interview, Captain Camara said that the civil defense formations are prepared to carry out any assignment given them and that they are perfecting their classroom instruction, practical exercises, and training sessions.

Second Lt Ramon Reinoso Martinez recalls the time when the National Revolutionary Militia was founded, when he joined the 16th Battalion. As an unforgettable period in his life as militia member he mentioned the October Crisis because "we had a big job to do and everybody had to pitch in. We were mobilized a month and a half at that time, waiting for the enemy to give him what he deserved. Then I was transferred to People's Defense, as Civil Defense was called at that time. Since that time I have been very active during exercises, maneuvers, as well as political, cultural, sports, and other meetings."

At this time, Second Lt Ramon Reinoso is commander of a civil defense territorial unit in the township of Pinar del Rio.

"My unit has a very special characteristic," he says, "because it is one of the units created to go into action in natural disasters and in time of war. It consists of rescue detachments, first-aid teams, traffic police, and regular police. They are trained to respond to any kind of situation that might arise.

"The attitude of the personnel under my command is magnificant. They learn very well in the special training classes, to the point where they were able to get the grade of 'good.' With this grade, we hale the Day of the Militiamen. Now we are all happily looking forward to the 31st because we will participate in the ceremony in honor of the 18th anniversary of civil defense.

Aida Ramos Huerta is also a charter member of the militia and right now she is chief of personnel for a sector in the city of Pinar del Rio.

"My most emotional moments came in the National Revolutionary Militia and in Civil Defense when we had to save human lives," she said. "This has always been one of the main functions of my unit; here my comrades attained the grade of 'good.' We are all very much concerned with our work in the various activities we perform; their attitude has always been very good.

"In this revolutionary process, the participation of women is important. Through civil defense we can express the right we have to defend the fatherland, to make our contribution to saving lives and repelling enemy aggression."

BARAHONA DISCUSSES FOREIGN AID, REPRESSION IN GUATEMALA

FL111857 Havana Domestic Service in Spanish 1808 GMT 11 Sep 80

[Text] Elias Barahona y Barahona, who worked undercover in the high circles of the Guatemalan regime, has visited the studios of Radio Reloj National Network and answered some questions about the situation in his country.

Barahona charged that the Romeo Lucas Garcia government receives direct assistance from Israel, Argentina, Chile, Honduras and United States. The Guatemalan revolutionary added that over the past few months U.S. assistance to the Romeo Lucas Garcia regime is given covertly through Israel.

Elsewhere in his statements to Radio Reloj, Barahona said that Israeli assistance to the Guatemalan Army and police consists primarily of training of terrorist commandos, the supply of weapons of various types and calibers, repression equipment and technical advice.

During his visit to this radio station, Barahona added that the Guatemalan people now are facing their most critical situation as a result of the fierce slaughter unleashed by the fascist regime in that Central American country. He said that an average of 15 to 20 persons are murdered each day by the death squad or the anticommunist secret army which are nothing more than organizations composed of officers of the army and national police to silence protests over the lack of freedoms of the Guatemalan people.

He charged that the army high command plans everything done by these paramilitary groups whose repressive actions are aimed against all progressive groups.

In his statements to Radio Reloj, Barahona also referred to the participation of foreign advisers in the repression of the Guatemalan people. He said that foreign advisers train the interrogators of clandestine jails of the anticommunist secret army and death squad. He emphasized that these personnel have received additional training in Chilean and Argentine schools and that the ones involved in assassinations have learned to fire weapons with Israeli experts in the Guatemalan mountains.

Barahona went on to say that during the time he was infiltrated in the government he witnessed numerous inhuman actions. He recalled the time when Gen Romeo Lucas Garcia personally ordered the assault on the Spanish Embassy in Guatemala City. Thirty-nine persons burned to death in that action when police forces threw incendiary bombs against the diplomatic mission where a group of peasants had taken refuge.

In his statements to Radio Reloj, Elias Barahona, who became press chief of the Guatemalan interior minister, recalled when his chief ordered the machinegunning of all students who were arriving at San Carlos University. He said that 24 students were murdered and more than 40 were seriously wounded in that massacre.

Lastly, Barahona denounced the regime's repression of Guatemala's Indian population, primarily in Quiche, Baja Verapaz and Alta Verapaz departments where troops specialized in torture and assassination slaughter peasants in the presence of their wives and children.

Elias Barahona also emphasized the need to develop a broad campaign of international solidarity withthe struggle of the Guatemalan people to prevent the abuses being committed by the regime.

PORT WORKERS EFFICIENCY--Jorge Risquet, member of the party secretariat, has urged the country's port workers to average a monthly unloading figure of 750,000 metric tons of products. Risquet said at a meeting in Havana that the key to efficiency in the port-transportation-domestic economy network is to organize an uninterrupted work flow. We must work day and night, from Monday to Sunday, because the still partial implementation of this fundamental truth has enabled us to increase the unloading plan, he added. He pointed out that if the work is well done, the extra fees that have to be paid when ships have to stay in port longer than scheduled--now $46 million --could be reduced to $10 million. The victory will belong to the workers and the trade union, whcih will have then given an accurate response to the call of the party. He announced that next year we will have more equipment, spare parts and accessories, new port installations, cold storage plants and warehouses. OCLAE STATEMENT ON CHILE--The Continental Organization of Latin American Students, OCLAE, has issued a statement of support for the antifascist struggle in Chile to mark today's international day of solidarity with the people and students of Chile. The document says that the past 7 years has seen tens of thousands of Chilean patriots murdered, missing, jailed, savagely tortured and forced into exile but the attempt to crush resistence has been in vain. The statement adds that at this moment, the assassins of Allende are trying to legitimize this denigrating situation in the eyes of the world and, in a most cynical manner, have called the people to a plebiscite today, 11 September. This farce, the OCLAE says, faithfully reflects how isolated and despised the fascist dictatorship of Pinochet is. The OCLAE strongly condemns this new antipopular attempt and expresses its conviction that the people will continue the struggle. [FL111513 Havana Domestic Service in Spanish 1400 GMT 11 Sep 80]

ALMEIDA ATTENDS ETHIPIAN RECEPTION--Commander of the Revolution Juan Almeida Bosque, member of the party Politburo, has attended a reception hosted by Aemero Wondimagegnehu, ambassador of Socialist Ethiopia in Cuba, on the occasion of the sixth anniversary of the revolution in that fraternal country. Others present included Dawit Wolde Giorgis, member of the Central Committee of the commission for organizing the party of workers of Ethiopia, who heads a delegation as special envoy of Chairman Mengistu Haile Mariam; and other Cuban leaders and officials. Julio Camacho Aguilera, member of the party Central Committee secretariat and first party secretary in Havana City, and Secundino Guerra and Jorge Lezcano, both members of the Central Committee, were also there. Jaime Crombet and Carol Miranda were reelected first and second party secretaries, respectively. Work objectives from now until the next provincial party assembly were approved and delegates to the second party congress were elected. Machado Ventura highlighted the role of the militant, the cadres and the party in general in the critical analysis of problems and in the search for solutions to all the difficulties that might arise in daily work. He expressed his conviction that the people of Pinar del Rio will make tobacco recovery a success and have an efficient harvest, and that they will continue, as they have done so far, to fulfill all their commitment with the revolution and Fidel. NEWSPAPER EDITOR CRITICIZES AGRARIAN, BANKING REFORMS

[Text] "The political solution and the end of violence will come in El Salvador only upon the overthrow of the military and the victory of the people." This statement was made yesterday by Jorge Pinto, editor of the Salvadoran newspaper, EL INDEPENDIENTE, a news organ which was bombed a few weeks ago, who visited EL NUEVO DIARIO yesterday.

Pinto said that peace would not come to El Salvador until the people are victorious, because any attempt at reforms now is futile.

He added that the so-called agrarian reform and banking reform in his country have only served to protect the money of the rich, and to shoot down farmers. "It is a mean trick," remarked Jorge Pinto who, despite many attacks and threats, has continued with his newspaper, remaining loyal to the cause of the Salvadoran people.

He is visiting in Managua. This article is the result of the summary of a conversation held with colleagues Xavier Chamorro, Leo Gabriel, Filadelfo Aleman and Mario F. Espinoza.

The Attack on the Newspaper EL INDEPENDIENTE

It is a morning paper, and so the military who arrived to dynamite the shops found people working. They were being harassed by the guards dressed in civilian clothes.

The offices and his residence were also machinegunned and his son who was in a crib miraculously escaped death.

He noted that the history of EL INDEPENDIENTE dates back to 1885, the year in which his grandfather, Miguel Pinto, founded the newspaper SIGLO XX.

"We consider EL INDEPENDIENTE to have come into existence 90 years ago. After my father was shot, while he was editor of EL DIARIO LATINO, we became divided into two different branches.

"Our newspaper still has the same ideals, related to demands for the nation, and the same desires for seeking a total transformation for our country.

"EL INDEPENDIENTE dates back to 1885, like EL NUEVO DIARIO, It is not a current paper, but dates back to Pedro Joaquin Chamorro."

Rejection of Reforms

In discussing the Junta's reforms, Jorge Pinto said that the farmers have rejected the agrarian reform, commenting: "They cannot accept the fact that the same gentleman who repressed them is giving them a bit of land."

He added: "In my opinion, if they had not made that mockery of an agrarian reform, the farmers would have taken over the land. The army made this attempt at agrarian reform to protect the land for the rich."

With regard to the banking reform, he claimed that it was a big farce. "The army and the political schemers publicized it, so that the oligarchy would adopt its measures. They took out $1.5 billion before the measure; in other words, it was lent just the same."

He noted: "The banks are still operating in the same way, and those receiving loans are still the same individuals. In other words, there has been no nationalization. It is a mean trick, played to protect the banks for their owners.

"Insofar as agrarian reform is concerned, everyone knows that they have even gone so far as to shoot down farmers in the countryside."

Mean Trick

He stressed the fact that the Salvadoran people are opposed to the Junta. "As I have stated, I do not think that the struggle of the people of El Salvador is a struggle of the left against the right, but rather a struggle of the people against an army which has massacred them for 47 years."

Jorge Pinto said: "EL INDEPENDIENTE is anti-imperialist. The intervention in our country is more subtle than in other countries.

"The five Christian Democrats would not be there if it were not for North American support. That support consisted of bullet-proof vests which they sent to the army.

"The political support is in the form of speaking in favor of the Junta. We regard the Junta as being the extreme right, and that is what the State Department is backing. The five Christian Democrats are in collusion with the gorillas."

He pointed out that the individual who was secretary general of the Christian Democratic Party (because the latter is no longer in existence) has a permanent position in the American Embassy.

He said: "They, the imperialists, are intervening in El Salvador by buying the board of directors of the Christian Democratic Party, so that they may provide the cosmetics for the gorillas."

In discussing the role played by Venezuela with respect to El Salvador, he said that it supplied $20 million, a sum which was claimed to have been exchanged on the black market.

Monsignor Arnulfo Romero was assassinated while celebrating a Mass for the repose of the soul of Jorge Pinto's mother.

Monsignor Romero

He was asked:"What has happened since that assassination?"

He replied that the unity has become consolidated; "Monsignor Romero is irreplaceable." However, he made the qualifying remark that the Church as an institution remains on the side of the just cause of the Salvadoran people.

He emphasized the good judgment of the leadership in restraining excesses on the part of the people after the prelate's assassination, "which is what the right wing wanted," and he reiterated: "The Church remains committed."

Analyzing the topic of the Salvadoran press, he indicated that EL INDEPENDIENTE is the favorite newspaper of the Salvadoran people.

The Journalist

We asked him what the position of the journalist would be in a situation wherein there is a political vanguard such as the Revolutionary Democratic Front and the Coordinator of Masses. He was asked what the journalist's concept of independence is when there is a strong political vanguard.

Pinto replied that he considered it a good thing that this vanguard is apprised of the pulse of public opinion, adding: "We journalists have a better way of detecting it than the sociologists do. It is a good idea to show the results of the thermometer every day, not only to the political vanguard, but to the Salvadoran people, as well."

He was asked about other newspapers, and answered Xavier Chamorro by saying: "Like you, I came from a family of journalists. I have an uncle who is a newspaper editor. I do not think that the newspapers are being objective about the real situation. Dreadful things are happening, and the Salvadoran press seems not to notice anything. This is the sad reality of the Salvadoran press."

The Troops

It has been claimed that a large number of troops would fight on the side of the people when the struggle becomes more heated. He was asked about this.

"We believe that also; the big change could occur at any time. They are youths about 18 years of age.

"In El Salvador, there is not a military guard force like that in Nicaragua. Manysectors of the army have joined the struggle, but secretly; and that is why I think that the end is near."

He was asked about this new imperialist phrase, the "cordon sanitaire," which means establishing a cordon around the Salvadorans, through Honduras and Guatemala.

"I know that an attack is being attempted. We have been accused of having our revolution infiltrated with foreign elements, but there is also in El Salvador sufficient unity to defeat the gorilla regime which has oppressed the people for 47 years.

"The revolution cannot be deterred; there is no pact that can prevail. The military have always used cosmetics.

"The Revolutionary Democratic Front, of which I am not a member, has forces without which they could not govern."

Regarding the peace negotiations between Honduras and El Salvador, he said: "These maneuvers are intended to enable them to seek what they call 'the pocket," which is a no-man's land where the gorillas presume there are many guerrilla fighters. That does not suit the two governments, which are so much alike."

He stressed the fact that the gorilla military of El Salvador are the same as in 1932, when they murdered 30,000 farmers.

"The imperialists have tried to convince people that this Junta is moderate, and that it is in the middle of the extremes; but that is not so. They are the same gorillas as ever, changing the cosmetics depending on the times. The Salvadoran Army has a great inclination toward massacre, but it did not have a general before. Now it does have one, Napoleon Duarte, a Christian Democrat and member of the Junta."

He was asked: "Do you fear for your life?" He answered: "All of us Salvadorans fear for it."

COUNTRY'S DECISION TO POSTPONE ELECTIONS SCORED

Hypocrisy of Leaders

San Jose LA NACION in Spanish 25 Aug 80 p 14A

[Text] With literacy campaign members chanting "We don't want elections" over and over again in the background, Commander Ortega Saavedra, Nicaragua's defense minister, delivered a fiery and unambiguous speech last Saturday at 19 de Julio Square, announcing, among other things, that elections would not be held in Nicaragua until 1985.

Those who had hoped for something better, for a more encouraging announcement of a probable move towards representative democracy, were no doubt bitterly disappointed. Nicaragua, Commander Ortega pointed out with forthright gestures, will not have elections for 5 more years, and when they are held, he noted with oratory emphasis, they will not be the elections of liberals, conservatives, reactionaries and imperialists. The only thing that he did not say was that they would not be like Costa Rica's elections, perhaps out of consideration for President Carazo, who was listening to his harangue quite close by.

After a quick and massive literacy campaign, the Sandinists feel that the Nicaraguan people are not ready for elections, in other words, to decide for themselves what government and what leaders they want. The thousands of literacy campaigners and members of the Sandinist National Liberation Front who filled 19 de Julio Square were jubilant at the defense minister's announcement that elections would not be held in the near future. Their cries of "we don't want elections" will soon be followed by the cries of "we don't want freedom," "we don't want pluralism," "we don't want dissidents."

The "machine" is bearing its fruits, and for the time being there are organized, disciplined and indoctrinated masses in Nicaragua who will do whatever the commanders wish.

Why hold elections, the commanders reason, when what was organized on Saturday at 19 de Julio Square is a more authentic grassroots expression than the elections of liberals, conservatives, reactionaries and imperialists? And literally emulating Fidel Castro's peculiar mass dialog with the people, the defense minister posed questions to his listeners, who quickly chanted the proper answers.

There are no signs that the Nicaraguan people are finally getting to know democracy, unqualified and unconditional democracy, real democracy, not the "people's democracy" of Poland, Cuba, Russia and all of the other regimes in which communist totalitarianism prevails. In 1985 the Sandinist National Liberation Front will stage certainly not U.S. imperialist-style, but rather Soviet-style elections.

This is at least what we can infer, without prejudgments, from the words of Commander Ortega, whose radicalization contrasts with the messages that the Government Junta issues for export about its pluralism and mixed economy. Like a left-wing Pinochet, the defense minister distrusts liberal democracy and politicians, and just like him, establishes a period at the end of which, in an indeed hazy future, the people can exercise their inalienable rights. The specter of totalitarianism continues to encroach with resolute insistence on the destiny of a people who deserve a better fate.

Future Soviet-Style Dictatorship

[Text] Faced with the demand by Nicaragua's four democratic parties that the people be summoned to municipal elections in 1981, the Sandinist Government, after several delays and ambiguous moves, has spelled out its stand in this regard. It has announced that the first election after the revolution will take place in 1985, when the regime is 6 years old.

The decision, which prompted a wide range of comments both in Nicaragua and on the continent, was reported by Commander Humberto Ortega, the commander of the army, at a public ceremony on the 23rd of this month.

On that occasion, Ortega made statements that are open to a wide range of interpretations and that, to begin with, caution us that the elections eventually foreseen for the land of Dario are a dubious road to real democracy.

The Sandinist leader said literally that the elections "will be to improve the revolutionary government."

He went on to say that it would not be a consulting of society "to raffle off power to someone, because the people have their power through their vanguard, the Sandinist National Liberation Front."

In January 1984, he reported, the people are to begin the election process whereby Nicaraguans "will determine the government that will continue building the new Nicaragua."

At that time, the military commander concluded, the people will choose the government program and the country's finest men, who will take charge of the government and continue carrying forward the tasks of the revolution.

The data are all too eloquent.

In the first place, the elections are no less than 6 years off. Secondly, we are told in a way that leaves no room for doubt that the elections will not determine who holds power, because that belongs to Sandinism. Finally, in 1984 and 1985 "the people" will select a government program and the country's finest men to continue more of the same.

What practical inferences can we make from Commander Ortega's statement, from the standpoint of an analysis based on democratic premises?

In the first place, during the initial 6 years "the people" will obviously be replaced by the Sandinist National Liberation Front (FSLN), which has not consulted the citizenry in instituting a number of clearly totalitarian measures, such as the ill-famed Sandinist Defense Committees (CDS), carbon copies of Cuba's Committees for the Defense of the Revolution (CDR), whose job is neighborhood spying and systematically informing on all those who reject the single party system.

Secondly, what will Nicaragua be like 5 years from now? One does not have to be an expert political analyst to see that one of the government's aims is the disappearance of democratic parties by 1985, as a result of pressures, ideological persecution, doctrinary blackmail, mass media propaganda, the school system and the literacy campaign. Thus, elections will not be necessary, and if they are held, they will be a total farce.

Everyone is familiar with the close ties between the heads of the FSLN and the Cuban Government.

And it is common knowledge that dictator Fidel Castro has always cynically proclaimed: "Elections, what for?"

Therefore, it should not surprise us if Fidel's pupils, unable to emulate their brazen leader because Nicaragua is not an island and, furthermore, needs international loans to emerge from its deep economic crisis, do in fact call elections, but of the kind favored by those who do not believe in the people and would rather replace them with an elitist, dogmatic and intolerant "vanguard" that monopolizes all of the machinery of power.

Now then, the question we must ask is: Will the Nicaraguan people tolerate this outrage and support this undisguised attempt to strip them of their sovereign power and to determine their destiny?

Travelers arriving from Nicaragua report that the political situation there is touchy, that there is mounting opposition to oppressive measures and that the Social Democratic, Nicaraguan Democratic Movement, Social Christian and Democratic Conservative parties are being joined by more and more citizens, who fought the government of the Somoza family not to replace it with an even more closed and inhuman tyranny but to move towards an open, pluralist and democratic society.

Hence, the question that remains unanswered is: Will the agents of Soviet totalitarianism succeed in imposing on Nicaraguans a dictatorship similar to Cuba's, Vietnam's or Cambodia's?

Developments in the immediate future will provide us with the answers. Meanwhile, Commander Ortega's statement on "elections Nicaraguan-style" will greatly please those who naively or deliberately have been insisting that Sandinism is a democratizing force.

The facts are in and they could not be more eloquent....

PCD, MDN CRITICIZE FSLN DECISION ON ELECTIONS

End of Pluralism Feared

Managua LA PRENSA in Spanish 27 Aug 80 pp 1,12

[Text] The PCD [Democratic Conservative Party] of Nicaragua views with profound surprise and concern the Pronouncement of the FSLN [Sandinist National Liberation Front], read by the head of the Sandinist Army, Commander Humberto Ortega, at the Saturday 23 August rally, organized--it was said--to honor the literacy campaign workers, but turned, in fact, into an act of partisan political propaganda.

The FSLN Pronouncement, in announcing of its own accord, as it does, that there will be no elections in Nicaragua until 1985 and that the FSLN is the proprietor of the government, poses the serious problem of a de facto, fundamentally unlawful, situation wherein a group exercises a power without legal limitations of any kind and over the Government Junta which, according to the fundamental legal documents of the new state, represents and exercises the civil power in that state in the view of the Nicaraguan people and in the view of the nations of the world.

The FSLN communique states in its point 4: "Having come into power, the FSLN, in its capacity as the real vanguard and as the leader of the Nicaraguan people, decided to install a Government Junta..." The Revolution and the government, then, according to this statement, are the property of the FSLN. These words are moreover contrary to the historical facts, in that, as is well known, the Government Junta was organized in Costa Rica 1 month before 19 July and as the outcome of the Puntarenas Pact, to provide representation within the said Junta for political sectors that were not identified with the FSLN but that had participated decisively in the Revolution, and to thus recognize the pluralistic nature of that body.

The pluralistic nature of the Revolution and of the Government Junta is expressly set forth in that Junta's initial proclamation of 18 June 1979, which states among other concepts: "We announce that the government now constituted with the full backing of the FSLN and of the nation's other democratic forces, all of which were belligerently involved in the final struggle against dictatorship, will institute action...etc."

Opposite the FSLN's gradual absorption of power, from its totalistic identification of the official bodies and assets of the state with those of its own partisan Sandinist organization to its Pronouncement of 23 August, in which it factitiously positions itself over the Government Junta and the Council of State and assumes sovereignty over the state, we hereby make known to the Nicaraguan people and to the peoples of the world:

1. Tnat the vague and imprecise manner in which it treats the electoral process does not satisfy the requirements of fully guaranteeing "... the right of all Nicaraguans to participation in the political process and universal suffrage..." (Point I.1 of the Government Platform);

2. That we reiterate our recognition of the National Reconstruction Government Junta as the highest authority of the state and the embodiment of the pluralistic spirit of our Revolution, and of the FSLN as the military force subordinate to the civil government;

3. That the sole concept that emerges clearly from the Pronouncement we are criticizing is the FSLN's own Marxist-Leninist concept of democracy;

4. That despite the foregoing, the PCD will continue its organizational effort to be prepared for the ideological and civic confrontation that must result in an electoral process in accordance with the true concept of western democracy;

5. That meanwhile the PCD will continue demanding:

a) Promulgation of the Law on Political Parties and Political Rights and Responsibilities of citizens;

b) Promulgation of the Law on Identity Cards and its effective implementation;

c) Promulgation of the Electoral Law and the corresponding Electoral Registry with counseling from Costa Rica, Peru and Venezuela;

d) Promulgation of a law that regulates the operation of all municipalities and provides for the holding of simultaneous municipal elections throughout the nation;

e) The holding of elections to install a Constituent National Assembly for the purpose of promulgating the new Political Constitution of Nicaragua;

f) The holding of elections to name the supreme authorities of the republic;

g) Unrestricted freedom of the press and elimination of the television monopoly and confiscated radios now in the hands of the FSLN;

h) Prohibition against political proselytizing by members of the Armed Forces;

6. That the PCD will hold the required consultations with the nation's other democratic parties to seek concurrences in specific plans for the implementation of the program mentioned in the immediately preceding numbered paragraph;

7. That the PCD is fully confident that in a climate of broad freedom the Nicaraguan people will be capable of choosing and implementing a Western democratic system as a result of an honest, effective and free electoral process;

8. That the PCD condemns as abusive the order to enlist all "brigadistas" in the 19 July Sandinist Youth, an FSLN-sponsored organization, when the vast majority of the youth joined the literacy campaign without any ideological commitment and inspired only by a patriotic ideal of commitment to the illiterate urban and rural populations;

9. That the PCD repudiates all adventuristic armed movements that would only play into the hands of the Marxist-Leninist scheme, which has need of such movements to further strengthen its politicomilitary apparatus.

Acts of Demagogy Predicted

Managua LA PRENSA in Spanish 26 Aug 80 pp 1,5

[Text] In a meeting of the National Council of the MDN [Nicaraguan Democratic Movement] held at noon at its headquarters, the FSLN document read by Commander Humberto Ortega Saavedra on 23 August was analyzed.

MDN leaders indicated that their analysis will have to be discussed in great detail with lawyers and leaders not only of its own organization but also those of the nation's other concurring democratic parties, such as the PSCN [Nicaraguan Social Christian Party], the PCD [Democratic Conservative Party], the PSD [Social Democratic Party] and the MDN [Nicaraguan Democratic Movement].

By 1600 hours the same day, Monday 25 August, at the headquarters of the PSD in Managua, invitations had been sent out to the leaders of all the above-mentioned political organizations to analyze the FSLN document, which, according to MDN leaders, contains proposals for supposedly leading the people toward a popularly elected government, but whose content, in the MDN view, is underlain by legal lacunae that must be clarified and conveyed in clearly understandable terms to the sectors interested in instituting a democratic, free and secret electoral process devoid of manipulations in Nicaragua.

Objective Analysis

The MDN affirmed through its most representative spokesmen that its analysis is objective from the political standpoint though not from the ideological one, because it fully respects the political ideologies of all the revolutionary movements and in this case that of the FSLN; but that the analysis itself is part of a study on the political consequences that could ensue from the subject document, which in part states that the FSLN will decide in 1984 who is eligible to be part of the government that is to be installed in 1985 but that such government will in any case have to be made up of members of the FSLN itself.

The MDN spokesman expressed the fear that an act of demagogy is under way, which would negate the process.

Election By Proclamation and People's Democracy

Within the MDN, there is close consensus among its leaders. There is a vast difference between election by proclamation and true democracy, they say in commenting on Sandinist democracy as it is defined in the FSLN document when it asserts: "These elections are those being imposed by you, by the working people, by the National Directorate of this Revolution. These are elections to improve the revolutionary government, but not to haggle over who holds the power here, because the power is held by the people through their vanguard and their own National Directorate, that of the FSLN." (LA PRENSA, p 12, col 7. "Sandinist Democracy," Monday, 25 August 1980).

The FSLN document, say the MDN leaders, also contains the following statements: "Moreover, you have won the right not only to elect your best men but also to remove them from office if they fail to perform their revolutionary duty as true vanguard militants of this process. This is a democracy to elect and to remove from office, to improve the Sandinist process."

This is viewed by some political leaders as the signaling of a self-perpetuating dictatorship with the right to appoint and to remove. These views, however, are only part of the political analysis to be drawn up by the National Council of the MDN and discussed with the others of the concurring Nicaraguan democratic parties, which are the PSD, the PSC, the MDN and the PCD, in the next few hours.

RELIGIOUS GROUPS EVALUATE PARTICIPATION IN LITERACY CAMPAIGN

Commander Nunez' Speech

Managua BARRICADA in Spanish 31 Aug 80 p 3

[Text] It will be some time before the world completely understands the scope and projection of the National Literacy Crusade in all their depth. We are certain that, a few years hence, many people will still be asking how, within a mere 13 months of the revolutionary victory, our people were able to perform successfully a second feat of the magnitude of the National Literacy Campaign.

However, we realize that the response to that question is implicit therein: This beautiful plan became a reality, because it was taken on by the entire people of Sandino, who fully understood what literacy means to their future.

Our youth, our laborers, our rural workers, our vanguard teachers and the organized women constituted irreducible bulwarks of that great army which penetrated the most remote corners of Nicaragua, carrying literature and a conscience founded upon parts of our own history, and observing, often in their most dreadful forms, the great want, the results of exploitation and the backwardness of centuries of domination.

A Battle for All the People

Just as they did during the war against the dictatorship, our people, through their various organizations, took on each one of the tasks established as a requirement for literacy with revolutionary responsibility and dedication. The holding of workshops, the taking of surveys, the conscienticization regarding the importance of the crusade among the most backward sectors, the liaison work, the transportation, the complicated maneuvers for supplies and logistic backup, the necessary coordination, supervision and technical training, the security and defense requirements and the teaching of reading and writing itself were tasks which united our people in a vast, unanimous effort, consolidating their transforming, revolutionary status, and strengthening their national, Sandinist identity.

A plan of this scope, even if one disregards its goals and considers only the number of persons involved, is a great challenge, and entails the investment of sizable material and technical resources. Our revolution has undertaken the National Literacy Crusade while still involved in the most difficult economic situation, with a productive infrastructure that is only beginning the process of recovery, and amid the dreadful conditions caused by dependence and backwardness, and exacerbated by the destructive rage which marked the dictatorship in its final death throes, and by the unbounded greed of the genocidal dictator and his followers at the time of their shameful flight.

Hence, the generous support and solidarity which several sectors of the international community have lent to our great crusade are of extreme importance. Every contribution, however small, meant the surmounting of another obstacle in the march, now virtually a victorious one, toward the eradication of illiteracy from Nicaragua. This Literacy Crusade, while constituting an act of historic justice for tens of thousands of underprivileged people, has also united several sectors of the international community in a joint effort which has proven beyond any doubt the real possibility of cooperation and solidarity among different peoples, entities, religious communities, governments, etc. We are certain that this is an experience which will have major, positive repercussions for all peoples staunchly committed to the pursuit of the highest levels of material, social, political and cultural progress.

CNA Strengthened National, Sandinist Identity

We have said that the National Literacy Crusade has consolidated the revolutionary status, and has strengthened the national, Sandinist identity of our people. This is one of the immediate, palpable effects of the National Literacy Campaign. The 5 months that have elapsed since the departure of our brigade members have proven to be a period of a vast constant assembly wherein, over the length and breadth of the country, there have been the most beneficial debates and exchanges in terms of the indestructible unity of Sandino's people, and an understanding of our historic-social situation and of the tasks that the revolution has established. In this respect, progress has been made in forming an overall view of our society and its individual features, which will necessarily result in guaranteeing the most objective and clearcut criteria, as opposed to the distorted, subjective and spurious arguments put forth by the enemies of the revolution.

The National Literacy Crusade is, right now, an indestructible example (and not the only one) of the profoundly democratic, popular and revolutionary nature of our process. It also constitutes an example of the strengthening of national unity which our vanguard has fostered and will continue to foster, for the benefit of the great majority of Nicaraguans.

The Educational Projection

Over the long term, the scope of the National Literacy Crusade will be considerable. Actually, with the integration of tens of thousands of urban and rural workers into the national educational process, the groundwork is being laid for the future advancement, in terms of quality and technical skills, of the human resources for production. The demands for modernization of our industry and agriculture could never be met if our producers and our workers had no opportunity for access to higher levels of technical training and qualifications. In this respect, the National Literacy Crusade represents the historic break in one of the obstacles that had been impeding the development of our productive forces.

Also, it is important to stress that the doors have been opened for access to higher levels of political consciousness, participation and choice. Our laborers, our farmers, the workers of our country who were kept in apathy and resignation toward their oppressive situation have, with literacy, made a more firm decision to traverse the path which will inevitably lead them to shape and become masters of their own destiny; the path opened up with sweat and blood by our heroes and martyrs, and indicated and opened, one centimeter after another, by our Sandinist National Liberation Front.

Many aspects of our activity for transformation within the framework of the Sandinist Popular Revolution will be determined by literacy.

From these past 5 months of hard work will stem the most decisive lessons and experience for devising a new concept of education, no longer in terms of an ideological determination, but also based on concrete practice.

In the great Literacy Crusade, the goals of education and the content of education in the new Nicaragua are reflected in a practical way, which will necessarily have to be systematized and adapted to the general features resulting from our own reality.

The New School

Elitist education has ended in our country; contemplative and socially idle education has ended in our country; because the storm of expectations produced by the National Literacy Campaign demands a response, and demands fulfillment, insofar as we are able to provide it. It will be necessary to link study with work and, why not, work with study. An agronomist who has never had muddy boots, and who has been trained with textbooks that perhaps reflect developed societies, with resources, is of little use to us. We need an agronomist who is aware of our limitations, who knows that he will sometimes have to invent, because our resources are limited, who is familiar with the work habits of our farmers, and who considers himself another worker, and not a foreman. And such an agronomist cannot be trained within the four walls of a university classroom alone.

We need teachers who are aware of the fact that many of our children and adults find it difficult to learn because they are undernourished, because they are suffering from diseases that have never been treated, and because they bear the responsibility for working along with their parents on the farm tasks, selling newspapers on the streets of our cities, etc. And such a teacher cannot be trained exclusively in classrooms either.

We need doctors with a political, or at least a social consciousness, who realize that, historically, only a very small rich minority has had access to good hospitals, treatment and medicine; doctors who are aware that their duty lies where they are most needed, and not just where they earn the most, or where the working conditions and facilities are better.

In short, we need technicians, professionals, skilled workers and administrators who are conscious of our reality, identified with our people, and willing to occupy their place in the process of transformations being spurred on by the revolution.

The motivations will also have to change. It is the responsibility of each one of us to become trained in the professions, trades or careers in which we shall be most useful to our people, to the fatherland and to the revolution.

We know that you who were brigade members formerly and who are now victorious forces, triumphant in attaining the goals of literacy, have had an experience which has made you better equipped to understand these things. Nevertheless, you have an obligation to convey that understanding to other sectors, and to be active, productive elements, and part of the process of change.

Each one of us is important, although not irreplaceable; each one of us has a task to perform in relation to the progress of the revolution in its various areas.

New Tasks for the Youth

Returning to education, it must be understood that there will be thousands upon thousands of youths and adults who will be enrolled in school, and that in our difficult economic situation, the volumes of free education entail vast outlays; and, therefore, that every resource must be preserved with particular care, but that, essentially, we must all contribute to the strengthening of our educational system, so as to enable it to really discharge in its entirety the function assigned to it by the revolutionary process.

This means commitments of various types for the youth, for students, and for teachers and professors.

We must work in an austere manner, something that is not related merely to wasting materials, but also to the squandering of technical and human resources. We must work in a responsible manner, which means performing tasks with maximum efficiency and commitment. We must take precautions, especially among the youth, against any signs of arrogance or unruliness. We are referring to the attitude that they will have to assume once they return to their classrooms.

We cannot afford to convert the experience that has been acquired in the crusade into a excluding factor with respect to those who did not participate. That would mean nullifying one of the most important aspects of the experience. It is our duty to pass on that experience, with humility and security, to those who did not have it, and to convey to them the new combative spirit of dedication to the revolutin which has come into existence during these months of close coexistence with the sectors of our people that have traditionally been most alienated and exploited. We must bring them increasingly close to the revolution and its tasks, instead of assuming attitudes of rejection.

We must ward off the conflicts that might occur between students and teachers, and make it clearly understood that those forces can join together to strengthen an educational system that will become transformed until it gives rise to the genuine education which our people require.

There will be differences (we cannot be unrealistic or misguided), because we know that our youth is like that: an army of young people who have gained great experience, but who could still become more mature.

We must also see to it that this esteem, this appreciation, this highlighting, this encouragement that we have given them, this love that we have felt in adopting measures to protect them from the action of the counterrevolutionaries, and this place that they have won in the hearts of the people will serve to intensify the tasks of the revolution and the pressure for education, and not for confrontations, or to put the youth (once he is in the educational process) in a position that is merely one of challenging the instructors, or to give him an attitude seeking to exclude those who did not go to teach reading and writing, instead of joining that group, or aimed at depriving the instructors who did not go to teach reading and writing of authority.

It is important that we be clearly aware of this possibility as one of the tasks following literacy.

The teachers, in turn, bear responsibility for constantly maintaining an attitude of self-improvement, which will make them increasingly deserving of the respect of the youth, their students, who will never again be the children who come to listen to the teacher's wisdom with fascination. Our youth is and will be developing an increasingly intensive spirit of criticism which, rather than being repressed, must be channeled in a positive direction.

Whether our national educational system meets the undeferrable goals that it has established depends largely on the integration of the teachers, students and educational authorities as a whole, on the basis of respect and shared interests on behalf of the people and the progress of the revolution.

The Role of Christians in Our Struggle

You have participated in the crusade as Christians, and many who were not in this category before have, in an honorable manner, won the right to be considered part of Sandino's people, and of the teachings of our heroes and martyrs. As we have reiterated on countless occasions, there is no contradiction involved therein; because the Sandinist movement has ceased to be a mystique, a theory, an essence and a combative legacy within an organization, and has been accepted by all our people as an expression of their own struggles, upon having fought under the banners of the FSLN [Sandinist National Liberation Front], the militant, anti-imperialist, historic-political heir of the father of the anti-imperialist popular revolution, Augusto Cesar Sandino.

From its beginnings, our revolution has been deeply attached to the faithful Christians of Nicaragua and the continent, as well as to other religious groups.

And it was men and women of this status, and groups and movements that, in the heat of battle, managed to be on the side of our people when they were waging the final battle for liberty; some on the battlefield, and others in the international struggle, demanding the solidarity of peoples and, all of them, Christians, denouncing the criminal genocide perpetrated by the regime which was the enemy of the people.

It was actual deeds which were the most convincing evidence that those recorded here were on the side of the people, and examples in our own land of the participation of Christians in the process of overthrowing the dictatorship and in the victory itself.

The funds which they obtained to make it possible to contribute to the building of clandestine clinics in anticipation of the final uprising were a fact; as were the efforts made (through hand-distributed propaganda) to enable our people to understand their own situation; the efforts to develop the capacity of the mass organizations; the efforts to denounce the crimes of the tyrant (with support from all the congregations, from every national and international Christian movement and from all organizations).

Formerly, they were on our side in a thousand ways; now they have become an active participant in the literacy. Brothers, you may be sure of one thing: The place that the people have given them is exactly in the middle of their hearts.

We are certain that you understand the literacy campaign as we understand it. And you are part of this people, and have assumed responsibility for your tasks as Nicaraguans and as Christians.

The Revolutionary Christians Are Part of the Sandinist People

On 23 August, many of the arguments put forth in an opportunist manner by some were dispelled. With joy, we saw a large number of religious women comrades marching along with ANDEN, and raising their fists in satisfaction at an obligation fulfilled, as a sign of their willingness to undertake new tasks on behalf of our people.

And we mention this because we consider it a good idea to point it out, not because we were surprised. Many of us, during the difficult days of the struggle, noted the backing and participation of Christian religious groups and sectors. We know about their dedication to the cause of the people, to the struggle for national sovereignty and independence, and to the struggle against backwardness, poverty and exploitation.

We say yes, we are not confused. We know where the Christians are, the true Christians for whom Christianity is not a habit, but a way of living and fulfilling oneself. Those Christians are you, comrades, who were formerly brigade members and who are revolutionaries forever. With those Christians we have not discussed alliances nor anything of the kind, simply because one cannot discuss alliances, because religion is a reality in our country and Latin America, and simply because Christians are an integral part of this revolution of the people of Sandino, the man who managed to embody the national dignity and the struggle of all the people at a certain time in our history, leaving us an eternal legacy of dignity, patriotism and struggle on behalf of the cause of the oppressed.

It is, as Ricardo Morales Aviles explained brilliantly, a fact that, "When we say revolutionaries, we are referring to the fighter who has probed into the heart of the people, their traditions and their history, and has assumed the burden of their sufferings, learning to act with ease in their environment, and willing to fight to the point of martyrdom for their cause: to fight and overturn the world, so as to put it into the people's hands."

These are the conditions that we must develop and intensify each day. The crusade has afforded you an opportuntiy, and you have not been frightened. You have known the sufferings of the people, you have acted in their environment, and you have been willing to pursue martyrdom, because you have not abandoned your stations when faced with the threat of the criminal, counter-revolutionary gangs.

It is incumbent on us to urge you to continue, and not to stop; to live fully each day your commitment to the people's cause; to strive to make it possible to fulfill the expectations created by literacy; to make the inequalities dispappear; and to enable every working citizen of this country to enjoy decent levels of health, housing, education, nutrition, culture and recreation.

For the heroes and martyrs of the struggle for liberation of the oppressed, and for the martyrs of the literacy campaign, let us strengthen the national, anti-imperialist unity, let us intensify the popular, democratic nature of the Sandinist revolution, and we shall be giving rise to a new education in Nicaragua, the very type which will lead the people toward becoming the leaders and masters of their own history.

Free fatherland or death!

Nuns Relate Experiences

Managua EL NUEVO DIARIO in Spanish 31 Aug 80 p 10

[Text] A deep reflection on the features of Christ in this revolutionary process was the theme that marked the third day of the Congress of the National Conference of Religious taking place at the Teresian College.

The reports were influenced by the beautiful experience that the Christians had in the wonderful literacy campaign, wherein they became thoroughly aware that now, more than ever, the option of the Church must be directed definitely toward the underprivileged classes.

Father Jose Ignacio Gonzalez Fauz collected all the views of the religious who were in the mountains, and made a remarkable summary of that living experience with the poor Christ.

Father Gonzalez Fauz depicted Christ as incarnate in the reality of the downtrodden, the underprivileged and the thousand-times exploited farmer from the mountains.

Christians were called upon to increase their efforts for the advancement of the whole person, and to restore the values of this class, which was incredibly neglected by the previous system.

At the important religious forum, one continued to hear statements of encouragement and support for the revolutionary process, which is seeking genuine changes in this country.

The nuns Maria Jesus Arcas and Marimer Zepeda, the latter a native of Mexico, in speaking to EL NUEVO DIARIO, declared that their experiences in the mountains had made them more inclined to direct the Church toward the oppressed.

They pointed out that the present active participation of religious in the major projects of the revolution should be manifested, as it was in the case of the great literacy crusade.

Sister Maria Jesus Arcas said: "Just before the great crusade, we religious had remained concentrated in the large cities, and hence one of the most significant aspects of this experience was that we turned to share a beautiful experience with our brothers the farmers."

The CONFER Congress continued, with extensive participation by over 300 religious from all over the country.

Marxist Opposition Encountered

Managua LA PRENSA in Spanish 31 Aug 80 p 12

[Text] The Nicaraguan Conference of Religious (CONFER) is holding a congress to assess the participation of religious in the National Literacy Campaign, at the Teresian College; and LA PRENSA assigned a reporter to interview the religious.

The Congress is entitled "The New Features of Christ in Literacy." They said: "We do not want this topic to be misinterpreted; we are referring to the Christ of the Gospel, who said, 'I have come that you may have life, and have it abundantly.'"

Marxist-Leninist Cadres

In response to a question regarding the difficulty that they encountered in giving witness to their Christian faith during the literacy campaign, they said that, at first, several dogmatic Marxist-Leninist "cadres" had posed obstacles but, upon realizing the Christian idiosyncracies of the farmers, they had to withdraw, according to Sister Martha D. Frech, who said that then they were able to hold religious ceremonies such as Holy Mass, and Holy Week, which was celebrated more devoutly than in previous years: in short, the liturgical ceremonies associated with the Catholic faith.

Uriel Molina Holds Meetings

Father Edwin Maradiaga reported that meetings between members of Evangelical sects and Catholic priests had been requested by the Evangelical pastors, in order to learn about the Catholic interpretation of the Bible, and Father Uriel Molina leads them every Wednesday.

They Reaffirm Councils

They reaffirmed Vatican II, Medellin and Puebla, and the preferential option on behalf of the poor. They recalled the pastoral letter from the bishops of Nicaragua on the occasion of the National Literacy Campaign, backing it and recognizing it as a project lending dignity to the spirit. In it, the bishops called upon parents, farmers and instructors of reading and writing to carry forward the task, with the Christian commitment to teaching and giving witness to Christian life by their actions, and with liberating education, to create the "new man."

PAPER VIEWS ARGENTINE-BRAZILIAN RAPPROCHEMENT

[Editorial: "Summit Meetings"]

[Text] When President Gen Joao Figueiredo of the Federal Republic of Brazil visited Argentina last May, we noted that there could have been no other reasons for that meeting than those publicly announced by the rulers of both countries. At that time, the underlying goal was the reconciliation of national viewpoints on the construction of the Upper Parana dams.

But now, aside from meeting the requirements of protocol formalities, the Argentine chief of state's presence in Brazil adds other factors of bilateral interest, especially as concerns nuclear energy and then others, of importance but less so. Based on statements that have been published in the Argentine national news media, an agreement on this matter "may lead the two countries to maintain an independent stand against the big powers." At this time, we are not going to made a value judgment on the details; rather, we will refrain from offering our opinion until some other time.

Prior to General Videla's statement, via Minister of Foreign Affairs Ramiro Saraiva Guerreiro and the Casa Rosada's ambassador to Brazil, Brazil and Argentina had signed agreements relating to various aspects of scientific and technological activities, documents among which is an agreement on atomic affairs.

While there has been an attempt to lessen the importance of the issue, at least they intend to consider aspects relating to the joint defense of the Atlantic which, according to the opinion of experts, has achieved geostrategic significance.

Elsewhere, Brazilian sources have commented on an exchange of notes of mutual concession in connection with the chance Argentina will have to engage in its gigantic and powerful neighbor's market as of 1983 through utilization of a gas pipeline which would bring large amounts of natural gas to the border town of Uruguayana. According to these sources, Argentina will propose the sale of 10 million cubic feet during 8 months of each year and 5 million during the remaining 4 months.

In any event, for this area of the Americas it would appear to be very important for the two geographically biggest and economically most highly developed nations to reach lasting agreements that will be beneficial for their neighbors — among which we figure — as well as for the hemisphere as a whole.

All this reminds us that in the not very distant past Argentine-Brazilian rivalry, which led smaller nations to adopt what was referred to as "pendulum politics," was manifest. Fifteen years ago, that struggle for power lost its impetus. With impressive indices, Brazil has demonstrated its notable economic and industrial growth and, as Henry Kissinger in his time said, has turned itself into "an emerging world power."

The policy of summit meetings among American and Latin-American rulers is a good one not only for those who play the leading roles in them, but also for other nations in the Americas.

That is why we stress the point at this time.

GOVERNMENT TO REVIEW INVESTMENT LAW

The minister of industry and trade, aviation technologist Mario Guzman Moreno, announced yesterday that the National Reconstruction Administration would revise the General Investment Law for the purpose of promoting the attraction of capital which the country requires for its development.

In an interview granted to PRESENCIA, the minister of industry said that the present investment law has accomplished its purpose but that in the course of time it has become outdated.

He said that the government wants to lay emphasis on industrial promotion and development, the attraction of capital for the creation of new industries and, consequently, the generation of new jobs which the people of the nation urgently need.

Minister Guzman Moreno and Undersecretary of Trade Eduardo Noda Pizarro anticipated that revision of the investment law would not only encourage foreign investments, but also provide incentives for Bolivian private activities. "The investment law must be turned into a suitable instrument for our country's policy of economic and social development and this is what the government has indicated to us so that it may be implemented as soon as possible," the minister said.

$500 Million in Investments

He spoke of the role the present investment law has played, pointing out that it has facilitated the activization of the country's economy, but that "what is now needed is a readjustment to the new situation the nation is going through."

As an example, he cited the fact that, from 1971 to date, the investment law has promoted investments amounting to over $500 million as a result of the registration of almost 400 new industrial projects.

He said that the production operations engaged in with the aid of this law have generated 1,600 new jobs in different parts of the country.

Agricultural and Industrial Development

Asked about which economic and production sectors would be favored by revision of the investment law, Minister Guzman explained that generally speaking all sectors would be encouraged, but that particular priority would be granted those projects involving agricultural and industrial development.

He noted that the country has to process its natural resources in greater amounts to channel them into exports and that it also needs a policy of selective replacement of imports.

YPFB SEEKS ADDITIONAL FUNDS TO IMPLEMENT NEW METHODS

La Paz PRESENCIA in Spanish 19 Aug 80 p 6

[Text] The mining of Bolivian hydrocarbons is getting more and more technically complicated and this involves the need for increasing investments and improving the technical resources of the Bolivian Government Oil Deposits (YPFB).

This opinion was voiced last week by administrators of this state enterprise during a tour they made of several districts to inaugurate a number of projects.

In a detailed report on YPFB prospects made to the president, Gen Luis Garcia Meza, experts from that enterprise said that, during the last 5-year period, there has been a notable change in the quality of the hydrocarbons that have been found, a situation which also raises the possibility that we may have to import oil to meet the needs of the domestic market.

The fact that, during the past few years, a tendency to find more and more oil condensate and gas rather than heavy crude oil has been observed which has forced them to incorporate major modifications into drilling systems in use and to introduce some alternatives in refining methods.

While between 1975 and 1979 gas reserves which were discovered rose by about 25 percent, oil reserves remained unchanged. This situation will not change unless prospecting is substantially increased.

But the quality of the liquid hydrocarbons has changed. During the period cited, the condensate (a very light oil) content rose from 47 to 70 percent; that is, the heavy crude oil content dropped from 53 to 30 percent.

Due to the situation, the YPFB decided to install gas plants adjacent to the producing wells. These plants separate the natural gas from the condensate and make possible better utilization of the products.

During the refining process, difficulties arise due to the fact that the amount of heavy fuels (diesel, kerosene and others) that can be extracted from the condensate grows smaller and smaller.

"While prospecting operations have been completed insofar as is possible for the YPFB, it is necessary and possible to step up our prospecting and, to do so, we require more support from the government," the YPFB experts said.

They reported that the results obtained are optimal, since they compare favorably with international averages. Of the 50 wells drilled during the past 10 years, 12 have produced positive results.

According to the national balance sheet, since oil operations have begun 227 wells have been drilled, 37 of which have produced positive results.

The YPFB informants said that it was impossible to drill any more wells because the rigs are worn out and because of the lack of financial resources. "We have only four old rigs and cannot continue to operate," they maintained.

As an example, they cited the case of El Espino where a rig is being used to drill a new producing well. This has caused a postponement of other prospecting plans.

Generally speaking, President Garcia Meza accepted the proposals made by the YPFB spokesment and announced that, as regards its energy policy, the government's immediate plans will be concentrated on the next series of negotiations for a rise in price of the natural gas that is sold to Argentina and on the resumption of discussions on exporting that product to Brazil.

He said that the YPFB "can and must be a real pillar of support for the national economy," in promising government support for plans for technical and financial restoration.

M-19 REJECTS PRESIDENT'S AMNESTY PROPOSALS

Bogota EL TIEMPO in Spanish 15 Aug 80 Sec A pp 1, 8

[Article by EL TIEMPO editor German Santamaria: "M-19 Will Not Accept Any Type of Amnesty"]

[Text] M-19 will not accept the amnesty bill introduced by President Turbay Ayala, not even if it were to be applied to those convicted or being tried for crimes of subversion, according to an announcement made by that movement to Representative Simon Bossa Lopez and four Bogota journalists who were kidnapped Wednesday night.

At the same time, Representative Simon Bossa Lopez revealed to the newsmen and members of the M-19 command that it was intended to make major reforms in the amnesty bill, so that it would also cover those tried and convicted of crimes of subversion. This information from the sponsor of the bill is in contrast to the proposition of the government, which offers amnesty only to subversives who have not been charged nor convicted.

"But if the Colombian Government really carries forward a social type reform, then we shall be in a position to revise our stand, and subject ourselves to amnesty," remarked a young man in military garb, his face covered with a kerchief in the colors of the M-19 movement's flag.

Both the radical position of M-19 and the explosive statement made by the congressman from the coast were the two most important disclosures during the abduction, captivity and press conference on the night before last, incidents in which the M-19 command known as Carlos Arturo Sandoval, the aforementioned congressman, the newsmen Jorge Rincon and Jaime Ortiz Alvear from the Caracol chain, Jorge Parga and the author of this article, both from the EL TIEMPO newspaper establishment, were protagonists.

About dawn yesterday, somewhere in Bogota, when pressured by the newsmen to define the type of transformation that they were proposing to the Colombian Government, another masked man also in military dress declared: "This is not a communist revolution, but merely changes that a government can make quite readily if it is really liberal."

The same M-19 member remarked: "We are not asking for the abolishment of private property, which is the essence of capitalism, but simply for a democratic government which will break off the dependence on imperialism and do away with the monopolies."

Surrounding Representative Bossa Lopez who, together with the representative from Tolima, Dario Ortiz Vidales, is the sponsor of the amnesty bill currently being discussed in Congress, those who appeared to be the heads of the Carlos Arturo Sandoval Valero command that carried out the operation for this massive kidnapping which they named 'Operation People's Rights', gave notice that, "M-19 did not get involved in this to be later given amnesty or legalized, among other reasons because we are already legal, since we have our families, our professions and our place in society."

When asked whether they had flatly rejected the government bill, one of the M-19 members, numbering seven in all, six men and one woman, said: "No, we consider it rather important. But what is fundamental is not amnesty for individuals or groups that have risen up in arms. What is important is that the amnesty bill serve to carry forward a national debate which will end with social amnesty."

When the newsmen pressed further for them to state the time and conditions under which M-19 would lay down its arms, the seven in uniform were unanimous in stating: "So long as the conditions which produce subversion exist, we shall continue to exist."

Expanding upon this remark, the masked man noted: "It would be of no use if we were to surrender the weapons tomorrow. The people would continue to demand social reforms."

Bossa Announces Reforms

About midnight, in that rectangular room, surrounded by a handful of armed men, one of whom never put down a hand grenade, what shocked the newsmen forced to attend this clandestine press conference was the announcements made by Simon Bossa Lopez, who was kidnapped at the doors of the National Congress at 1500 hours last Thursday by a man and woman who claimed to be journalists from CROMOS.

All of a sudden, speaking in a genial but tense manner, Bossa Lopez declared: "I think that the bill as it has been introduced is defective and, if it is passed, it would be completely unworkable; because it would not achieve the government's goals, which are those of peace and harmony in the country."

Continuing his dissertation, heard by the M-19 command and the kidnapped newsmen, Bossa Lopez said: "This is an incomplete bill, because it leaves out those who have been arrested or convicted of crimes of subversion."

"Dario Ortiz and I are working on a bill that would cover everyone, both those who have been tried and convicted and those who are fugitives," commented the congressman from the coast, who then put forth a proposition which, in that place and that time, and under those circumstances, coincided with the overall proposal of the Carlos Arturo Sandoval Valero command: "The country's ills are long-standing and, in order to change them, structural reforms are needed, both in the economic area and the social and cultural area."

While speaking, Bossa Lopez, wearing an impeccable black suit, with a white shirt and red tie, commented on the experience that both he and the four journalists being held there were having, by saying: "This is an historic occasion for a great national understanding because, since the time when Dario Ortiz Vidales and I accepted the responsibility for the amnesty bill, we have publicized our desire to listen in an open and unsuspicious manner to all persons having an interest in the bill."

Looking indiscriminately at the three men in military uniform surrounding that small table at the time, Simon Bossa Lopez declared: "I hail this opportunity that M-19 is offering us. I am a man who is receptive to all kinds of concerns. And I think that, for those who are fighting with weapons, prompted by altruistic motives, it would be very good to have a law that would enable them to become associated with the society as an overt, determined opposition."

The Document

The foregoing statements were made after the M-19 command gave the newsmen and the congressman from the coast a leaflet entitled "M-19 Proposal for a Time That Requires Dialog," at about 2300 hours.

On the table which Bossa Lopez and the leaders of the command were facing, there were 10 copies of this report, addressed to the same number of Bogota news media. It was a 35-page leaflet, printed offset, with a plastic cover on which the title was inscribed in gold lettering. Generally speaking, the leaflet, worded with correct grammatical construction but in which the journalist found three spelling errors, resembled a manager's report submitted to the board of directors of a business firm.

The proposals contained in the document given to Representative Simon Bossa Lopez and the journalists who had been abducted coincide with those contained in a notice published by the newspaper EL ESPECTADOR in the edition issued yesterday, the very day on which the involuntary attendees at the press conference held by M-19 were released.

In the first part of the document, it is stated that "The seizure of the Dominican Embassy was an incident of indisputable significance, complications and consequences, which are impossible to gage in their entirety even today, but which allow us to assert, without any presumptuousness, that they are bringing about many of the current political events."

In this regard, they cite the position assumed by Alvaro Gomez Hurtado, former President Pastrana and Belisario Betancur, stating: "The operation served to make the political atmosphere more bearable, to curb the excesses of the repression and to jolt the stubbornness of the reactionaries."

They express the view that the seizure evoked sympathy for the movement among the popular masses, and that the government used the solution to the seizure converting it into a government victory. The document states: "We admit that we were incapable of countering the government's false claim to victory entirely."

They add that the seizure made significant contributions to national political life, because the reactionary sectors agreed that the country "is falling into an abyss."

They note that other events of great importance to the country's political life were the national strike and the human rights forum; and they announce that they have the capacity to perform actions similar to the occupation of the embassy, but believe that this is a time for political rather than military action.

They are of the opinion that the solution at present is "a patriotic and democratic understanding, to seek the changes which will guarantee the people's prosperity."

They subsequently criticize the amnesty bill because, they claim, it is limited; and they say that, if it is to be genuine, three things are necessary: 1. the release of the political prisoners; 2. the return of the Army to the barracks; and, 3. a substantial change in the present structure of the country.

The document criticizes the traditional parties, and makes an appeal to Congress to reassume its legislative function, declaring: "The political decision-making centers are sliding toward the military barracks."

After stating there that, "This very day, we were going to meet, Dario Ortiz Vidales and I, to arrange for the first changes in the bill," Representative Simon Bossa Lopez remarked: "This is a serious, well conceived document, and a diagnosis of the country's real situation. It is also a message for the country and the Congress, advising them to reflect on the seriousness of the problem that we are experiencing."

To supplement the idea being expressed by the congressman at that time, one of the M-19 members commented: "Yes, but it is a problem that cannot be solved even by pardoning the individuals who are currently being held in the jails, just as prominent persons such as Belisario Betancur, General Matallana and the clergy have already admitted. They are all in agreement that if there is no large-scale amnesty for the Colombian people, the problem will not be solved."

Leafing through the report, the one who appeared to be the top-ranking commander of the operation there noted: "It is a fact that we would like to put ourselves to the test legally in the country. However, for the present, we cannot fall into the trap set by President Turbay, in trying to convert the problem of amnesty into the nation's main problem. That is not a fact, because it affects only those of us who are fighting, and not the Colombian people as a whole, who are the ones suffering from the problems and the exploitation."

After lending color to his political discourse with the statement that M-19 supports the 1986 World Cup event, and that "we are also expecting to gain it ourselves," the chief of the command which conducted the military operation stated: "To be specific, we make amnesty contingent upon the government's undertaking of reforms in the country. For example, things such as the failure of the agrarian reform proposed by Lleras Restrepo are what force us not to lay down our arms. We support any type of reform that will contribute to the people's prosperity; for example, something not very deep-seated, such as the agrarian reform promulgated by Lleras Restrepo, which we backed."

Later, again fingering the pages of the M-19 counterproposal to the government, wherein it suggests reforms that would supposedly improve the lives and status of the workers, farmers, students, employees, Indians, retirees, elderly and the Colombian people as a whole, the young man in military dress said: "We are not proposing anything here that cannot be accomplished. We are not interfering with private ownership of industry and the means of production."

He concluded by saying: "There is one thing on which we have a clearcut position, and it is that we shall fight to the death the big monopolies which are exploiting the country, as well as imperialism, which is also subjugating it."

The Proposals

Following is a summary of the M-19 proposals:

A. For workers and employees

1. Freedom to organize, independent of the control of the capitalists.

2. A real wage increase.

3. Better working conditions.

4. Equal rights and wages for women.

5. A ban on children working.

6. A subsidy for unemployment equal to 70 percent of the wage.

7. A reduction in the work day.

8. Freedom for labor unions to accept the unemployed as members: a. so that they may fight for employment; b. to put up opposition to the capitalists, because the latter use the unemployed to arbitrarily cut wages and prevent protests from employed workers.

9. Humane treatment and labor rights for emigrants.

B. For farmers and Indians

1. To carry out an agrarian reform which will eliminate the large estate system and distribute the land to farmers and Indians who have none, or very little.

2. All the loans which medium and small-sized farmers have obtained from the Agrarian Bank or any other banking entity will be revised, cancelling the interest and extending the terms threefold.

3. Medium and small-sized farmers who decide to combine their plots of land to form large expanses with collective production and ownership will be benefited by the government with loans for tools, fertilizer and input, in all instances payable within a period exceeding two harvests.

4. Credit, assistance, technical facilities, marketing, crop insurance and support prices.

5. Abolishment of compulsory military service.

6. The right of Indians to organize in accordance with their interests, and respect for their organizations and legal status.

C. For students

1. Compulsory schooling, paid for by the state.

2. Improvement of the academic standing.

3. Sufficient slots in the preschool, elementary and secondary school establishments, and in universities and specialized institutions.

4. Nationalization of education.

5. Bachelor's certificate and daytime university for everyone.

6. Multiplication of library service.

7. Establishment of a compulsory literacy service.

8. Timely supply of the funds necessary for the operation of colleges and universities.

D. For retirees and elderly

1. A pension that is increased in accordance with the cost of living.

2. Housing for the elderly.

3. Health and recreation service.

E. For all the Colombian people

1. Nationalization of the coal, uranium and petroleum industries, and of all natural resources.

2. Nationalization of the banks and insurance entities.

3. Nationalization of transportation, medicine and health services.

4. Total reorganization of social security and adoption of a national health system for the entire population.

5. Sovereignty over 200 miles of territorial waters and over the air space related to the national territory.

6. Maintenance of the territorial integrity.

7. No legalization of the cultivation, trafficking and consumption of drugs.

8. No permission for exports of foods which are in short supply in the country.

9. Control of the multinational companies with respect to the transfer of profits to the home offices and underbilling of input among branches of the companies, demanding compliance with the respective laws in effect in the country.

10. Reinvestment of the profits of the multinationals in the creation of sources of employment.

11. Nationalization of foreign trade. To run it, agencies will be formed, comprised of representatives from the government,and of small and medium-sized producers and merchants.

12.Creation of a national agency for price control, consisting of representatives from the labor, farmers' and Indians' organizations.

13. Production must be planned to meet, as a priority, the needs of the Colombian people in the areas of food, clothing, health, education and other priority goods. This means that the exporting strategy promoted by the monopolies must be abandoned.

Housing is a factor which is leading large sectors of workers and employees to bankruptcy, and making a small group of landlords rich. We propose:

1. A reduction in rents to a third of the average national wage.

2. A freeze on rents.

3. An end to evictions.

4. Penalties for urban developers of slums who absorb the last resources of the workers, unemployed and farmers.

F. For the police and the military forces

1. Expulsion of all foreign military advisers.

2. Suspension of all foreign "aid" in the military area.

3. The role of the national army is that of defending the national sovereignty against foreign aggression, guarding the borders and exercising surveillance over the 200-mile limit agreed upon internationally, protecting the country from the constant plundering to which its natural resources are being subjected.

4. The national army may not intervene in strikes or land seizures.

5. The army may not participate in international agreements aimed at the formation of supranational military forces.

6. Expulsion of the Summer Linguistic Institute and the so-called "Peace Camps".

7. The right of free association and labor union organization.

8. The execution of effective housing programs for all classes.

G. Political rights

1. The release of all political prisoners, through a law of pardon issued by the president of the republic using the powers conferred upon him for this purpose in the National Constitution.

2. The labor union and political organizations, regardless of their ideology, will have 1 hour a week available to them on the government and private radio and television channels to publicize their social and political creed on national and international matters. Any heads of newspapers, or radio and television networks, who refuse to make this service available, will be held in custody for a period of from 6 to 12 months. As commercial enterprises, they will receive payment for the service, but they will not refuse to provide it.

3. Full operation of the right to defense, and real compliance with the constitutional principles which stipulate that the citizens' innocence is to be presumed until proven otherwise.

4. Reaffirmation of and compliance with the constitutional principle which bans the military from judging civilians.

5. An amendment in Article 28 of the National Constitution, so that it may be applied only in case of a foreign war.

6. Immediate repeal of the Security Statute.

7. Immediate lifting of martial law.

H. The ethics of public administration

1. Government officials, whatever be their rank, who have close relations or have had them with the national or foreign monopolies, will be relieved of their positions.

2. Officials associated with the drug traffic will be relieved of their positions without detriment to the pertinent penalty.

3. Officials implicated in the buying of votes, or those who have made threats to pressure a voter, will be relieved of their positions, and given a prison sentence of from 5 to 10 years.

4. Officials or members of the army who have participated as torturers or who, with direct knowledge of torture, have concealed it, will be punished with a 20-year prison sentence.

5. Any persons guilty of the aforementioned crimes, or of other crimes already established as such, may not be members of Congress.

DIVISION DISCLOSED IN RANKS OF M-19 MOVEMENT

Bogota EL TIEMPO in Spanish 23 Aug 80 Sec A pp 1, 6

[Text] A deep split appeared in M-19 [19 April Movement] yesterday, when the high command of that subversive movement, headed by Jaime Bateman, Carlos Toledo Plata and Ivan Marino Ospina, disclaimed the document containing the proposal to the government delivered to congressman Simon Bossa Lopez on Wednesday night, 13 August.

The report, which confirmed rumors already circulating in this regard, became known yesterday afternoon, when a bulletin from M-19 reached the newspapers, stating that the document was "not a result of full discussion, nor does it make recommendations in the people's interests."

The paragraph, which disclaims the text of the document submitted to the government as a counterproposal for amnesty, states: "Recently, usurping the name of our organization, a government plan was delivered to the Liberal congressman, Simon Bossa Lopez. We repudiate this material, which is not a result of full discussion, nor does it make recommendations in the people's interests. We assume responsibility only for political proposals approved by our national leadership, and bearing the names and signatures of the high command."

The document in question was entitled "M-19 Proposal for a Time That Requires Dialog," and consisted of an entire government program of a reformist type, containing proposals ranging from nationalization of the banks to permanent jail sentences for drug trafficking."

When the disclaimer from the three top-ranking M-19 leaders was learned yesterday, evidence appeared of the existence of a severe confrontation between the subversive movement's high command, comprised of Bateman, Ospina and Toledo Plata, and the national basic coordinating entity, a section of M-19, which kidnapped Bossa Lopez and four journalists.

In this connection, yesterday authorized sources brought up the notion that Bateman, Ospina and Toledo Plata constitute the oldest and most "conservative" sector of M-19, and that they would be willing to accept the amnesty in order to start participating in elections.

On the other hand, the national basic coordinating group, which issued the document delivered to the congressman and newsmen, is said to consist of intermediate commands, the majority of who are young, with greater political radicalization, who reject amnesty because they consider armed struggle the only political alternative.

Ortiz, the Kidnap Victim...

Information confirming the deep split that has appeared in M-19 was learned yesterday as well.

In fact, it was found out that the kidnapping of Simon Bossa Lopez and the four journalists was a slap given by the M-19 intermediate commands to the members of the high command, because the latter had been considering kidnapping Dario Ortiz Vidales at that time.

Ortiz Vidales, the sponsor, with Bossa Lopez, of the amnesty bill, and unquestionably the congressman with the most information on the matter, was to be kidnapped at the order of the high command, so as to discuss with him a possible reconciliation with the government that would allow M-19 to seek legal status, and hence an association with political electoral activity.

When apprised of this, those in the most radical sector of M-19 hastened to abduct Bossa Lopez and the journalists, giving them a government proposal, while at the same time clearly and flatly rejecting amnesty, even if it were applied to those tried and convicted of political crimes.

According to the same sources, this left the high command stranded and, in a week, it dared to repudiate the position assumed by the national basic coordinating entity.

The Rejection

Actually, the document issued yesterday by the M-19 high command is an ambiguous one, wherein no clearcut position on the part of the movement regarding the government's proposal for amnesty is established.

After a pretentious study of the issue, they claim that they are ready to continue fighting "for an amnesty that will be a real one for the Colombian people." In this and other respects, they are in full agreement with those who issued the document a week earlier.

However, after the paragraph rejecting the document, the high command asserts: "In view of the perplexity and confusion that could be caused by actions such as the sending of the aforementioned document, which is untimely and disregards the political reality, M-19 reiterates and affirms its irrevocable decision to strive on behalf of the conquest of a fatherland for Colombians."

Thus, M-19, which appeared to be an ironclad organization, has begun its process of division and disintegration.

CHARGES OF BRIBERY SHAKE NATIONAL NAVY

Navy Demands Bribe-Takers' Names

Bogota EL TIEMPO in Spanish 13 Aug 80 Sec A pp 1, 6

[Text] The National Navy, through its commander, Adm Guidberto Barona Silva, has requested the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, using diplomatic channels, to ask the United States authorities to specify the charges and disclose the names of the individuals who have allegedly been accused of having received bribes from the Bethlehem Steel Corporation.

In a communique released yesterday, Admiral Barona Silva said that the Navy command had ordered an immediate review of the existing documentation in order to clarify the charges made against officials of having received money from a United States shipyard for the repair of the ARC "7 de Agosto".

The two former employees of the powerful Bethlehem Steel Corporation have been accused by the company of having shown false payments and kept the money. According to the Messrs Clifford Wise and Thomas La Monica, who have been charged with the illegality, between 1972 and 1975, the company paid bribes to Colombian and Venezuelan naval officers amounting to about $400,000. These payments were reportedly made through the Venezuelan firm, Autorama Nacional, and its president, Federico Reyes.

The ARC "7 de Agosto" sailed from Cartagena to Baltimore, where it was to be repaired, on 15 February 1973. At first, it was thought that the work would be finished within the space of a year, and the repairs would cost $2.5 million. However, it had to remain until April 1975, and the cost of the repairs amounted to an additional $7 million, owing to the fact that the pipe system had been completely destroyed.

By April 1978, the American press had published accounts of the fraud committed by the two Bethlehem employees on the company and their accusations against the Colombian Navy. An article in the MIAMI HERALD attributed to La Monica the disclosure that, in 1972, the sum of $80,715 had been paid to "representatives of the Colombian Navy."

Following this report, the then commander of the naval force, Adm Jose A. Diaz Osorio, contacted the company and requested it to reveal the names of the accused. However, he did not receive any response.

Yesterday, Barona officially requested that the foreign ministry, through the Colombian Embassy in Washington, obtain the documents pertaining to the case, so as to establish names and evidence of the alleged bribe.

Nevertheless, he said: "I think that all of this was concocted by the two gentlemen accused by Bethlehem. For example, I have heard that La Monica purchased an expensive yacht without income that could warrant such an expenditure, and this caused the company to become suspicious about fraud involving its own funds."

The Navy commander sent the following message to EL TIEMPO:

"Mr Editor: Relying on your kindness and the standards of the press, I respectfully request that you publish in your prestigious newspaper, and with the same prominence given in today's edition, the following report relating to possible bribery involving officers of the National Navy, under the title 'Colombian Navy Accused of Accepting Bribe'.

"1. The destroyers ARC '20 de Julio' and ARC '4 de Agosto' were repaired by the Bethlehem Steel Company, for the first time, between late 1964 and early 1965.

"2. The ARC '7 de Agosto' was repaired again by the same shipyard from 15 February 1973 until April 1975.

"3. Participating in the private bidding for these repairs, and with prior fulfillment of the legal requirements, were:

"a. Maryland Shipbuilding and Dry Dock Company, of Baltimore, Maryland, U.S.A.

"b. Bethlehem Steel Company, of Baltimore, Maryland, U.S.A.

"c. Blohm and Voss A.G.,of West Germany.

"d. Barclay Curle and Company, of Great Britain.

"4. The basic contract was signed on 6 December 1972, by the ministers of finance and public credit, and national defense, and a legal representative of the shipyard, in complete accordance with Executive Resolution No 0352, of 30 October 1972.

"In the same manner, the first additional contract of 7 June 1974 and the second national contract of 23 December 1974 were signed, in accordance with Executive Resolutions Nos 448 of 1973 and 408 of October 1974, respectively.

"6. On 14 April 1978, a newspaper in Baltimore, Maryland, published an article on the investigations being conducted by a federal grand jury in New York regarding payments made by Bethlehem Steel Company to representatives of the Colombian and Venezuelan Navies. The commander of the National Navy at the time, Adm Jose Alfonso Diaz Osorio, requested an expansion of this report, including the names of those possibly implicated; but, thus far, that information has not been obtained.

"7. In August 1974, a special committee was sent to inspect the status of the unit , and the state and progress of its repair. It was inferred from the report submitted by the aforementioned committee that the progress of these repairs was completely normal, except for some delays caused by technical aspects involving material.

"8.Following the article which appeared today in EL TIEMPO, this command has ordered a thorough review of the existing documentation, and has requested the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, in cfficial note No 04545COARC-259, dated 12 August 1980, to determine in a concrete fashion, through diplomatic channels, the charges and the names of the individuals who may be involved.

"Inasmuch as reports of this kind, backed only by foreign correspondents and lacking the documents attesting to the case, can seriously affect and harm both individuals and the naval institution, I respectfully request that they be handled with the care and circumspection that the prestige and tradition of the National Navy deserve.

"In conclusion, Mr Editor, I wish to confirm to you the fact that the commander of the National Navy is ready,and actively concerned with bringing the investigation that has begun to its final consequences.

"Sincerely, Gilberto Barona Silva, Commander of the National Navy."

Rear Admiral Accused

Bogota EL TIEMPO in Spanish 14 Aug 80 Sec C p 2

[Text] Yesterday, a dispatch issued by the AP agency from Washington announced that Rear Adm (ret) Teofilo Victoria Gonzalez received $42,000 for his assistance in the awarding of the contract for the repair of the destroyer ARC "7 de Agosto."

Victoria, who has resided in Miami for several years, told the American judge investigating the bribes paid by the Bethlehem Steel Company to Colombian and Venezuelan naval officers that he had received the commission when the repairs were started on the ship in 1973.

However, the Colombian Navy received the news with skepticism, because Victoria requested retirement in 1971, before the bidding had even begun for the destroyer with the Bethlehem Steel Company. Victoria retired on exactly 3 July 1971, 2 years before the ship's repairs began.

The international cable reporting the name of the implicated rear admiral reads as follows:

Washington, 13 (AP)--According to a legal deposition, Colombian Rear Adm (ret) Teofilo Victoria Gonzalez received $42,000 for his assistance in the awarding of a contract for the repair of the destroyer "7 de Agosto."

Federal prosecutor Jane Parver, who is filing the suit against Bethlehem, said that she would include the charge of payments to naval officers, in a legal filing that she will make at the end of the month.

The Bethlehem Steel Company which, last month, was declared guilty of paying $2 million in commissions to private shipowners, has denied extending such practices to naval officers.

The spokesman for Bethlehem, Marshall Post, said that the company had no comments to make; and Victoria, who has settled in Miami, said that he had nothing to add to what he had included in the statement.

In the latter, Victoria said that, in the latter part of 1971 or 1972, he had called a Bethlehem official to tell him that the Colombian Navy needed repair service, and that he could arrange matters with a committee.

After some discussion of the amount, the statement cites a Bethlehem manager with whom he conducted the transaction, Thomas M. La Monica, as having kept the other $3,000.

Victoria said that he started receiving payments once Bethlehem received the destroyer for the scheduled repairs; at least $11,000 was paid in checks, and other lesser amounts in cash.

On one occasion, he received a $1,000 bill at the Miami airport.

He remarked in the statement: "I remember that occasion particularly, because I had never before seen a $1,000 bill."

Retired

EL TIEMPO also found out that none of the Colombian naval officers who participated in the process of repairing the destroyer ARC "7 de Agosto" is currently in the Navy. They all retired voluntarily, and were described by Admiral Barona as "very well qualified officers."

EL TIEMPO learned that the four officers under whose orders the repair operations were carried out are retired from the Navy, but in all instances at their own wish, and without any problems. Admiral Barona said: "They are highly qualified and very good professional Navy men."

Admiral Parra Comments

As for Adm Jaime Parra, who was in command of the Navy at the time when the Bethlehem bid was selected, he told EL TIEMPO that, insofar as he could recall, the bidding process took place without obstacles or problems.

He remarked: "I do not believe that any officer allowed himself to be bribed, nor do I think that any one had much influence on the decision to select one shipyard or another."

He said that he had been shocked to learn about the charges of the Bethlehem employees in EL TIEMPO, adding: "If any improper action was committed, I did not know about it, and I doubt that such a thing happened."

U.S FOREIGN POLICY DEEMED SELFISH, SHORTSIGHTED

Bogota EL SIGLO in Spanish 27 Aug 80 p 5

[Editorial: "The Bad Situation on the Continent"]

[Text] Much of the structural problem of the United States policy on the Caribbean lies in the fact that the policy is based exclusively on matters of self-interest, and has no long-range views regarding the desired stability of the region. It is somewhat similar to what happened in the Middle East, where the only consideration relating to the political disorders which have nearly caused a conflagration in the region has been one seeking the protection of United States interests, disregarding any secondary effect that such a policy, with its limited scope, may have either on other nations or on world peace. In this respect, the United States lacks a harmonious foreign policy, based on sound moral convictions, which could acquire historic dimensions.

When it was first announced, the defense of human rights appeared to be precisely a good policy based on a universal ethic, and worthy of the advanced democratic institutions of the north, and of the natural leadership which that nation was destined to exercise over the destinies of the free world. However, it soon became evident that "human rights" were subject to a selective ethic, and that pressure could be exerted against weak governments whose countries did not represent a very great economic interest to the United States, but which would be conveniently ignored in favor of countries of greater relative importance. For example, the United States gave up any pressure for fulfillment of the Helsinki pacts, which protected human rights behind the Iron Curtain, because it was interested in securing a strategic arms limitation treaty with the Soviets. And, on the other hand, it intensified the debilitating rhetoric against small nations which could boast of a higher degree of freedom than any socialist country, but where the United States' commercial and political interests did not appear vital. In this atmosphere of lax tolerance in the U.S. State Department, it was not surprising that the Soviets felt sufficiently strong to break the balance of power in the world with the invasion of Afghanistan, which was to complement the American error of the induced fall of the monarchy in Iran.

In America, the effects of the United States' uncoordinated policy have perhaps been most serious with respect to regional balance. In Central America, a movement of interconnected collapses similar to the domino effect has begun; and, after Nicaragua, it is expected that the small nations of El Salvador, Guatemala, Honduras and possibly Panama will fall, and come under the orbit of socialist influence. It is difficult to determine whether Costa Rica, lacking in military forces and strong institutions, will be able to maintain its liberty; but it is also possible that the revolutionary tide may prove to be overwhelming and, easily hurdling the buffer of Darien, end up in Bogota. The international connections of our guerrilla groups have been clearly established, and it is hard to ignore the fact that M-19 [19 April Movement] recently held a press conference in Costa Rica, during an extensive tour of the Caribbean area.

In the southern part of the continent, there has been no less confusion in American policy. In less than 2 years, the continental solidarity has been alienated, forcing Brazil to seek new backing and friends in Europe, leading Argentina and Chile to greater pro-Soviet receptiveness that would be inexplicable on the basis of a mere analysis of their political systems, and even delivering Bolivia to the open arms of Moscow, which has offered the necessary credits with which to keep the new military junta in power, in the face of Washington's increased wrath, and its extremely serious and unfounded accusations. If we add to this some Soviet influence in Peru where, in addition to Russian tanks and weapons, there has been a special group of advisers, we must conclude that the outlook for the continent is gloomy, and that Latin America is by no means the peaceful, democratic island it is claimed to be, with the continent cut into three different and exclusive strips, which may personify the future conflicts: Central and South America, marked increasingly by an atmosphere of justified hostility toward the United States and, in the center, increasingly isolated, a small, unstable group of republics, including Colombia. The political status of the continent is not good. This is a matter for meditation by the Colombian ruling class and the professional politicians who, engulfed in problems of limited personal expediency, appear to have turned their backs on the essential problems involving the support of institutions, and who, like the U.S. State Department, also lack a long-range view.

TURBAY: NO CONCESSION TO SUBVERSION

Bogota EL TIEMPO in Spanish 16 Aug 80 Sec A p 1, Sec D p 10

[Article by Efrain Wilson]

[Text] Caparrapi, Cundinamarca, 15 Aug --In an obvious response to the subversive M-19 movement concerning the amnesty bill, President Julio Cesar Turbay declared here that, "Our desire for harmony and peace is unbounded, but we are not willing to concede a single centimeter to subversion."

The head of state said: "We shall battle against it as much as it wants us to battle, if it is not willing to reach an understanding with the government."

Turbay spoke before hundreds of farmers who gathered in the main square of Caparrapi, after having put into operation some development works projects in this municipality of Cundinamarca. The chief executive was accompanied by the public works minister, Enrique Vargas; the governor of Cundinamarca, Miguel Santamaria; former Governors Abelardo Forero and Alfonso Davila; and Congressmen Armando Rico Avendano and Efrain Paez.

Underscoring the importance of the projects being put into operation, Turbay Ayala disclosed that, after the studies that have been made, the section of the Bogota-Medellin freeway would pass through Puerto Salgar. Among other things, Turbay opened the departmental college, the rebuilt and equipped health center and the highway from Caparrapi to San Carlos.

In discussing the amnesty bill which the government has submitted to Congress for consideration, the chief executive stressed that the proposal was intended to show that the government, with a choice between the policies of forced repression and upholding the requirements for peace, "did not hesitate to facilitate national reconciliation with devices such as amnesty."

Without mentioning it by name, Turbay gave a response to the position adopted by the M-19 group during the kidnapping of congressman Simon Bossa Lopez (sponsor of the bill) and four journalists, to the effect that it would not accept any type of amnesty. He commented in this connection:

"But if there is a refusal to accept that amnesty, because the subversives think that they have the ability to overthrow the government, it is my duty as president of the republic to proceed with legality, to proceed with what the institutions with a democratic spirit represent, and not to consider myself given notice by that expression of rage, but, on the contrary, to keep faith in Colombia, preaching my creed of democratic truth, carrying out a policy with clearcut republican features and promoting progress."

He added: "We are not interested in engaging in disputes with the agents of subversion. We are, indeed, interested in making it possible for all Colombians to become incorporated into the movements of progress, and to feel proud of being children of this beautiful nation which is one of the best in all of America."

The Governor Speaks

The governor of Cundinamarca, Miguel Santamaria Davila, who accompanied the chief executive in Caparrapi, announced to thousands of farmers that the sectional administration will be investing over 50 million pesos this year in projects of vital importance, in the province of Rionegro.

The governor added that, in the first place, the Caparrapi-San Carlos-Tati highway would be built, with the cooperation of the communal action boards, and economic backing from the departmental government. Also, the highway connecting the municipalities of Zipaquira, Pacho, La Palma and Caparrapi will be rebuilt, so that the people in those areas may become integrated into national development and their products can enter the national markets at fair prices that will benefit the agricultural and livestock sector.

Speaking on behalf of his direct collaborators and the people of Cundinamarca, Santamaria Davila thanked President Julio Cesar Turbay Ayala for his visit to that remote town, where the people will consider this date an historic one, since it is the first time that a president of Colombia has visited it to put into service the municipal palace, the departmental college of Santa Gema and a health center to deal with emergency cases.

The approximate cost of the projects which the president and the governor opened in Caparrapi amounts to 15 million pesos.

Furthermore, the secretary of education for Cundinamarca, Jesus Hernando Lozano Diaz, and the secretary of finance, Hernan Diaz Villalba, offered their cooperation in providing the Caparrapi municipal band with all its instruments.

In La Palma

Following his visit to Caparrapi, President Julio Cesar Turbay went to La Palma, where he was given a warm reception.

In addition to emphasizing the importance of the projects that were being put into operation, the head of state again brought up the issue of subversion.

He claimed that he wanted the subversives to be understanding, and to accept the amnesty. On this topic, the chief executive said:

"I want to tell you that, obviously, nothing would please me more as a ruler than to be able to leave my fellow countrymen in an atmosphere of definitive peace; that I have devoted all my energy to that lofty effort; and that I want the subversives to be understanding, and willing to accept the amnesty, so that, before this term in office ends, we can lift the martial law, which is not being maintained at present out of a mere whim of my government, but rather because of the need to deter a subversion which, if it is not restrained, could subject our nation to a storm of fire and ashes.

"The government is not the only one responsible for maintaining public order. All of us Colombians have responsibilities, and I have recognition from the nation, from the great defenseless masses who, wherever I go, come out to offer me heartfelt support, without first considering whether or not they werebackers of my candidacy."

CHANGES IN SENIOR MILITARY POSTS ANNOUNCED

Changes in Army Assignments

Bogota EL TIEMPO in Spanish 15 Aug 80 Sec B p 6

[Text] Yesterday, sources associated with the Defense Ministry confirmed the appointment of Gen Fernando Landazabal Reyes as commander of the Army, and that of Maj Gen Jose Maria Rivas Forero to the post of second commander.

Moreover, it was learned that Maj Gen Gustavo Matamoros D'Costa will be promoted to the rank of three-star general this December.

Within the next few days, Matamoros D'Costa, currently second commander of the Army, will be named joint chief of staff of the latter branch.

Maj Gen Bernardo Lema Henao will continue to serve as inspector general of the Army.

The changes in the military commands are due to the forthcoming replacement of the commander-in-chief of the military forces, three-star Gen Jaime Sarmiento Sarmiento, who requested voluntary retirement from the Army by September.

As was announced a few days ago, Sarmiento Sarmiento will be replaced by the present Army commander, Gen Jose Gonzalo Forero Delgadillo.

It was also learned that there may possibly be a change in the command of the Military Institutes Brigade and in the Defense Ministry's public relations headquarters.

Other Assignments

Bogota EL TIEMPO in Spanish 26 Aug 80 Sec A p 3

[Text] Vice Adm Benjamin Alzate Reyes was appointed the new joint chief of staff of the military forces, replacing Gen Fernando Landazabal Reyes, who will assume the Army command post.

Alzate Reyes is serving as chief of naval operations for the National Navy, and was first commander of the ARC training vessel, "Gloria."

Furthermore, a source from the Foreign Affairs Ministry stated that Gen Jaime Sarmiento Sarmiento will be Colombia's new ambassador to the Honduran Government.

Also, Vice Adm Hector Calderon Salazar, the current inspector general of the military forces, will be transferred to the position of second commander of the National Navy, and chief of naval operations.

The changes in the high military commands are due to the voluntary retirement of Gen Jaime Sarmiento Sarmiento, commander in chief of the military forces, which will take place in early September.

However, military sources disclosed yesterday that consideration is being given to the possibility of postponing the announced changes until December, because of service requirements.

Jose Maria Rivas Forero, deputy Army commander

Gen Matamoros D'Costa, chief of the Joint Chiefs of Staff

Gen Fernando Landazabal Reyes, Army commander

Vice-Adm Benjamin Alzate Reyes, Chief of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, military forces

DRAFT REVISION OF MILITARY JUSTICE LAW SUBMITTED

Bogota EL ESPECTADOR in Spanish 13 Aug 80 Sec A p 12

[Text] A major bill aimed at removing the military penal justice system from subordination to the government and lending that branch of jurisdiction sufficient organizational independence to enable it to act freely, and to recover, in the eyes of the public, the impartiality required for the critical work that it performs, was submitted yesterday for the consideration of the Senate of the Republic by Senator Jaime Castro.

Foundling Justice

The bill in question is appearing a few days after the Superior Judiciary Council clearly established that "military judges, like civilian ones, are not affiliated with the jurisdictional branch of public administration, but rather with the executive branch, because they come under the Ministry of Defense;" a doctrine which left this justice system a virtual foundling without anyone to oversee its activity.

Mixup in Authority

In his explanation of causes, Senator Jaime Castro said that, since the military justice system is subordinate to the government because, according to the regulations governing it, either the latter or its agents appoint trial judges and those of the first instance (battalion and brigade commanders), and the military court appoints the individuals who must act as agents of the public ministry,and employees and subordinates of that specialized jurisdiction, "an unfeasible 'mixup' of authority has occurred, that is incompatible with the need for an upright, independent administration of justice, making it possible, from this angle, to talk about 'political,' 'executive' or 'administrative' justice."

Appointment of Officials

The sponsor added that the formulas which he has proposed, calling for the magistrates of the Military Superior Court to be appointed by the Supreme Court of Justice, and the trial judges by the Military Superior Court, from lists drawn up by the Superior Judiciary Council, "are the only ones suitable for achieving the 'organic independence' of the military justice system and, in general, that of the two authorities called upon to play a major role within the entire military judicial organization."

Senator Castro subsequently explained that, with the bill "there would be no change of any other kind in the origin of military penal jurisdiction. The judges of the first instance would continue to be the battalion, brigade and military branch commanders. The judge advocates (superior, principal or auxiliary), the official advisers of the first instance, and those responsible for preparing plans and advising courts martial will continue to be freely appointed to and removed from the government. The prosecutors and other agents of the public ministry, authorized to request the submission of evidence and to hasten the progress of trials, will still be named by the government; and the subordinate personnel in the jurisdiction will also be appointed by the latter or by its agents. In other words, except for the changes cited previously, the military penal justice system will continue to operate according to the terms established in the code that is in force (Legislative Decree 250 of 1958, converted into permanent legislation by Law 141, of 1961)."

Confusing Situation

In discussing the method for appointing judges, the author of the bill said: "There does not exist in the current legislation a regulation which expressly cites the one responsible for appointing the military penal trial judges.

"The interpretation given to Articles 324 and 361 of the Military Penal Justice Code, accompanied on a previous occasion by a concept from the State Council, has allowed the government to make use of that authority. However, in the opinion of some, the situation is not completely clear. From this standpoint, the bill would fill a gap which, since it relates to matters of great importance, cannot continue for an indefinite length of time."

Dr Castro also noted in his explanation of causes that the bill retains, without any change, the work procedures and methods of the military justice system, particularly the courts martial and verbal courts martial. Nor does it alter the system of penalties and punishment stipulated in the current provisions, whether they be ordinary or extraordinary; and, in addition, it retains the definitions of behavior described as criminal, from treason to the nation to the absence of sentries, and the rules governing competence or the distribution of business or matters among the various authorities responsible for making decisions.

The Bill

The text of the bill is as follows: "Bill to change certain provisions of the Military Penal Code." The Congress of Colombia

Decrees:

Article 1. The Military Superior Court will be comprised of the number of magistrates stipulated by law and by the Commander in Chief of the Armed Forces, who will be its president.

Article 2. The magistrates of the Military Superior Court will be elected by the Supreme Court of Justice to 4-year terms, from lists prepared by the Superior Judiciary Council.

Article 3. To be a magistrate of the Military Superior Court, one must be Colombian by birth, an active citizen, a certified attorney, and be over 30 years of age, enjoy a good reputation and meet at least one of the following requirements:

1. Have held, on a regular basis, for a period of no less than 4 years, a position as magistrate of a district or administrative court, superior or circuit judge, prosecutor of a court or a superior court, or superior or principal judge advocate;

2. Be an officer of the Armed Forces, with a lawyer's degree received at least 4 years before the election, and have held positions within the military organization for a period of no less than 2 years; and,

3. Have practiced the legal profession for at least 5 years with good credentials, or have taught law for the same period of time at a university recognized by the state.

Article 4. The law will indicate the number of prosecutors in the Military Superior Court. The prosecutors will be required to have the qualifications and qualities required to be magistrates of the Military Superior Court, and will be appointed by the national government to 4-year terms.

Article 5.There will be whatever number of military penal trial courts the national government decides upon. The military penal trial judges will be appointed by the Military Superior Court to 2-year terms, from lists prepared by the Superior Judiciary Council.

Article 6. To be a military penal trial judge, one must be Colombian by birth, an active citizen and a certified attorney. Officers of the Armed Forces who have a lawyer's degree may be appointed as such.

Article 7. The term of military penal trial judges will start to be reckoned as of 1 January 1981.

Article 8. (Temporary) Any vacancies which occur in the Military Superior Court and in the military penal trial courts after this law goes into effect will be filled, in order, by the Supreme Court of Justice and the Military Superior Court, at all times from lists prepared by the Superior Judiciary Council. Such appointments will be made, as necessary, for the remainder of the current term, or for the beginning of the terms specified in the previous article.

Article 9. This law will go into effect as of the date of its promulgation, and repeals any provisions that may run counter to it.

Submitted for the consideration of the honorable Senate of the Republic by the undersigned, Senator Jaime Castro.

SOVIET WRITER EXTOLS CUBA'S CEMA MEMBERSHIP

Moscow EKONOMICHESKAYA GAZETA in Russian No 30, 1980 p 20

[Article by N. Vlasov, research assistant of the All-Union Scientific Research Policy Institute of the USSR Ministry of Foreign Trade: "Cuba in Fraternal Cooperation"]

> [Text] The assault on the Moncado Barracks, which was carried out on 26 July 1953 by a group of young patriots headed by Fidel Castro, laid the foundation of the Cuban Revolution, which in 1959 led to the creation of the first socialist state in the Western Hemisphere. The Cuban people are celebrating the 27th Anniversary of the day of the national uprising by new labor achievements, by working unselfishly on carrying out the task of creating the material and technical base of socialism, as set forth in 1975 by the First Congress of the Communist Party of Cuba. In implementing this splendid task, the republic's workers are relying more and more extensively on the fraternal member-countries of CEMA, which the Republic of Cuba joined in 1972.

Cuba's entry into CEMA created new and favorable possibilities for developing the national economy and a more active participation for the country in utilizing the advantages of the international socialist division of labor. Along with the other countries of the community, Cuba plays an important role in implementing the comprehensive program of socialist economic integration and providing specific forms to its long-term, targeted programs of cooperation in the most important spheres of material production.

The Republic of Cuba's role is particularly great in implementing the DTsPS (long-term targeted programs of cooperation) in the sphere of agriculture and the food industry, as well as in the fields of energy, fuel, and raw materials. This is determined by the possibilities and the tasks assigned in Cuba of further developing such important sectors of the economy as cane-sugar production, citrus-fruit cultivation, and the nickel industry; during the 1970's the output of these sectors accounted for more than 90 percent of the value of the national exports. During recent years the countries of the socialist community have purchased about 70 percent of the sugar, more than 95 percent of the citrus fruit, and a considerable portion of the nickel-containing output supplied by Cuba to the foreign market. The Soviet Union and the other fraternal countries import Cuban sugar and nickel at specially set incentive prices which exceed the average world level, and this creates favorable conditions for the functioning of the basic export sectors and for the development of Cuba's entire economy.

The Leading Sector

Notable successes were achieved during the 1970's by workers in the main sector of the Cuban economy--cane-sugar production. If during the fiscal year 1970--1971 sugar output amounted to 5.9 million tons, during fiscal 1975--1976 it had already increased to 6.2 million, and during the harvesting campaign of 1978--1979 it reached almost 8 million tons.

Such a growth was assured thanks to the fact that there was a substantial strengthening of the sugar industry's raw-material base--cane cultivation, which during the 1970's provided about 40 percent of the agricultural output. The areas of the cane plantations were increased. Thanks to the introduction of more productive species of sugarcane, improvement in the agrotechnical methods of cultivation, and an increase in the areas being irrigated, the average crop yield per hectare of cane in the years 1977--1979 exceeded 53 tons, whereas during the 1960's it amounted to about 40 tons.

The mechanization of cane cultivation is being carried out successfully. The machinery and tractor pool which has been created in this sector at the present time allows them to almost completely mechanize the preparation of the plantations for sowing, as well as the loading and transportation of sugarcane to the mills. If during fiscal 1970--1971 combines harvested only one percent of the cane areas, in 1978--1979 the figure was 44 percent. Mechanization of cane cutting has freed up considerable labor resources.

This country has set up its own output of cane-harvesting combines. In particular, during 1977 in the city of Olgin the country's first plant for assembling such combines was opened. It was built with the economic, scientific, and technical assistance of the USSR. This plant was designed to assemble 600 machines per year. Its assembly units and parts were supplied by the USSR. Being put into production at the same time is the assembly on the spot of the second generation of combines (KTP-II); their important advantage is the capability of harvesting cane without preliminary firing.

The production capacities of the sugar industry have noticeably grown and been modernized. Considerable aid in its development has been rendered by the USSR. At the present time 25 enterprises of the sugar industry are being modernized with Soviet cooperation.

The CEMA countries not only supply Cuba with a considerable portion of equipment for the sugar industry but also render assistance in planning and design activities and the development in this country of production facilities which assure cane-sugar production with the most diverse equipment. Thus, during the second half of the 1970's there began in Cuba the construction of four new sugar mills in the provinces of Pinar del Rio, Camagüey, Granma, and Cienfuegos, which were planned by Cuban specialists in conjunction with their colleagues from the fraternal countries. The first of these mills was recently put into active operation.

With the cooperation of the fraternal countries Cuban industry has acquired the capacity to produce quite a wide assortment of items for the sugar mills, including milling units for crushing the cane and equipment for the points where the raw material undergoes preliminary processing. At the present time a plant for producing boilers for the sugar industry is under construction in the city of Sagua la Grande with aid from the Soviet Union.

In the sphere of agriculture and the food industry the DTsPS provides that Cuba, with the participation of interested CEMA countries, along with expanding the areas under sugar cane and an increase in the lands to be irrigated, will continue to work on modernizing the sugar industry's enterprises and will create new capacities therein. At the same time work will be continued on building transport means and port facilities.

On the Basis of Specialization

Citrus-fruit cultivation has become an important trend in Cuba's specialization in the international socialist division of labor. During the years of the people's regime in the country a considerable amount of work has been accomplished in laying out citrus plantations, the area of which over the past 20 years has increased almost 10-fold and has reached 130,000 hectares. Entry into the period of fruit bearing by the large-scale fruit plantations which were created during the first half of the 1970's has now enabled the procurement of citrus fruits to be substantially increased. If in 1970 some 172,000 tons of them were harvested, in 1979 this figure rose to 330,000 tons.

Large-scale, specialized citrus-growing farms have been created in this country. At one of these, for example, the "Victoria de Jiron" in Matanzas Province, citrus-fruit production has increased from 32,400 tons in 1976 to 58,400 tons in 1979. And in 1980 the workers on this farm plan to harvest 138,000 tons of citrus fruits.

In accordance with the DTsPS in the sphere of agriculture and the food industry in Cuba, with the participation of other interested CEMA countries, work will be continued on expanding the areas under citrus crops, and the plantation areas with artificial irrigation will be increased. Further development will be attained by a network of enterprises engaged in the preliminary commercial processing of fruits, construction work will begin on new combines to carry out the industrial processing of citrus fruits, as well as refrigeration capacities and enterprises to produce packing materials. It is supposed that by 1990 Cuba will be able to supply the countries of the socialist community with 2.4 million tons of citrus fruits.

In the sphere of energy, fuel, and raw materials the DTsPS is opening up great possibilities for the further utilization of the sugar industry's by-products as well as for increasing the production of nickel-containing output in Cuba.

Such a by-product of the sugar industry as bogaso may serve as raw material for producing wood-fiber panels, pulp, paper, feed yeasts, and a whole series of other products. In 1979 alone a wood-fiber-panel factory in Havana Province and seven enterprises engaged in turning out feed yeasts were already put into operation. In accordance with the DTsPS plans are already being made to create in Cuba with the participation of interested CEMA countries capacities for producing bleached pulp, paper, and cardboard from bogaso.

Repair and modernization operations continue to be carried out in the nickel plants in the cities of Nicaro and Moa. In 1979 at the Pinares de Mayari Mine near the city of Nicaro the slope was modernized in accordance with a plan which was worked out by Soviet specialists. With the technical assistance of the USSR a new nickel plant is being built at Punta Gorda; it has been designed for an annual production of 30,000 tons of nickel concentrates. Another enterprise with the same capacity is under construction by the joint efforts of the CEMA countries in Las Camarocas.

In order to guarantee the successful implementation of the DTsPS measures, Cuba is developing an active scientific and technical cooperation with the CEMA in the appropriate spheres. In particular, an ever-increasing importance for Cuban plant cultivation is being accorded to working out measures to protect sugarcane and other agicultural crops from diseases and pests. There is an increasing need to utilize progressive technology to raise the yield of pure metal from nickel and cobalt ores.

In June 1980, during the period when the 34th CEMA Conference was in session, a General Agreement was signed on the cooperation of the CEMA member-countries in implementing the plan to speed up the development of the Republic of Cuba's science and technology. This plan will assure the significant progress of Cuban science in the next few years, particularly in the field of introducing the results of Soviet research into production, their adoption for environmental protection and other practical purposes.

These days the workers of the Republic of Cuba are actively discussing the just-published draft of the Principal Trends of the Country's Socioeconomic Development for the Years 1981--1985, based on the program positions of the Communist Party of Cuba. They indicate that at the present time the immediate task of the Cuban people is to further build socialism on the scientific basis of Marxism-Leninism, right up to achieving the first phase of a communist society. The draft of the Principal Trends provides for the further deepening of the process of Cuba's economic integration with the socialist countries and, primarily, with the Soviet Union. This document notes the necessity for continuing the process of socialist industrialization for the purpose of overcoming the heavy heritage of economic backwardness which was handed down from the pro-American Batista dictatorship and to create the material and technical base of socialism.

PROBLEMS FACED BY FISHERMEN ON EXTENDED SEA DUTY STUDIED

Havana MAR Y PESCA in Spanish Jul 80 pp 32-35

[Interview with Mario Garcia and Armando Romero by Pedro Morales: "Six Months Aboard the 'Rio Mayari': The Problems of the Man on Sea Duty"; date and place not given]

[Text] Recently, the Psychology Department of the Fishing Industry Ministry's Staff Administration instituted a sociopsychological research project aboard the "Rio Mayari," one of the Cuban fishing fleet's supertrawlers. Considering this to be of great interest, we interviewed Mario Garcia and Armando Romero, the authors of the study, who willingly offered to discuss various aspects of the purpose of the project, the methods employed and, above all, the partial results obtained:

MAR Y PESCA (MyP): Naturally, first of all we ought to discuss the objectives of the project you completed. Thus, in a manner of speaking, we would also be explaining what it was all about...

M. Garcia: We had to study the sociopsychological aspects of life during sea duty. That is, how the behavior of crews of our sea-going boats — since our project was concerned with the problems of men who spend long periods of time on board — might be affected, specifically due to the fact that they spend long periods of time at sea, periods of up to 6 months, which is most frequently the case with the fleets that fish in distant waters.

A. Romero: Of course, this research project did not come into being for no reason at all. Our Psychology Department had previously completed several projects having to do with behavioral changes in seamen induced by their working conditions. We had formed a few opinions on the matter. We were "almost" convinced that the men's reactions, their emotional stability, could not be the same at the beginning of their tour of duty as after the passage of several months or when it was over. On the basis of these concerns, we started working on a research project in coordination with the high-seas fleets, the one we recently completed.

MyP: Which fleet did you choose to conduct the project with?

M. Garcia: The Cuban Fishing Fleet.

A. Romero: We got on board the "Rio Mayari" in July 1979 and remained on it for 187 days until February 1980. That was the time this trawler's sea tour lasted.

MyP: Were you in other boats?

A. Romero: No. The study was realized with one fishing crew, a typical model, so to speak...

MyP: How many crew members were on board?

A. Romero: Eighty-four men.

MyP: And did you participate in the work on board or were you there only as researchers?

M. Garcia: Of course, we participated in the activities on board like any other crew member, and not only in the fishing chores, but also in union, recreational, etc. activities. Let me explain to you that it is important for us that, perhaps mainly for these reasons, the crew of the boat welcomed us aboard like two more crew members. We naturally knew how to make ourselves part of the group, without isolating ourselves, taking part in any kind of conversation with them, etc. On the other hand, our activity in the processing room or on the bridge helped us to learn about the actual work of the fishermen, to listen to them, to be able to observe them better...

MyP: Could you fill us in on the characteristics of the crew?

M. Garcia: Of course. It was a young crew and this is a common characteristic of our sea-going fleets. Moreover, it was a crew which, in spite of this, had a lot of sailing experience. There were, so to speak, no "greenhorns" aboard.

A. Romero: I repeat that it was a crew that is very typical of our sea-going boats. Furthermore, the boat was not chosen by us or anyone else. We had to conduct the study in "some" boat without making a prior selection that might have affected the results.

MyP: Are there precedents in Cuba for this kind of research?

M. Garcia: Before the revolution, impossible. There were not even sea-going fleets! A few years ago some studies were made of very short fishing runs, what is more in fishing areas far from our coasts. But we are sure that studies like this one have not been made before.

A. Romero: Naturally, we did not start from scratch either. On the one hand, this study is the result of the progress we have made in our department. We would say that our goal is a more advanced one based on the results of previous partial studies. On the other hand, we had a bibliography of more or less similar projects carried out by the Soviets. Of course, they were completed in terms of their needs, of the problems they were confronted with, which in some respects apply to ours and in others do not. There has also been a minimum of exchange of experiences with other countries...

MyP: As we see it, now is the time for us to turn to the problems involved in the study itself. Don't you think so?

A. Romero: It is up to you to ask us about them...

MyP: Let's say, you started with a hypothesis...

M. Garcia: Of course. We began with the assumption that, depending on the amount of time spent at sea, a whole series of effects, psychological as well as physiological, well be produced in the semman, the fisherman. In general, this hypothesis proposes that: first, the time at present spent on sea duty produces psychological changes in the men; second, the ideal time for a fisherman to spend on sea duty should be less than at present; and lastly, the time currently stipulated for sea duty affects the psychological climate, which is of most importance for the collective, for the crew as a whole.

MyP: And to test this hypothesis a research procedure was programmed. Isn't that so?

M. Garcia: We specified five basic domains to be studied, which are: 1. A study on changes relating to affectivity, behavior and memory. 2. Distortions originating in the memory and perception processes, specifically as regards perception of the time spent at sea. 3. A study of the relative ordering of needs and human motivation. 4. A confirmation of the phenomena of fatigue and monotony on the job and how these affect the men. 5. A study of the predominant psychological climate in the working collectivity. To do all this, we drafted various questionnaires and surveys and made use of natural observation and interviews. We also used a method worked out by Dr Diego Gonzalez, our professor at the university during our student days, one which leads to very reliable results in working on motivational research.

A. Romero: We would like to repeat that other psychologists from our department have also helped us. And we could say that the drafting of surveys, etc. was more a collective effort, a job engaged in by everyone...

M. Garcia: For the investigation of the first domain, that is, dealing with the changes produced in terms of affectivity, behavior, attention and memory, we chiefly proposed — and succeeded in carrying it out — to perform a monthly psychiatric examination of each of the crew members. We made tests for memory, time perception, etc. As for domain four of our study, which deals with fatigue and monotony on the job, our efforts were fundamentally directed toward processing room operations inasmuch as working on deck, where the fish is handled, or in the engine room always offers greater variety. Furthermore, the brigades that work on the processing of the catch account for the greater part of the crew...

A. Romero: The methodology for the study of these problems is really complex, but we were able to develop it effectively. It requires, for example, a very detailed study of the operation that is being performed, measurements of time and the blood pressure of workers taken when they start and finish work, natural observation, etc.

M. Garcia: Romero, it would be very appropriate at this point to explain, or at least record the fact that in this and other activities we relied on the very active collaboration of the male nurse and ship's physician, who contributed in large measure toward seeing to it that our work progressed with greater competence. As far as the study on worker collectives is concerned, that is, the deck, engine or processing collective, our fundamental objective was to study how the members of each of these collectives interrelated with one another and with the heads of each of them. Moreover — and this is important — we were interested in finding out whether the time spent at sea to any extent affected the psychological climate that ought to exist in on-the-job relations. To accomplish this, we employed various tested sociometric techniques.

MyP: Wasn't a study made of relations among collectives?

M. Garcia: Yes, of course.

MyP: Could we already begin to talk about the results obtained?

A. Romero: In rough outline, we have succeeded in establishing various criteria which could be considered to be results of the work completed. We would, for example, say that some of the hypotheses we had proposed have been confirmed. To a certain extent this has been taken into account in the fleets and, to mitigate the ill effects, various activities involving better employment of the fishermen's free time are being engaged in aboard our boats. We would add that the boats are equipped with television and video-cassette systems and chess, domino, etc. tournaments are scheduled. They are also provided with libraries and reading rooms. Mail is delivered to them by freezer and transport boats... Through our study we have been able, for example, to confirm the fact that these resources are not utilized as effectively as they could be. Take, for example, video recordings. Each boat has a number of these and one would assume that variety is obtained by exchanging these recordings among the boats. Well, in most cases the same video cassettes are found in the other boats or the interchange is limited, or our best television programs are not chosen... So in the end, when a tour of duty is over, we are already fed up with having seen the same programs dozens and dozens of times.

M. Garcia: I would like to emphasize one important point in the course of this interview. And that is the fact that this is a research project which has begun but is not over, that we still have quite a lot of work to do on it and that the final results, so to speak, are still a long way off.

A. Romero: Actually, as Garcia says, we do not yet have complete results; that is, there are many aspects of the situation that are still being studied, since this situation represents a very complex process. Independently of this, we might also point out that, with the passage of time at sea, the crew exhibited changes in the various processes studied.

M. Garcia: For us — and this is the result of secondary studies which we proposed — it is evident that some aspects of the care afforded the fishermen must be improved on. And this not only aboard the boats during sea duty but also afterwards, when the seamen return to land. They told us, for example, about the difficulties they ran into once again in Cuba after 6 months of sea duty. They had to submit to the same rules of the game as the rest of the population, to, say, spend a week in a house on the beach, or to put up at a hotel for 3 or 4 days with their wives. Homesickness for one's children, and it is not rare at all for a fisherman to become a father while at sea; it is fairly frequent. Many of them asked us, to take but one case, why they did not record video tapes with pictures of their families, with the voices of their children, their mothers or wives, to be sent to the fishing grounds, making use of the same channels used for mail. Using video-tape systems, this could be done.

A. Romero: We would like to fill you in on one point. The crew with which we sailed is really a sample of our sea-going crews. Men who are for the most part young, very good workers and politically aware. Really vigorous men of the sea... In our study of the collectives, we were able to check on the high degree of cohesion of our fishermen. Toward the end of the tour, for example, there were some disagreements, a few minor arguments, but in general they were like they are in any working group, of no importance. As we see it, this is the product of the characteristics that make up our crews. They are magnificent men, always ready to work, to study, to make sacrifices.

MyP: What other things should be improved on board the boats to make the long tour more pleasant?

M. Garcia: I think — and you are returning to an earlier topic — that some of the indoor games used to spend their free time could be improved on, expanded. Some of these games are not only entertaining but also test the mental agility of those who play them. To a certain extent they help to train their reflexes, etc. On the boat we sailed in, for example, there was only checkers. The libraries could be improved on and systems for renewing books more frequently could be set up on board ship... Remember, fishermen read a lot... Why not have them receive new books while at sea? This would generate interest in reading them...

MyP: And the overall results of the study?

M. Garcia: That is a longer-term process. We do not want to come up with a facile answer and it seems to us that the question is a very important one, so important that the answer should be very meticulously worked out. What we do want you to say in your report of this interview is that we are very grateful to the crew of the "Rio Mayari," really extraordinary men and representative of our young generation of fishermen, for all the kindnesses they extended to us on board during those 6 long months of sea duty.

COOPERATION AGREEMENT WITH BURUNDI--In Bujumbura the governments of the Republic of Cuba and the Republic of Burundi recently signed a general protocol for economic, scientific and technical cooperation. Participating at the document signing ceremony were Ramiro Rodriguez Gomez, Cuban ambassador to that country, and Lt Col Edouard Nzambimana, minister of foreign relations and cooperation. This protocol permits the cooperation between the two countries to be increased in various areas. At present a group of doctors and nurses are providing their services to the people of that fraternal African country. The protocol signing ceremony was held in an atmosphere of friendship and frank understanding of the need to strengthen the ties of cooperation in order to promote economic and social development. FDR LEADER ON 'FINAL STAGE' OF STRUGGLE

[Answer] We believe that we are in the final stage of the struggle. Soon we are going to begin an important phase, particularly in the military respect. Politically, the junta is totally isolated. In the diplomatic arena, we have been able to defeat U.S. policy with its ever-present interventionism. At this moment, we believe that the military aspect of the struggle is very important. For this we need the political-military unified revolutionary directorate which has a single war plan which is currently being promoted. We are about to seize power. The objective of the struggle is to seize power and to establish a revolutionary democratic government in El Salvador.

[Question] Please tell us something about the unity of the revolutionary forces and of the importance of this unity in defeating the Christian Democratic military regime in El Salvador?

[Answer] We have learned a great lesson from the Nicaraguan revolutionary process. The main leaders of the groups struggling in El Salvador have realized that without the unity of the revolutionary forces under a broad front such as the Revolutionary Democratic Front with the Salvadoran democratic forces, it is going to be difficult to obtain a victory. For us, unity is a process which must be developed day by day because it is a complex and difficult process. Occasionally, there are problems among the revolutionaries just as there are sometimes problems between brothers, but these are matters to be solved in a revolutionary fashion and in no way do they obstruct the process of unity which is essential for the people's victory.

[Answer] The United States has been working in various ways. In first place, with military aid, with U.S. military advisers, more arms, which we have denounced [words indistinct] an indirect intervention through the Venezuelan Government and it is also establishing a sanitary cordon through Guatemala and Honduras. In this respect, it is worthwhile mentioning that the most recent U.S. plan is to make Honduras into what Nicaragua used to be under Somoza; that is, a counterrevolutionary beachhead against El Salvador and also against Nicragua. This was recently confirmed when the formation of peace army--as they were going to call it--collapsed. We also do not reject the possibility of a U.S. intervention. Of course, if they make that mistake they will extend our struggle to other regions, they will Vietnamize the struggle. We believe that the cost of creating another center of tension is too great for the United States. It would be a big mistake and we would be ready to face and reject that aggression.

[Question] Elias Barahona Y Barahona, a member of the Poor Peoples Army of Guatemala, who for 4 years was infiltrated in the high ranks of Romeo Lucas Garcia's regime, recently charged that the Guatemalan armed forces are ready to serve as an instrument of a U.S. intervention in El Salvador. How do Salvadoran revolutionaries see this?

[Answer] We know that two bases have been established in Guatemala in which the army is receiving training for an eventual aggression into El Salvador. We also know that the Guatemalan Government is providing the personnel for the paramilitary groups in El Salvador. In our opinion, what this companero has charged is true. However, we feel that the Guatemalan revolutionary movement has increased its activity. The Guatemalan people are participating and the Guatemalan Government is facing serious internal problems.

[Answer] Definitely yes, we realize that we are a few steps from victory which are being taken calmly but in an accelerated manner. Our position is firm. When you have the people's support you have victory.

JUNTA MEMBER'S SON COMMENTS ON FPL, DUNN CASE

PA141859 San Jose Radio Noticias Del Continente in Spanish 1400 GMT 14 Sep 80

[Report on station interview with Carlos Ernesto Morales Carbonell, son of Salvadoran Government Junta member Jose Antonio Morales Ehrlich, "Somewhere in El Salvador"--date not given]

[Excerpts] At the beginning of the interview with Radio Noticias Del Continente, Carlos Ernesto Morales Carbonell, 20, a high school graduate who had been in his first year as a sociology student, explains to our listeners his reasons for joining the Farabundo Marti Peoples Liberation Forces [FPL]. Let us listen to his statement.

[Begin Morales Carbonell recording] The reason for this is the very historical process underway in our country. As the class struggle developed in our country, as the struggle waged by our people became polarized [as heard], it became clearer which organizations were truly fighting for our peoples' interests and which ones were struggling for the interests of the oligarchic sectors, that is, for imperialism.

In this framework, I saw the FPL as a more specific, more real, more objective alternative to make the liberation of our people more viable. The FPL represented a very clear, very definite and very objective alternative. At the same time, this organization, which had an unblemished political and military background, which was a very serious organization, had managed to develop, to elevate the degree of organization and combativeness of the masses and every day it struck harsher blows at the enemy, placing itself in the vanguard of the people.

These were more or less the motives which led me to join the FPL. [End recording]

Continuing with our exclusive interview conducted by Radio Noticias Del Continente somewhere in El Salvador, Carlos Ernesto Carbonell now comments on the development of popular forces in his country.

[Begin recording] There has been a considerable growth of the mass and political-military organizations. The growth has been quite accelerated, both qualitatively and quantitatively. The organizations which form part of the Unified Revolutionary Directorate [DRU] have developed since the 3-day strike in August and have staged a very intensive action in which they have already inflicted thousands of casualties on the enemy, with a minimum number of casualties among our beloved comrades.

Just this past week, our forces have inflicted close to 1,500 casualties on the enemy. In other words, one can see that the units are quite strong, and it is a strength which is growing, which increases every day, in contrast to the attrition being suffered by the enemy. Those thousands of soldiers being lost by the enemy cannot be replaced because the enemy no longer has any possibility of recruiting more troops, since our people are not willing to join the Reactionary Army, the army of the Military-Christian Democratic Junta.

In other words, our actions have continued to develop. At present, we have more than 100,000 militiamen who are participating in our peoples' self-defense effort, within the factories, within housing areas, in schools, while thousands of other comrades are forming our peoples' regular forces.

At the technical level, the FPL has developed considerably and in the past month, several helicopters have been downed. This week a helicopter was downed in Soyapango and two personnel carriers were destroyed. In addition, other personal carriers were destroyed previously. The main weapons of repression which were available to the enemy are being destroyed by our armed forces. [End recording]

Carlos Ernesto Morales Carbonell commented, over Radio Noticias Del Continente, on the military offensive that is presently being launched against the Salvadoran Government by the revolutionary organizations that are components of the DRU. The FPL member now comments on the process of unification of the political-military organizations and mass organizations.

[Begin recording] The process of unification of the various political-military forces of our people and of the various mass organizations is being strengthened daily. Giant strides are already being taken to carry out joint, coordinated activities, which will make the blows we strike harder. In time, this unity will make us a single, demolishing fist that will wipe out the power of the enemy. In other words, there are good possibilities for the unification of the popular forces in our country. [End recording]

In its first manifesto, the DRU said that the struggle it is leading will result in the establishment of a democratic revolutionary government.

During the interview held somewhere in El Salvador, Radio Noticias Del Continente asked Carlos Morales Carbonell what role the Revolutionary Democratic Front [FDR] should play in this process. This was his reply.

[Begin recording] The FDR has a great role to play as the leader of the great masses of our people. It has to guide the participation of the great majorities of our people in the decisive battles. It has to lead the political battle and facilitate the incorporation of our people, extending its arms to reach out to the many thousands of our people who are anxious to join in the struggle to definitely throw off the exploitative duo [presumably the military and the Christian Democratic Party]. [End recording]

Subsequently, Carlos Morales Carbonell referred to the participation of U.S. military personnel in the repression of the Salvadoran people in an attempt to halt the revolutionary advance.

[Begin recording] The direct intervention of the United States has been confirmed by that very country. At this time, there are nine U.S. navy ships, with several thousand marines and dozens of combat planes, anchored off the Pacific coast. As Companero Marcel has said, this is a warlike gesture toward our people.

Moreover, the Military-Christian Democratic Junta obtained a loan of 5.7 million [presumably dollars] from the United States, on the pretext that the money was for communications. This money has been used to purchase from the same United States some 12 combat helicopters, 20 transport and control helicopters, 20 rocket-launching airplanes and several transport vehicles. Only some 8 percent was used for communications. [End recording]

Another country which is accused of interfering in the internal situation in El Salvador is Venezuela. In this regard, Morales Carbonell said:

[Begin recording] There is data available on Venezuelan interference in our country. There are lists of the names of individuals sent by Venezuela into the country, who are training the repressive forces. They are military advisers and individuals who are expert in torture, but I do not have the names with me at this time. But it is clear that Venezuela is contributing advice on counterrevolutionary warfare as well as weapons and vehicles and airplanes and so forth. [End recording]

On Wednesday, 28 November 1978, Archibald Gardner Dunn, the South African ambassador to El Salvador, was captured by the FPL. The organization demanded, as ransom, the publication of two documents in the main newspapers of the capitalist world. The first document analyzed the situation in El Salvador and the proposal of the FPL for ending injustice and exploitation in the country. The second document denounced the development and strengthening of the economic, military and political links between the United States, Israel and South Africa and the military dictatorships in Latin America, particularly those of Argentina, Chile, Uruguay, Paraguay, El Salvador and Guatemala. It also denounced the establishment of the South Atlantic Treaty Organization.

For the past several months, nothing has been known regarding the status of Archibald Gardner Dunn. In his interview with Radio Noticias Del Continente, Carlos Morales Carbonell, a member of the FPL, confirmed that the former South African ambassador to his country is alive and that the ransom demands for his release have not been met.

[Begin recording] Archibald Gardner Dunn is currently in the peoples' jail. He was captured to demonstrate the solidarity of the Salvadoran people with the people of South Africa, who are being subjected at this time to one of the worst tyrannies, as well as to publicize the struggle being waged by our people in El Salvador.

The requests which were made--in addition to some monetary demands--of Dunn's family have not been met at any time. The family offered alternatives, but our organization has not accepted these other proposals, these alternatives. It maintains the demands which it made initially. That is why he is still in the peoples' jail. [End recording]

MERS MEMBERS REVEAL PLANS--Two members of the Movement of Revolutionary High School Students [MERS] have revealed to the police the terrorist activities that are being planned in the next few days, particularly on the 16th when armed attacks will be carried out "somewhere in the republic." The informers are Rolando Dimas Trigueros, 20, and Jose Omar Zelaya Ochoa, 19. One of them said that the MERS militants have been given automatic and regular weapons to stage terrorist acts, that is, burning buses, erecting barricades, distributing subversive propaganda and so forth. Concerning future activities by MERS militants, the leadership has urged them to become involved in the operation known as "Volcano-Sector Three-Militias." Dimas Trigueros explained: The word volcano means outside San Salvador, sector three means a place in a certain department and militias is "an organization of the People's Liberation Forces which will probably handle the operation. The 16th of September has been set as the date to conduct the operation which may result in the violent takeover of a section or in an attack on a military garrison or detachment." NEW IMMIGRATION MEASURES ESTABLISHED--All foreigners who enter the country by plane will have to deposit a 500 colones ($200) bond. If they come by land or ship they must deposit a 250 colones ($100) bond. The object is to demonstrate that their visit is not to seek employment. The decision was announced yesterday by the director general of immigration, Col Israel Agil Benavides, during a news conference in which he reported on new measures and progress being made to cut immigration redtape. The official said that other countries have strict regulations regarding foreigners and that El Salvador does this to protect its national heritage and to insure that the foreigners will not come here to take jobs away from Salvadorans. Immigration officials must properly verify that those who arrive in the country have the aforementioned funds, not necessarily in cash but possible in credit cards or that they are visiting relatives who will be responsible for them. CHURCH POSITION EXPLAINED--In view of the fact that newspapers, radio stations and other media are reporting that the Catholic Church is identifying itself with the actions and attitudes of persons who are participating in our social and political life, the episcopal conference must explain: A. When a bishop, a priest or nun makes a statement, it does not represent the thought or feeling of the Catholic Church; it represents his own personal view. B. When the Catholic Church wishes to make a statement, it will do it through the episcopal conference formed of all the bishops of El Salvador and represented by its chairman, Msgr Jose Eduardo Alvarez. BOLIVIAN REJECTION OF ANDEAN STAND PRAISED

[Editorial]

[Text] The categorical rejection by Bolivia's military government of what it considers aggression by the countries of the Andean Pact does not leave room for doubts regarding what relations with that nation will be in the immediate future. If the Andean group is to count on Bolivia's assistance, Bolivia's inalienable right to settle its own political problems or those of any other type in the domestic realm must be respected without the intrusion of foreign hands.

It is impossible to imagine that the members of the Andean bloc did not expect a reaction of this type from their associate. But perhaps they trusted in their power, already brought into play successfully on another occasion. In this instance they made a mistake. Inside the Andean Pact or outside it, with the approval or disapproval of its presidents, Bolivia will not change the route it has laid out for itself. The Andean posture undermines the principles which promote the formation of a spirit of American solidarity so necessary for integration.

Integration, as defined here, does not signify giving in or giving up one's self-determination. If the entire inter-American legal arrangement is based on the sovereign equality of states and on the principle of nonintervention in the internal affairs of others, this does not have to be a dead letter. Instead, this should be complied with strictly, both in word and especially in deed, since in the last analysis words can be used to conceal a sham.

Let us recall that while the most blatant case of foreign intervention was being perpetrated in Nicaragua all the actors were reiterating their respect for the inviolability of domestic jurisdiction. The only way to explain this is that they said they would not tolerate any intrusion in their jursidictions just in case it occurred to anyone else to imitate them. In other words, what was legitimate for the victim of the moment would not be so if the tables were turned. It is one thing to do something to others and another for others to do something to you.

What is important, however, are deeds, not words. And as far as can be seen the repeated interventionist efforts on the American continent have begun to arouse an inexplicably lethargic awareness; to provide an idea of what it is like to find oneself under the yoke of entities alien to one's own and integral reality; and to highlight the need to reject energetically the outrages of meddling whatever its guise.

The most handy pretext is now that of human rights. Claiming the need to protect them, in the judgment and by the standards of self-designated arbiters not subject to appeal, some try to dictate standards to sovereign governments as if the capacity to play such a delicate role lay in the exclusive power of a few nations which claim to be without blemish. This is an absurd premise because in the final analysis there is no country where misleading situations do not or cannot occur--situations which might be interpreted as undermining human rights--considering that in a world subjected to constant social and political turbulence any minority, social segment, or simple group of agitators is in a position to suggest ill treatment.

The racial riots in the United States--to mention one case--could be used to call for an international investigation to protect the rights of the blacks. The behavior of the government in subduing the riots could be interpreted as repression or brutality which would oblige the American community to intervene in defense of the blacks. Another example might be what happens all the time in the Colombian-Venezuelan border area where the rights of thousands of Colombian citizens are violated by the Venezuelan authorities not for one but rather for numerous reasons.

Whatever underlies the racial motives of the illegal immigration or the unlawful traffic that were mentioned, the respective governments can explain things in their own way and justify what they do. If they are mentioned it is only to illustrate how dangerous it is to the sovereignty of nations for people from outside to become involved for moral reasons in situations foreign to them. No one is in a position to cast the first stone.

However, it is getting to be a habit for people to cast stones at the houses of others as redeemers even though they have reason to blush in their own courtyard. To counteract this anti-interventionist zeal must grow once more and all such attempts should be rejected as Bolivia is now doing. Or voices and warnings must frequently be heard such as those of the chief of Uruguay's armed forces, General Queirolo, who has interpreted the thoughts and feelings of the armies of the Southern Cone and possibly of the majority of the military institutions of Latin America, including those of the Andean bloc.

FOREIGN POWERS SEEN INTERFERING IN BOLIVIA

[Commentary: "Bolivia, New Target of Interventionist Maneuvers"]

[Text] Various indications of American international activity in connection with the latest change of political regime in Bolivia provide clear evidence that interventionist endeavors are being promoted vis-a-vis that South American country by the same sponsors and under the same systems applied in connection with Nicaragua and which have dared to persist with respect to other countries of the area.

The original event involving the dismissal of Lydia Gueiler from the [interim] presidency of Bolivia was and continues to be an absolutely domestic matter. It is well known that the distinguished lady assumed her position through the decision and influence of the Bolivian armed forces even though its constitutional nature was assured by her appointment by a national assembly. But everything occurred within the framework of a de facto political process presided over by the armed forces themselves, an institution that had previously endorsed the elections. It is no one else's but the Bolivians' business to pass judgment on and assess these moves or those relative to the ultimate decision motivating the present change by which a government presided over by Gen Luis Garcia Meza is in power. One should not underestimate the fact that that country has been one of those most--if not the one most--subjected to political turbulence. And the evaluation of the present events should also be made within that context.

Once again, sharing the lead in the interventionist maneuvers against Bolivia is the U.S. Department of State, one of whose moves has been to put pressure on the other governments of the American continent to repudiate that of Bolivia and not to establish relations with it. And it is for this purpose that Mr Bowdler, that interventionist agent all too well known to Central Americans, was assigned to go to Argentina. Last-minute reports indicate that his attempt was frustrated thanks to the fact that the Argentine Government moved ahead and recognized the Bolivian regime.

The intervention in Bolivia seems to follow a broad plan, judging from the attitude of Ramirez Mercado, a member of the Nicaraguan junta, who--in the role of "Don Roque"--is acting as spokesman, proposing that at a forthcoming meeting of foreign ministers a collective break with Bolivia should be approved.

In the face of such maneuvers the Latin American countries must show once and for all the respect which the principle of nonintervention deserves from them. This is undoubtedly a very tarnished principle but one which should not be allowed to fall by the wayside as desired by the imperialist renaissance which we are witnessing. Even less should we allow it to be tarnished within organs which are supposed to support it and enforce it, as is the case of the OAS.

The point is that Bolivia has its problems and that it is the only country which should solve them according to its own political conditions. It is worth noting in this connection the conduct of the foreign minister of the constitutional Peruvian Government, who rejected any hint of sidelining the Bolivian regime from the Andean Pact, and the position announced clearly by the Uruguayan Government defending nonintervention. Paraguay has followed suit and Brazil is slated to do likewise given that it has never been an instrument of the U.S. Department of State.

NEW AIR FORCE OFFICERS, NCO'S PROMOTED

Guatemala City PRENSA LIBRE in Spanish 26 Jul 80 p 15

[Text] Twenty new pilots received their respective certificates and wings at a ceremony yesterday morning at the facilities of the military air academy in the presence of Gen Fernando Romeo Lucas Garcia, president of Guatemala, senior officers of the Guatemalan army, representatives of the diplomatic corps, and military attaches from said missions accredited to the government.

Air Force Col Adolfo Florentin Corzo Anleu, director of that military school, noted that the graduation of 20 new pilots constitutes a milestone in the history of Guatemala's air force.

"To the cadet officers, who have now become knights of the air, I say that the triumph which they are achieving today is the consequence of the sacrifice and stubborn determination evidenced at all times during their training, and I exhort them to continue to excel so that they may serve Guatemala better," he said.

The commissioned officers who make up the "Air Force Col Oscar Humberto Morales Duvall" graduating class are the following: Lt Silvio Humberto Tablas Crispin and Second Lieutenants Roy Estuardo Dedett Castro, Julio Cesar Lopez Montenegro, Herber Dagoberto Cleves Palma, Julio Saul Gonzales, Fernando Roderico Gordillo Giron, Servio Leonel Alvarez Barrera, Salvador Salguero y Salguero, Julio Ruben Ruiz Godoy, Juan Ramon Lam Pacheco, Jorge Manuel Salazar Lopez, Juan Carlos Quintanilla Pereda, Sergio Fernando Cifuentes Ramos, Walter Wilhem Boecemann, Antonio Alfonso Illescas Fernandez, Guido Santisteban Maldonado, Luis Francisco Perez Contreras, Augusto Reyes Mendez and Luis Daniel Lanuza Munoz.

Pilot Second Lieutenants Roy Estuardo Dedett Castro and Julio Saul Gonzalez received diplomas of recognition as students outstanding in English and academic subjects.

Likewise, maintenance specialist sergeants Catalino Cermeno, Luis Garcia Barrios, Carlos Gomez Gonzalez and Eduardo Rosales were granted diplomas of recognition.

On concluding the diploma-granting and insignia-awarding ceremonies, all the participating units marched in an honor parade and subsequently a reception was offered for the new pilots and guests.

Air Force pilot Col Oscar Morales Lopez of the General Staff--the father of the pilot whose name was given to the graduating class--gave a short and emotional speech expressing gratitude. He gave a biographical sketch of his son and added that he felt greatly gratified with the air force and with the graduating airmen for designating the graduating class by the name of his son.

Finally, those in attendance had the opportunity to witness the acrobatic maneuvers undertaken by the Quetzal Squadron of the Guatemalan Air Force in twin-engined Cessna A-37B combat aircraft.

FSLN TRIUMPH HAILED AS LATIN AMERICAN VICTORY

Managua BARRICADA in Spanish 23 Jul 80 p 3

[Article by the Central American Historical Institute: "Nicaragua, a Showcase for Latin America"]

[Text] The triumph of the Sandinist People's Revolution has made an impact on the balance of Latin American forces. It has destabilized a balance which formerly was maintained static by imperialism.

For imperialism, Nicaragua has always been an essential piece in the puzzle. It first attracted attention when the opportunity arose to build a canal through its territory between the two oceans. Then we were watched because of our geopolitical position. And now?

Since 19 July 1979, Nicaragua has been a sort of showcase for Latin America. And this is already so true that there are those who would like to cloud it over.

In the dependent world of the underdeveloped countries, the technology market is more important than the hegemony of the raw materials market, so much so that certain raw materials markets can even be abandoned by imperialism, whereas it will never do this with the technology market. The multinationals and the empire are very jealous of the latter and will allow no exceptions.

But, we repeat, since 19 July 1979, Nicaragua has been like a showcase for Latin America, for all the underdeveloped countries of the world. With our victory we have broken the chains of dependence at the structural level, and little by little we shall do so effectively in the various aspects of life. And with the same impetus and independence afforded by victory we are going to use other--perhaps several other--technologies, which may be cheaper and will certainly be granted on more humane terms. Henceforth Nicaragua will be an open window on the continent from which our brothers in all the countries thereof will receive inspiration, models, encouragement and also new forms of technology for development.

And great results can come from all this:

First: The acceleration of the liberation of so many of our brothers. For that, as our commanders have said many times, the best service Nicaragua can render them is to show them a victorious revolution on its own soil.

Second: A certain assistance in implementing the industrial growth our continent needs so badly. When capitalist technology finds it is in competition with other technologies, it will doubtless lower its prices if it wants to keep its markets. For example, it is interesting to note that until recently Nicaragua had no dollars for industrial development, but now, in view of the danger that technology from Eastern bloc countries might enter the area, the multinationals are offering to aid in its industrialization. Why? Simply because they feel that a market which used to be exclusively theirs may be invaded.

Third: And all this will doubtless have political repercussions. When an empire is going to lose a market, and much more so it if is a technology market, it always tries to recover it by any and all means, good or bad, and capitalist history is rich with examples in which it has, without any scruples, resorted to weapons and invasions to do so.

Therefore, it is obvious that Nicaragua must guarantee its own defense. It is not easy to be a showcase for Latin America in this way without having someone want to break it or cover it up. Imperialism has developed an entire campaign in foreign countries for that purpose--to discredit our revolution. For that reason it supports within the country those who want to confuse those of our brothers who have little political awareness.

The 19 July festival was to answer all this, to support Nicaragua, victorious showcase of freedom for all Latin America and for the entire oppressed world. We wanted to show everyone that not only have we won the battle for freedom, but that this gave us the right to choose our own way, including the use of new technologies. And so that there would be room for all of us, we built the plaza. Thus it was quite visible to all that the people of Nicaragua massively supported their revolution.

MILITARY, 'ANTIDEMOCRATIC' COUP IN BOLIVIA SCORED

[Editorial: "The Bolivian Coup: A Crime Against History"]

[Text] The clear victory of Hernan Siles Suazo, leader of the humble and dispossessed classes of Bolivia and tireless democratic fighter in a country bristling with militarism, opened a great hope for America.

He had announced an integrated government with pluralist participation. In his career involving presecutions, imprisonments and exile it was the crowning touch. The warrior who had fought against dictators and oligarchies had finally succeeded in putting into a democratic port in an exemplary civil struggle. For Hispanic American democracy it was also a trial by fire, with hopeful results: it seemed as if the so often frustrated aspirations of a people to achieve self-government by civilian means were finally successful, and that the election, which was very fair, would finally open the door to a new and civilized stage of coexistence through a coalition of forces in government led by Siles Suazo. For Bolivia also, for that mysterious landlocked country which bears the name of the Liberator, it seemed to mean the resurrection of its libertarian traditions; a final end--at long last--to power by means of guns, to the armed oppression of a hungry people in need of peace; of a working people who have been struggling for years and years for their most elementary demands; a hardworking people; miners; an unredeemed Indian people; a noble, ancient people--descendants of one of the highest civilizations of America--but eternally poor.

And all this seemed to be dawning by the democratic path. A new sun--civilian, rewarding, renewing--seemed to announce itself in the symbolic interim administration of a woman. And then the sinister and traitorous militarists, with their eternal disloyalty to all the principles and all the noblest ideals of America, carried out a new coup, pitting brute force against the popular will and closing off the path. They closed it to the people. They closed it to their country. They even closed it to America, because we are a single nation, and any blow against freedom and democracy in one country concerns, hurts and shatters all the other nations as a group.

LA PRENSA, whose struggle has been that of the Bolivian people and of all the free people of America, feels in its own flesh the tragedy of Bolivia and in expressing its most energetic rejection of the military coup and those responsible for it, calls upon all the people of America, all governments and all international agencies to take a severe and strong attitude of repudiation, which will force those who have betrayed the Bolivian popular will to cease their barbaric ways and allow free exercise of a right which has been won and the right to a shining tradition which has come down to us from Bolivar, the founder, whose name they sully with their evil actions.

We ask for a moral and material blockade by the entire continent against aggressive militarism. In Bolivia at present there is no longer ideological pluralism to be respected. There is no determination by the people, no national participation. The aggression was absolutely brutal, at a time when all the Bolivian people had just expressed their will most clearly, in fair and peaceful elections. The military coup is an attack in betrayal of an unarmed people: a crime against history.

'MIXED SYSTEM' SEEN AS STRATEGY FOR FUTURE

LD191113 Paris LE MONDE in French 6 Sep 80 p 7

[Dispatch by Francis Pisani: "Nicaragua--The Revolutionary Regime is Divided Between Pluralism and Radicalism"]

[Excerpts] Managua--The Sandinist National Liberation Front (FSLN) achieved power under exceptionally favorable circumstances--complete military victory over the Somozaist army, unchallenged historical and political legitimacy, and almost unanimous international support. Strong in these circumstances, it immediately took over the main wheels of government--the army, the police, public organizations and key posts in the administration and government.

This hegemony, coupled with the radical attitudes assumed by Nicaragua on the international scene in the past year and the behavior of its guerrillas, constantly dressed in olive green and carrying pistols at their side, could have caused other countries to fear that Nicaragua might follow the Cuban and, later, the Soviet path. The considerable aid given by Fidel Castro's government (teachers, doctors, technicians and military advisers) and the popularity which Castro enjoys among the Sandinists were bound to increase these fears.

And yet, after 1 year of this government, results show that relations with Havana have at least had the advantage of preventing young commanders from repeating some of the errors made by their elders. In contrast to many armed revolutionary movements eager to become more radical, the FSLN has devoted its energies to the implementation of a program which was, it hoped, to be approved by all non-Somozaist economic, political and social forces.

According to Mr Nunez, head of the FSLN National Directorate Executive Secretariat, Sandinism is above all "nationalist, anti-imperialist and popular." "From nationalism we draw the concept of unity and political openness," he explained. "Anti-imperialism has been imposed on us by the history of our country, one of the countries most severely affected by the United States. The popular aspect, can be found both in the way in which we achieved power and in our main objective, which is to resolve the problems of the most underprivileged."

Mr Sergio Ramirez, a writer and member of the junta of national reconstruction, emphasizes pragmatism. "We do not want to confine ourselves to ready-made plans," he stated. "We owe our originality to the fact that we take realities into account without losing sight of the revolutionary changes which are to be made." This attitude was clarified by FSLN National Directorate member Maj Luis Carrion, who believes that "transformations to be achieved are those which are objectively indispensable for extricating the country from poverty. They must always be seen as such."

Internal and external circumstances will determine futures stages. "We believe that the present relationship with the bourgeoisie is not necessarily mere tactics," we were told by reconstruction junta member Moises Hassan. "It is worthwhile to make our distincitve mixed system a strategy for an indefinite period. Therefore, we really want to try to socialize not means of production but only surpluses.

"We are convinced that it is necessary to give those who are not revolutionaries an opportunity to integrate in the process for the good of all concerned."

AMBASSADOR EXPLAINS RELATIONS WITH GUATEMALA

PA130004 Managua Radio Corporacion in Spanish 1700 GMT 12 Sep 80

[Text] Alejandro Castillo Masis, Nicaraguan Ambassador to Guatemala, who is currently in Managua, in statements made to this radio station termed diplomatic relations with Guatemala as very delicate. Following are statements made by Ambassador Castillo Masis to our reporter:

[Answer] The relations between the two countries are somewhat delicate. They must be handled in such a way as to try to avoid friction, so that peace and tranquillity can prevail in Central America.

[Question] Can the fact that you have been recalled by the government to submit a report mean that relations will be severed in the event of new provocations?

[Answer] Well, this depends on a series of factors which can occur at any time. We are aware of the existing hostility toward Nicaraguans. There are Nicaraguans missing, killed, of whose fate we have no official report from the Guatemalan Government. However, the Guatemalan Government minister, during a news conference, told us that we could ask the Guatemalan subversive organizations about the fate of Nicaraguans. In other words, we can practically assume that the Guatemalan Government considers Nicaraguans arriving in Guatemala to be going to that country to encourage the rebel movements, which is not true. This means that the Guatemalan Government does not assume any responsibility for Nicaraguans in that country.

[Question] We would like to know what you have heard about Nicaraguans, former Somozist guardsmen, plotting in Guatemala against Nicaragua?

[Answer] The support that the National Liberation Movement (MLN), an organization led by Sandoval Alarcon, an anticommunist leader in the continent, is giving to the Somozists in Guatemala is well known.

[Answer] No, just threats that the embassy is going to be dynamited, as well as personal threats.

[Answer] I have heard that he has formed a government in exile. The Guatemalan Government has officially said it does not support any government in exile. Nevertheless, it is consenting to the activities of these elements who are trying to provoke a clash between the two countries and take advantage of the situation to consolidate their government in exile. WORKERS URGED TO DEFEND REVOLUTION BY WORKING HARDER

PA111617 Managua Radio Sandino in Spanish 1200 GMT 11 Sep 80

[Excerpts] The fact that counterrevolutionary outbreaks exist cannot be ignored and for this reason the Ezequiel brigade is being formed to fight them in the northern region. However, the defense of the revolution must be carried out in more than just the military sphere. It must also be carried out in the political, social and economic spheres. This newscast obtained statements from Rodolfo Robelo Herrera, vice president of the Independent Liberal Party, on this very important issue:

[Begin recording] The goals and programs of the Patriotic Front of the Revolution [FPR] include support for the democratic and patriotic policy of the government of national reconstruction and the defense, consolidation and promotion of the Nicaraguan revolution in order to secure socio-economic changes based on the people's welfare, democracy and national liberation. In this way, the political organizations that make up the FPR are supporting this process.

In practice, we must support the plan for economic reactivation. The directorates of the various parties have given instructions to their rank and file so that they join this plan in the various areas in which they work.

The small progressive businessmen who belong to any of these organizations that make up the FPR must contribute to national production on which the development of Nicaragua is primarily based. The worker in these firms also has the duty to contribute the production by being efficient, meeting his schedule and carrying out his assigned tasks in these moments of economic crisis that we are undergoing--a consequence of the previous regime. LABOR LEADER SAYS 'LA PRENSA' TRIES TO PROMOTE CONFLICT

[Excerpts] LA PRENSA is trying to promote a confrontation between workers and the state, Companero Ivan Garcia Barca, secretary general of the Sandinist Workers Central [CST], has said about a report in today's LA PRENSA. Garcia Barca said that even though there are labor conflicts at some firms, they are being ironed out at the Labor Ministry. The CST secretary also discussed the taking over of some firms. Here is what Garcia said:

[Begin recording] [Garcia] We wish to note the intention of LA PRENSA which we think is trying to create, disclose or promote an alleged conflict between workers and the state. We know that is not so; in fact the labor leaders of a production center have said so.

[Unidentified questioner] Today's LA PRENSA reports an alleged concern in the private sector about the takeover of some firms. What is the CST position on those takeovers?

[Answer] We are concerned about the takeover of the firms. But we are even more worried about why this happens. We have read a letter addressed to the Labor Ministry by the Nicaraguan Industry Chamber with copies to LA PRENSA in which businessmen voice their concern. We ask: Why don't they worry about immediately resolving the problems arising at those firms? We ask this because we are aware that most of the firms taken over by the workers were taken over because management had not immediately responded to the workers' demands. We might note the case of Tona Brewery which was taken over by the workers in response to an intransigent, antilabor management attitude. The same thing happened at Cafe Soluble, Inc. and at other firms. So, I think that rather than being concerned about the takeover of the firms, management should be concerned about solving the problems that arise daily in the firms. Incidentally, these are minor problems that can be speedily and effectively solved.

[Answer] Their degree of discipline and level of production increase and, at the same time, they maintain a constant watch to prevent sabotage and any harm to the firm. [End recording]

BORGE ON THREATS TO REVOLUTION, THIRD WORLD UNITY

Havana TRICONTINENTAL in English Year 15 No 118, 1980 pp 18-28

[Article by Thomas Borge: "A Dream Becomes A Reality"]

[Text]

What are the opposition forces in Nicaragua doing?

Of course there can be no true revolution without a counterrevolution that is revealed on all levels: ideological, political and probably military. To put it another way, the counterrevolution is almost certain to show itself militarily at some point.

Ideologically, the struggle has been expressed in various ways, which are reflected in the country's newspapers. These include subtly-phrased right-wing positions whose form differs from those of the past — now the right must use language that is supposedly or seemingly revolutionary — and ultraleftist ideological positions which seek to deform the process by engaging in irrational, dogmatic demonstrations yet strike a revolutionary pose — which has nothing to do with the reality in which we are living. Many of these people are honest but confused. Others are not so honest, and it is probable that the ultraleft — which has never before made much of a ripple in Nicaragua — is being stimulated from abroad; that is, that CIA agents or agents from ultraleft organizations outside our country have been infiltrated. For example, Trotskyism was never a factor in Nicaragua until just recently, when a number of Trotskyite demonstrations were held; Maoism is still another aberration. There has also been an attempt to form a Sandinista Social Democratic Party in Nicaragua — that was the name it went by until we protested and the government issued a law prohibiting any political organization except the Sandinista Front and its fighting and mass branches from using the Sandinista name. Now it's been forced to call itself the Social Democratic Party. I once said it was neither Social Democratic nor Sandinista and this was confirmed when the Socialist International disclaimed it. Actually, its members came from the old traditional parties that no longer dare to use their former names. Instead, they hide behind new ones — without changing their old political and ideological line.

Perhaps the most revealing aspect of the reaction, the counterrevolution, is the so-called Social Christian Party and one of its wings, led by a certain González, who is also Chairman of a so-called Human Rights Commission. González has tried to use his office as Chairman of the Human Rights Commission for counterrevolutionary propaganda purposes, to try to discredit our Revolution abroad — which efforts have been met with approval and joy by Latin America's reactionary sectors.

On the military level, the enemy hasn't been able to muster the strength to do anything more than harass us.

At the same time, we know that members of Somoza's National Guard who have links with Honduran military men — not the government officially, but certain counterrevolutionary individuals in the Honduran Army — are now in Honduras. Still, most of the National Guardsmen there and in other countries are completely demoralized. The National Guard's military machine was thoroughly broken up and dismantled. Thousands of its members are in jail, and others are in exile in Guatemala, El Salvador, Honduras and Miami, where they have organized small counterrevolutionary groups that send us letters threatening to kill us.

I don't think the armed counterrevolution can make a serious thrust at the moment; and, by the time they get themselves together, we'll be able to thwart them. Of course we're ready to do that now, too, though perhaps with certain limitations. Probably, by the time they're able to make a counterrevolutionary move, we'll be able to crush them completely. This is the status of the counterrevolution right now.

Major, a Managua newspaper reported that a Somoza henchman who was living in Honduras was killed by Honduran agents — who robbed him of $60 000 — and that a Honduran Catholic priest who witnessed the murder has written a letter saying that exiled Cuban priests, including a certain Monsignor Boza Masvidal, had provided some of the money. Do you have any evidence of this kind of collusion between Cuban counterrevolutionaries in the United States and Somoza's henchmen in these neighboring countries?

Of course, we have lots of information on collaboration by Cuban counterrevolutionaries and also by capitalists, corporations, Senators and other equally despicable financial supporters of the counterrevolution in Nicaragua. Quite a bit of money was collected in the United States, and it may be, as the Honduran priest said, that Mr. Bravo had some of it on him when he was killed under mysterious circumstances in Honduras. I can't prove it, because the truth about this symbol of the Somoza counterrevolution isn't known as yet.

In any case, the counterrevolutionaries have collected, a lot of money in the United States. We also know that most of the money goes to provide them with a soft life, and the embezzlement — if that's the right word for it — doesn't worry us very much in terms of the effect this money might have, because we know from experience how corrupt Somoza and his followers are. Most of that money will be spent on themselves, to enable them to maintain the corrupt way of life to which they have become accustomed.

This leads me to ask you about direct CIA actions against the Sandinista Revolution.

To be perfectly honest, we have no proof of specific CIA actions. We know from experience that it is very clever. Our security service is still very limited. We are improving it, of course, but so far we have no specific proof of CIA activity, although we assume — just as we assume that the sun will rise every day — that the CIA has counterrevolutionary sources in our country. We have no proof that the sun will rise tomorrow; it's simply a scientifically-based intuition. I make the comparison in order to express my subjective certainty — based on objective historic observations that cover the struggles of all our peoples of Latin America — that the CIA is active in our country's internal affairs.

The United States has always considered Latin America to be its own backyard. What is the Sandinista Revolution's policy toward the government of the United States?

We have followed a prudent, mature policy that is, at the same time, an honorable one. When the Yankee Ambassador came to Nicaragua, we met him — I myself went — at the airport. I told him it was the first time a US Ambassador arriving in Nicaragua had been met by a Nicaraguan official who received him standing up instead of on his knees. I also told him he was always welcome in our country as long as he respected our dignity and our sovereignty. That has been our policy toward the United States: cordial relations based on mutual respect, the demand that it respect us. We respect it to the extent that it respects us. It has given us some help with foodstuffs, and we appreciate that aid. Some loans are now being negotiated, and they might also be considered aid. We accept this aid as long as it does not impinge on our sovereignty, our dignity and our independence; they are quite aware of that.

I get the impression that there is a sector in the United States — and here I mean not imperialism but the United States, where contradictions exist — that wants to avoid further problems, so as not to create another Vietnam or another Cuba in our country. There are other sectors that lean toward a repetition of the Cuban situation, of the aggression against Cuba; they are even ready to repeat what happened in Vietnam. These are very aggressive sectors that, at the moment, do not represent a majority. Of course, imperialism's essential nature has to be kept in mind, but so do the internal contradictions that exist within the United States.

We have been very inflexible in some cases and flexible in others, because what we are interested in is having the Revolution survive, thinking not only of ourselves but also of the other peoples of Latin America. In other words, the Revolution must be sustained, and we have to be clever in the field of international politics and diplomacy. It's another phase of the war, in which we have to win the skirmishes in order to win the battles; sometimes it's wise to pull back, to be flexible in the diplomatic war, just as it's sometimes necessary to be flexible and pull back in a military war. We never lose sight of our final goal, so our relations with the United States will be as cordial and harmonious as the United States wishes them to be — while, I repeat, this is always very closely linked to the respect that country has for our dignity, our sovereignty and our independence.

At the same time, we have outlined a policy of national independence, relations with all the countries in the world and friendship with all the countries in the world that wish to have friendly relations with us. We have established relations with the Soviet Union, and we have exercised our sovereignty in telling the Soviets that we respect their great, powerful and friendly country. Moreover, as I have said scores of times, we have also expressed the great love we feel for the Cuban people, because of their infinite generosity and unconditional solidarity. We will maintain an independent foreign policy.

As a founder of the Sandinista National Liberation Front, you predicted the Sandinista victory. What do you envision for your country now, following that victory?

Ah, for my homeland I see new victories, really; but I'm not thinking about just my homeland now — I'm thinking about all of Latin America. Of course, my dreams, the dreams of every revolutionary, are of people filled with joy, a wide reach of gardens and smiles for the future. I'm thinking of Latin America and of this dream that is now moving toward reality, because from now on the problem in Nicaragua is simply administrative, organizational, developmental. The doors to paradise have been opened in Nicaragua, and all we have to do is walk through. Now our dream is to open more doors, to more new paradises, in Latin America.

What about the plan to establish a Council of State?

I don't think the Council of State will essentially change the rules of the game, because the course a revolution takes is determined by something else, by real power. The state coercive bodies — the Army, the Police and the state security bodies — are in the hands of the Sandinistas, who also have the support of the masses, the mass organizations. Moreover, a revolutionary organization exists. We could be very flexible — and I don't think we've been flexible enough; I think we have been too radical. In Chile, for example, real power was in the hands of the reaction, and the reaction determined Chile's future for some time. We can do whatever we want with the power we have. We can remove the government and replace it with another if we like. We are astute enough to have a good government, composed of steady people, many of whom hold positions close to or identical with those of the Sandinistas. We could remove and replace Ministers, but we are astute, mature, and we are doing what is demanded of us at each step of the way.

The Council of State won't change basic power in Nicaragua at all.

It may be that the Council of State will be composed of people with good proposals, who want to help. At first, I wasn't in favor of it — but for other reasons, because I thought it was a waste of time, that it would involve too much talking. Revolutions have to be made, not discussed. That was my reason — not because it would change the essence of power or because it might cause a serious problem that would completely change the rules of the game. So, in order to apply the concept of giving an opportunity to all the forces that, to one degree or another, took part in the struggle against Somoza, the Council of State will be set up when conditions are more favorable for it, when too much talking won't imply losing too much time.

What are the basic values, the basic experiences that led to the Nicaraguan victory, that can be passed on to the rest of Latin America and to all the forces that are fighting in Africa and Asia?

You said it first, and we repeated it: Without unity, there is no victory. Our Revolution made a modest contribution by reasserting the correctness of armed struggle. Armed struggle is one of the historically necessary ways of defeating the ruling classes in Latin America. I might say that this fairly obvious truth evoked smiles of skepticism among certain supposedly revolutionary sectors in Latin America. It was a classic truth; the famous midwife of history is a classic historic truth. Yet, in Latin America, the need for unity of the revolutionary movement was not very clear. Some believed it was possible to hegemonize the process, and I heard such aberrations as that our policy of alliances meant having no allies.

We demonstrated two things: first, unity is possible; second, without unity, there is no victory. We are absolutely certain that, if we hadn't united, we would still be fighting or perhaps our people would have exhausted their energies in struggle and the enemy would have triumphed. The Sandinista revolutionaries made a basic patriotic decision — I don't even say "revolutionary" — to unite in a single organic structure around a single strategy. It wasn't very hard for us to do that, and I'm not sure why — perhaps because we started out as a single organization and then split; we all came from the same trunk. Perhaps in Latin America the problem is more complex because there are several different families that have pitched different kinds of tents; we had shared a single tent for a long time before we split up.

Not only were we able to unite as a revolutionary Sandinista organization; we were also able to unite the entire country, all the people and the various social sectors against a single enemy. Perhaps our chief contribution to the revolutionary struggle in Latin America is the unity of the revolutionary movement and the great national unity we achieved in Nicaragua — a national unity that would have been impossible without the unity of the Sandinista Front. The fact that our organization united and consolidated its vanguard position enabled us to lead the process and be the determining factor in it, the sun around which the planetary system of unity revolved.

If the Cuban Revolution contributed, let us say, the great experience, the path of armed struggle in Latin America, we, on this same path, can perhaps be said to have contributed unity in the revolutionary movement in Latin America. If revolutionaries unite, they win; that is a basic truth and a starting point. Without unity, the struggle can go on for centuries — because, without unity, there will be no victory.

What is your opinion of imperialism's new tactic, following the Nicaraguan experience, of making changes in certain dictatorships, as in El Salvador and South Korea?

True, imperialism is playing with the future of those countries by making those changes, but it could backfire, because it isn't so easy to change the course of history with political maneuvering. I view the situation in El Salvador very cautiously and I wouldn't want to express an opinion without considering very carefully what I'm going to say.

Undoubtedly, El Salvador has a revolutionary movement today, a movement with limitations and weaknesses, the main one being that same old problem of division. If the struggle sharpens in El Salvador and armed struggle becomes a serious factor, unity may emerge, because bloodshed also brings people together. I think the public commitments the new Salvadoran government has made should be exploited as much as possible. You have to move your pieces with great skill on the chessboard; you can't simply take a Manichean position that black is black and white is white. That's very easy, but it isn't right. You have to distinguish among shades of black and shades of white and not take opposing positions mechanically. In my opinion, you have to move with the agility of a fish in water, or at least with the agility of a horse in the field. I don't know; maybe history itself is what teaches men how things should be done. In any case, it seems to me we should look very carefully at the case of El Salvador. The important thing is for the Salvadoran revolutionaries to keep their eyes on the final goal. That's what's important. It is also important for them to agree on how to get there.

I really can't say much about the situation in South Korea. I know the people there are oppressed, that the country has been occupied by US troops and that there are very deep contradictions. And, of course, the death of Park Chung Hee is doubtless a part of imperialism's maneuvering.

The CIA launches its maneuvers and acts of aggression within the general rules of imperialism's aggressive principles. But, I repeat, there are internal contradictions. Maybe the CIA killed Park Chung Hee; maybe not. I'm not sure. It certainly had something to do with the need for a formal change in Korea in order to hold back the Korean people's struggle, but the peoples' struggles aren't easy to contain. They're like a dam that overflows in a storm or a hurricane. When there's a hurricane warning, measures are taken so there'll be as little damage as possible. Revolutions are sometimes like hurricanes: imperialism takes its measures to diminish their effects, but the hurricanes still can't be held back, and revolutions will never be held back. Perhaps some day some way will be invented to control hurricanes, but no one will ever invent a way to control the evolution of history.

Major, it has been said that a small part of the Nicaraguan victory was due to the international solidarity in which OS?AAAL had the honor of participating. How great a contribution did this solidarity make to your country's revolutionary process?

Yes. OSPAAAL always expressed its support and solidarity every time we had any serious problem. I remember, for example, that, when Comrade Carlos Fonseca was imprisoned, OSPAAAL launched an active solidarity campaign to set him free. This was repeated on many occasions.

All the peoples of the world expressed their solidarity with us, and this was a very important factor in our victory. While Central American and Latin-American solidarity were more visible and could be expressed in more practical terms, we also had support from people all over the world, including the people of the United States. I attended a meeting in Libya with representatives of various Palestinian and African parties and organizations, so I know that solidarity with our Revolution, with our struggle, was expressed everywhere. Wherever a Sandinista went, he was welcomed from the heart, with aid and affection.

This is still so: wherever we go, the people and their revolutionary organizations express their affection, support and warmth for our Revolution. It's very similar to what happened at the beginning of the Cuban Revolution, though there are differences in terms of solidarity, in the sense that broader sectors of the Latin-American and other peoples support our Revolution — because the groups that ally themselves with and support the Revolution have grown. I believe the Cuban Revolution has a great deal to do with this, because it has gained such great prestige, such great authority, and has so completely unmasked its enemies' lies that the people who were taken in by Readers' Digest and other such pulp publications have lost faith in their tales; history has shown them to be false. I've heard that, especially in the United States, they're saying the same kind of things about our Revolution that they said about Cuba — primitive, stupid things such as that children can be taken away from their parents and that, if you go to Nicaragua, they'll never let you out.

So the phenomenon is being repeated, but now there's a much smaller margin of credibility than in the past, which also gives solidarity more scope. Of course a number of governments and individuals have also shown very great solidarity with us. I would like to mention, in this regard, General Omar Torrijos, President José López Portillo, President Rodrigo Carazo Odio of Costa Rica, former Venezuelan President Carlos Andrés Pérez, former Costa Rican President José Figueras and our comrade and brother Fidel Castro. Muammar El-Qaddafi of Libya and other governments and world leaders have also shown their complete solidarity, for which we are very grateful.

ARCE DESCRIBES ECONOMIC PROBLEMS, RELATIONS WITH NEIGHBORS

Havana TRICONTINENTAL in English Year 15 No 118, 1980 pp 43-53

[Article by Bayardo Arce: "Blazing the Way to the Future"]

[Text]

Welcome, on behalf of my brothers of the National Leadership of the Sandinista Front. All of us were very pleased when we heard an OSPAAAL delegation was going to visit us. We know your organization well and identify with it fully, considering it to be a comrade in the long struggle the Nicaraguan Revolution must still wage to attain the objectives for which our people fought and for which the Sandinista Front was given its vanguard role. Thus, we have contributed not only to the liberation of the Nicaraguan people but also to the anti-imperialist struggle and to the building of a new world in which all workers will have a decent life. We believe our struggle will [illegible] but for the world effort to shake off imperialist, colonialist, neocolonialist and Zionist domination.

Your presence in our country is significant. It points up the identification that all revolutionaries have with the Nicaraguan Revolution, which is an authentic revolution.

We hope that during your stay, you will delve deep into this process and understand the heritage left us by the Somoza regime, the great tasks our Revolution has ahead of it, and our people's enthusiasm and determination to remain worthy of this world revolutionary solidarity, that we hope will continue. We want you to see our Revolution — which, though very young, is richly endowed with our people's creativity in solving problems.

Our process has been open to all the people and countries of the world that want to learn about it — especially sister, revolutionary peoples. Because OSPAAAL represents the interests of our Third World peoples and all the other peoples that struggle against the same enemy, it has a special significance. At all the international meetings we have attended — the Sixth Summit Conference of the Movement of Non-Aligned Countries, the United Nations General Assembly, etc. — we have clearly defended the interests of the Asian, Arab, African and Latin-American peoples and the rest of the world that, like us to a certain extent, must still deal with mankind's greatest problem: imperialism.

Our process has its own characteristics, which should be noted. Our organization, the Sandinista Front, triumphed after 18 years of struggle, during which it developed four rural guerrilla forces composed of cadres — organizers who were then given political or military tasks of increasing our people's awareness of the need to confront our enemies.

The fruit of our work began to appear in the last 18 months of our struggle — when, with our consistent revolutionary action, we had built our people's confidence in victory. The example of our fighters who died in completely unequal confrontations showed the people that their political-military action could defeat powerful enemies and create the kind of world we wanted for Nicaragua.

As a result of this rural guerrilla experience and broad mass work, the people began to join the revolutionary struggle in droves. Our compatriots saw the Sandinista Front vanguard as the most viable alternative for solving their immediate problem of overthrowing the dictatorship imposed on us by US imperialism. The only sectors that feared this alternative were members of the Nicaraguan bourgeoisie, who viewed our political action as a prelude to their own eclipse. Because of the need to isolate and neutralize our main enemy, Yankee imperialism, as much as possible, we not only incorporated our people massively but also developed a flexible policy of alliances in which all the social and economic forces in the country that had objective contradications with the dictatorship could participate — no matter whether the contradictions were based on the dictator's disloyal competition with them or on his servile representation of US interests in the country. This policy of alliances permitted us to unite all the people.

The Revolution's political and moral strength, which was turned into military strength as time went on, allowed us to create this policy of alliances without going through negotiations, simply by accepting representatives of all the forces in the country within the new power structure that emerged with the Revolution. During the struggle, we were always convinced that the only way we could inflict this great defeat on imperialism would be to unite the people, for it wasn't going to let its chief bastion in Central America go down without a struggle.

We are equally aware today that we must maintain national unity in order to reconstruct the country and neutralize the United States' aggressive aims. We haven't forgotten that, just a few days before our victory, the United States maneuvered within the OAS to try to bring off an armed intervention in our country. At present, although the US government doesn't appear to be officially involved in counterrevolutionary activities, we know of important individuals and forces representing US imperialism that are encouraging the counterrevolutionary efforts of those of Somoza's National Guardsmen who managed to flee the country and are now trying to create the political conditions for an intervention. This is why we maintain our policy of national unity.

Contact with the people makes it clear there is just one power here, the power of the workers, represented by the Sandinista Front, the political vanguard of the Revolution.

Our governmental and socioeconomic structures require the unity of the entire nation while the Revolution is consolidated and greater defense capacity is developed for counteracting imperialist acts of aggression.

WHAT SOMOZA-ISM LEFT

The situation we inherited from Somoza is another factor that contributes to our political position. Our country's debt to imperialism stood at $1.5 billion — three times our GNP — when the Revolution triumphed. Our monetary reserves amounted to only $3.5 million. The cost of reconstruction is estimated at $1.5 billion, to be spread over four years of work, $800 million of which must be invested in the current year (1979). In addition, $160 million must be paid on the debt.

Our final offensive broke our agricultural cycle — and Nicaragua receives most of its foreign exchange earnings from its agro-exports, especially cotton, our main crop. This year, only 70 percent of the cotton crop was planted, which meant we had an additional 200 000 unemployed, who had to be fed. Production dropped by 30-70 percent in all other crops except coffee. This means that there is no way our production can solve our economic and social problems on a short-term basis.

Nearly 5000 houses were destroyed; we lost 100 000 head of cattle and all our fowl. Moreover, we still bear the scars of Somoza-ism in the form of an infant mortality rate of 146 for every 1000 live births and an illiteracy rate of 70 percent.

OUR IMMEDIATE TASKS

Some of these realities also require that we strengthen our national unity in order to launch into reconstruction — which, for us, is not simply physical or material but covers the entire range of economic, social, cultural and even moral questions. These are the great tasks with which our people are faced, problems we are trying to solve by mobilizing everyone to raise production, apply a policy of austerity and remain vigilant against the counterrevolution — which we know is getting its forces together. In fact, we were expecting something to happen by December 1979, the artificial conflicts that reactionary groups abroad, allied with Somoza-ism, have tried to create for the Nicaraguan Revolution indicate that something is going on.

CONFIDENCE IN THE FUTURE

We consider our potential to be promising because, even though our country has a small population, our people are hard-working and combative and we have many natural resources — though some have been plundered over the years by imperialism and the bourgeoisie. We believe that, if we get things organized properly, we can extract from this wealth the elements we need to solve our people's problems. Thus one of our government's first measures has been to recover for our people all the resources and all the means that will permit us to use these natural resources for the benefit of the people.

We confiscated all of Somoza's property — half the country's arable land and nearly 150 enterprises. We nationalized the banks and the mines, and now we are nationalizing all the natural resources that were exploited by US and other foreign companies.

But, to do this, we need aid from all the fraternal peoples, because our country's potential wealth cannot be developed without financing, technology and skilled workers. We need to acquire these three basic elements from sources chiefly outside the United States, so it won't be able to tie down the Revolution's future. This is why, by joining the Non-Aligned Movement, we have opened relations with the entire world, thus establishing our Revolution's authenticity. We trust that the countries which refused to have anything to do with Somoza-ism and were always on good terms with the Nicaraguan people will show their solidarity with us now and that, with this what we are recovering for our people and their own great efforts, we will move ahead.

For example, our country has 2.7 billion arable acres, less than half of which were cultivated under the Somoza regime. Crops were grown chiefly for export, and the quota on the international market was limited; meanwhile, hunger stalked the land, and unemployment reigned in the countryside. We propose to work all the land — and not only for one harvest, as we do now. By using irrigation, we hope to guarantee two or even three harvests. In order to both meet our domestic needs and export enough so we can buy all the things our country needs but doesn't produce, such as medicine.

We now spend $3 million a month on medicine — something that never happened before, because the people never used to go to hospitals (they knew they wouldn't be admitted or treated). Now that there's a revolution, however, our people are exercising their right to health and are using the hospitals on a massive scale, so we don't even have enough medical personnel. The aid we receive in medical personnel from other countries isn't sufficient to meet this demand, but our lack of medicines is even worse. The transnational companies that produce these medicines are treating us on a straight commercial basis, without taking Nicaragua's plight into account. They demand payment of the Somoza regime's debts before selling us the medicine, and we have nothing to pay them with. We believe that this is a subtle form of blockade and that the only way we can solve this problem is by finding new markets and developing new relations with fraternal peoples and countries.

RELATIONS WITH NEIGHBORING COUNTRIES

In view of the circumstances of the Revolution, our policy is to maintain cordial relations with the whole world, especially with the other Central American countries. Nevertheless, it is an objective fact that thousands of Somoza's National Guardsmen found refuge with the military regimes of Central America: in El Salvador, Honduras and Guatemala, where they constitute a natural base for a counter-revolution.

Officially, these countries have also maintained cordial relations with us, but some of the most reactionary sectors of the government in each of them, sectors that had greater commitments (even economic ones) to Somoza-ism and that act as the most loyal servants of US imperialism in the area, have been engaging in activities that strain these cordial relations.

This has been particularly true in the case of Honduras, which has twice violated our airspace with its Air Force planes, one of which flew 100 kilometers into Nicaragua, toward Esteli. In addition, hostile actions have been taken against our Ambassador to Honduras, who has been unable to present his credentials and who was arrested and jailed on one occasion. On another, following a series of absurd accusations, the Embassy was surrounded by a military task force. Somoza's National Guardsmen also move around with greater freedom in Honduras than anywhere else.

They have considerable freedom in Guatemala, too, but Honduras is closer to us, so we have to conduct our relations with great astuteness and patience, not allowing ourselves to be provoked. Officially, we continue our cordial relations with these governments, for we don't want to make enemies for the Revolution gratuitously.

I would like to take this opportunity to send fraternal, revolutionary greetings from the Sandinista Revolution to all the peoples of Central America, Latin America, Africa and Asia that have expressed their militant solidarity with the Nicaraguan people's Sandinista Revolution, which also expresses the revolutionary aspirations of all the oppressed peoples of the world that have still to free themselves from imperialist oppression.

COLUMNIST QUESTIONS 'FASCIST' ACTIONS OF GOVERNMENT

PA161800 Panama City CRITICA in Spanish 15 Sep 80 pp 4, 22

["Bona Fide" Column by Camilo O. Perez: "Questions to Detect Fascism"]

[Text] 1. How did the Christian Democratic women dare meet at the Hotel Soloy a few days ago and issue a resolution of support for the present Salvadoran Government, which is killing so many humble people? Isn't the death of a human being condemned in the fifth commandment?

2. In this connection, could it be true that some citizens gather at a public relations office in the Regency Building on Via Espana to participate in campaigns to discredit the Salvadoran fighters who are defending themselves from the slaughter?

3. Why don't our Panamanian Indian brothers like Daniel Luna, Guillermo Rodolfo Valdes, Mayin Correa, Alfredo Jimenez and so forth join the struggle against fascism, which will not reach Panama because we will not allow it? And about the plush automobiles parked at that building, will we be allowed to print their license plate numbers to make it possible to identify them?

4. Is it true that the attacks on Minister Mock came up against the president's decision to support him because it was realized that it is preferable "to stick one's foot in than to commit graft"? Now then, who stuck his foot in and who committed the graft, or at least tried to do so?

5. Why aren't the names published of the girls who visit the U.S. military posts every weekend and who see communism everywhere when they return? How about the consequences after they are "used" and marriage promises are unfulfilled?

6. Why are some things said insincerely? In this sense, if it was stated that the Banco Nacional would serve so-called process, who has been influential in having a substantial loan granted to Dr Arnulfo Arias Madrid to purchase 150 milk cows and install a modern dairy in the Chiriqui Highlands?

7. And when the time comes to repay, who will become irked? Will it be Dr Arias or the bank itself, managed by a committee with financial and economic counseling from the vice president of the republic?

8. Could it be that the road to the Pacific coast in Chiriqui was built to provide easier access to Batipa Island and allow its owner to develop it privately by installing a modern dock there? Do you know the owner of the island? Is it the top leader of the rightwing in Panama, or some close relative of his, who is doing all the wooing, allegedly to keep him from becoming a nuisance? And who said that the top rightist leader will fall for such flimsy seducing?

9. Why doesn't the Guatemalan ambassador in Panama tell the truth? How can he conceal the fact that Lucas' regime is repressive? And why doesn't he disclose the fact that he has been denouncing the progressive Guatemalan newsmen to get them killed?

10. To what extent will our intelligence authorities be able to discover the fact that the first contingent of Salvadoran soldiers trained here at the school of the Americas will leave today, 15 September, from some place inside the military bases under U.S. command in the Panama Canal area? What will Tito Hengsen or the chief of the southern command tell us?

11. Will Foreign Minister Carlos Ozores Typaldos receive a large group of representatives from the popular sectors seeking recognition of the government of the Salvadoran majorities, the Democratic Revolutionary Front? Will the demonstration in front of the Foreign Ministry be held today at any rate?

12. Doesn't the attempt to involve the Panamanian commander in the plan hatched by CIA agent Col Bernardino Larios to kill some of the Sandinist commanders seek to discredit the highest ranking Panamanian officer once and for all?

MOSS DESCRIBED AS TYPICAL U.S. 'PROCONSUL'

PA092146 Panama City LA PRENSA in Spanish 8 Sep 80 p 8

[Letter to LA PRENSA director in "From The Reader" column: "The Proconsuls Do Not Lie to Their Cesars," by Carlos A. Morales G., a prominent Panamanian lawyer]

[Text] As I read the article by Guillermo Sanchez, I realize that there are many of us who ask the same question regarding U.S. foreign policy toward its "friendly neighbors." I believe it is not possible to describe this policy as "mistaken," or, as Guillermo Sanchez says, as one of "blindness," or above all, to say that it is being implemented by a poor errand boy (Moss), who is really filling his role very well, since there is no other way to act when one is representing the United States.

After so many decades of the same attitude, one must reach the conclusion that this policy is planned and premeditated, because proconsuls do not lie to their Cesars. They play a double role: That of praising and helping to sustain the regime that they serve by telling the people, with the most brutal cynicism, of the virtues of the dictatorship, as in the case to which Guillermo Sanchez refers. For a moment, reading Ambler Moss' statements brought Ardito Barletta to mind, since it would seem that they both learned the same lesson.

This is a role that these proconsuls have always played. For example, we need only consider the recent events in Iran, Nicaragua, El Salvador, Guatemala and logically, Panama. The other role is that of informer. Of course, we are not familiar with the reports, but it is easy to imagine them as follows: There is a poor image of Torrijos; we hope that the "retreat" will be favorable; the economic situation is clearly deteriorating despite so many loans (it would seem that the loans are not being used properly); unemployment is increasing; the state enterprises are characterized by much bureaucracy and little productivity, but Torrijos has the situation in hand; there is the tranquillity of stagnation, as Dr Zuniga [a well-known opposition lawyer] would say and the opposition is in retreat. However, let us imagine for a moment that the situation changes, with the opposition becoming active and increasing pressure against the regime causing Torrijos to totter. Then the response would soon be forthcoming and that "parrot without feathers," as Guillermo Sanchez calls him, would receive the order to contact the opposition.

This type of action is the rule which guides U.S. foreign policy. The U.S. takes advantage of these dictatorships to squeeze their peoples regardless of whether their governments are democratic, humane, inhumane, or genocidal. This does not matter. In the final analysis, the United States has strength, the CIA, airplanes, the Green Berets, and traitors to subdue the peoples or leave them drowning in the most bloody civil war, in order to later manipulate them with the famous loans. This is the way it imposed its will on the entire world for many decades and this is how it imposed the treasonous treaties.

This absurd, cruel and rapacious policy will bring the United States to total failure. The United States can see and feel this, but to change its attitude to give better treatment to the developing countries would mean less profits for the transnationals, better prices for our raw materials and more respect for the dignity of peoples and this does not exactly enter into its calculations. To expect that policy to change by conviction condemns us for decades or centuries to much bloodshed by our peoples.

That is why we must wake up and find the path to unity and the determination to take action to find our own destiny. This is the responsibility of us Panamanians who believe that our people are worthy of being guided along the path of freedom and respect. It is time to say, enough.

Respectfully, Carlos A. Morales G., Cedula 4-48-170.

COLUMNIST SEES FOOD SHORTAGES AS 'PRELUDE' TO COUP

PA131754 Panama City CRITICA in Spanish 11 Sep 80 p 31

["Stepping on Toes" column by Erasmo Gomez: "Prelude to a Coup d'Etat"]

[Excerpts] Before beginning this commentary, in which I modestly seek to issue a warning to government leaders, I wish to explain to my readers that I am not and have never been a socialist or communist.

This explanation given, let us proceed: It cannot be a coincidence that a mere 3 weeks before the coming elections, a small group of misguided students should have staged disorders and attacked the property of the state, the property of the people. We now know that some fanatical arnulfistas encouraged them, taking advantage of their pseudorevolutionary fervor, of the fact that they do not know what they want or where they are headed.

The disappearance of sugar from stores and supermarkets cannot be a coincidence, either. The disappearance of this staple is intended to generate discontent among the masses, which is the same thing the opposition seeks when it rejects any government project that would generate new sources of employment. This artificial shortage will boomerang on them in this pre-electoral period. I do not believe that the people, being as intelligent as they are, will give their vote to the opposition that has done them so much injury in the past and is doing them so much injury today. They have only to keep in mind that one of the private sugar mills belongs to a distinguished member of the Liberal Party.

In addition, a shortage of liquid gas has been noted in grocery stores, at least those close to my home and in certain establishments in the city of Colon. I am sure that in a few days there will be shortages of other staples on the market. This is the same drama that was set up before the fall and death of Salvador Allende in Chile.

The local Christian Democrats have sabotaged every government project that has meant progress and the creation of jobs and they have done so openly within the framework of the broad freedom that exists in our country. They are insulting. They make rash charges on the morning radio programs of the parrots and the parrakeets. Since they are ideological relatives of the Chilean Christian Democrats, it does not surprise me that they should have resorted to the same method used by that party to destroy the Allende regime. With the petrodollars that they are receiving, they are in a position to do so.

DRIVERS COMPLAIN ABOUT HOLDUPS--In the past 2 weeks, 12 Guatemalan tractor trailer trucks loaded with various kinds of merchandise have been held up and stolen in El Salvador. Losses are estimated at more than 25,000 quetzales. Reliable sources said yesterday that heavily armed civilians place all kinds of obstacles on the highways, forcing the truckdrivers to stop. It has also been learned that one person has been killed as a result of this type of action. However, his name has not been disclosed. The violent situation in the neighboring country prevents local authorities from providing protection to the truckers. Some local truckdrivers have expressed concern about this situation, adding that if this continues, trade between Guatemala and El Salvador will notably decrease. The various associations of Guatemalan transporters are expected to issue some kind of statement on these actions. It has also been learned that so far none of the trucks have been seriously damaged. BRIEFS

NETHERLANDS DENIES PLANES--The Hague, 4 Sep (AFP)--Netherlands Economic Affairs Minister Gijsbert Van Aardenne reported here today to Parliament that the Netherlands Government refuses to deliver the last two of a group of six Fokker F-27 planes as a consequence of the recent military coup in that country. The authorization to export the two planes expired last July, and the minister stated that it will not be extended or renewed. A spokesman of the Netherlands Fokker Aeronautics Society said the planes had been sold and paid for and that the government's decision had placed them in an awkward position. He refused to explain why the two planes had not been delivered before the export permit expired. [Text] [PY041934 Paris AFP in Spanish 1509 GMT 4 Sep 80]

CORVALAN CALLS FOR PINOCHET'S DEFEAT IN MOSCOW SPEECH

Santiago EL MERCURIO in Spanish 5 Sep 80 p A-11

/Text/ Paris, 4 September--In a speech made last Wednesday afternoon in Moscow, Luis Corvalan, secretary general of the PCCh /Chilean Communist Party/, made a direct appeal for revolutionary violence to overthrow President Pinochet's regime in Chile.

Several Soviet leaders addressed the ceremony sponsored by the Soviet Committee of Solidarity With Chilean Democrats on the occasion of the 10th anniversary of the UP's /Popular Unity/ election victory. Several representatives of the UP parties were present.

In a speech described by Radio Moscow as "destined to have an unquestionable impact in Chile and in the world," Luis Corvalan warned that because "Pinochet closed the roads to a gradual evolution as proposed by some, the people will resort to all types of struggle, including severe violence, to defend their right to eat, liberty and life."

The PCCh secretary general said that at this time the country "is living in a time of great political tension" and he called the plebiscite a "mockery of the democratic sentiments" of the Chilean people. He added that "vigorous popular contingents are challenging repression and speaking out against fascism and for liberty. Shouts of 'Down with Pinochet,' 'Democracy Now' and 'A People United Will Never be Defeated' are heard everywhere. In the face of a common enemy, progress is being made on the road of consensus, the meeting of all anti-fascist and non-fascist Chileans, of unity of action against the tyranny and fraud of the 11th."

Later he said that the world knows beforehand the result of the plebiscite. "But," he warned, "there will be another result. The illusions about a presumed liberalization of the regime are going up in smoke. The road to a gradual restoration of democracy proposed by some is being closed. Under these circumstances we have no doubt that the people of Chile will know how to find the way to throw off the yoke of tyranny. The masses will burst forth in one way or another until fascism is overthrown. Pinochet will be unable to remain in power for as long as he planned. The right of the people to rebel can no longer be questioned...No tyranny can withstand the avalanche of the masses."

Corvalan emphasized that the "coming days will be filled with arduous, difficult and inevitable struggles." "The people," he said, "will be able to find in the struggle specific forms of expression for their democratic and revolutionary process, certainly giving way to the most varied methods that will help to develop the movement of the masses, to isolate the dictatorship, unite forces and open the possibilities for victory."

Explaining this call for the use of all kinds of struggle against the present government of Chile, the PCCh secretary general said: "It is fascism which creates a situation in which the people will have no alternative but to resort to all means at their disposal, including severe violence, to help them defend their right to eat, liberty and life. The people," he added, "usually find themselves facing crucial situations which do not allow the use of other solutions."

In outlining the solution of revolutionary violence for Chile, Corvalan stressed: "This occurred in Cuba when it was faced with the Batista dictatorship. This occurred in Nicaragua in the face of Somoza's tyranny. The way things are developing, the same will hold true in Chile which is faced with Pinochet's fascist regime."

ENDESA REPORTS INCREASE IN CONSUMPTION OF ELECTRICITY

Santiago EL MERCURIO in Spanish 3 Sep 80 p 1

/Text/ The consumption of electricity rose 9 percent during the first 7 months of the year compared to the same period in 1979, according to a report released yesterday by ENDESA /National Electric Company/.

At the same time it was reported that seven of the 10 hydroelectric plants have set production records. The remaining three plants, El Toro, Isla and Molles, have a system which allows them to store water for use during dry spells.

Total electricity generated by ENDESA's so-called Interconnected System, which includes 10 hydroelectric plants and two thermoelectric ones, rose from 3.147 billion kilowatts to 3.485 billion, representing an increase of 10.7 percent.

According to ENDESA, the Interconnected System allows some plants to generate electricity at full capacity while others store water for use during dry spells. El Toro, the largest plant in service, stores water from Lake Laja while the others are working at full capacity. "We will see the other side of the coin," it was explained, "when we have a dry spell and El Toro exceeds its maximum output on record."

Thermal Energy

With respect to energy produced at the thermoelectric plants, there was a 27 percent drop at the Huasco plant and 100 percent at Bocamina. "The drop at the Huasco plant resulted from the initiation of 110 kilowatts of experimental service on the high tension line between Cerro Navia and Maitencillo in April of this year. The line will carry 220 kilowatts when it becomes fully operational." The report added that "there will be an even greater drop since the line became fully operational in August."

STRONGER RELATIONS WITH FRANCE--French Ambassador to Chile, Emmanuel de Casteja said yesterday that relations between the two nations have grown considerably over the past 2 years. As an example of the growth in bilateral relations, he cited the establishment and operation of the Mixed Commission, the visit of French businessmen to Chile, the visit of the "Jeanne D'Arc" training ship to Valparaiso, the visit of French senators to Chile, the trip to Paris of Production and Trade Confederation President Manuel Valdes to strengthen trade ties between both nations and the visit to France last year of former Foreign Minister Hernan Cubillos as part of his European tour. The French ambassador visited the Foreign Ministry yesterday where he met with the Director for Foreign Policy, Javier Illanes, in what he termed a routine visit. The ambassador also said that trade possibilities between the two nations were excellent and added that between the 20th and 30th of this month a delegation of French businessmen representing the tourist and agricultural food sectors will arrive in Chile. Ambassador Casteja confirmed that he will return to France at the end of the year and retire. The diplomat is over 64 and has held the post since December of 1978. He said that his replacement is a career service officer but he declined to name him, saying only that the Chilean government has already accepted the nomination. /Text/ /Santiago EL MERCURIO in Spanish 5 Sep 80 p C-7/ 8599

SECURITY DEPARTMENT REPORTS CLASH WITH GUERRILLAS

PA211757 Madrid EFE in Spanish 1942 GMT 20 Sep 80

[Text] Bogota, 20 Sep (EFE)--The Colombian Department of Military Security has revealed that a clash between guerrillas and army troops occurred today in Melgar, a resort town 176 km from this capital.

A spokesman of the Military Intelligence Service (B-2) told EFE over the telephone that one soldier and one guerrilla were seriously wounded during the confrontation.

Airborne troops today penetrated a vast region in Melgar, in the country's southwest, where the general operations headquarters of the 19 April movement (M-19) is believed to be located.

The troops, with the aid of trained dogs, are looking for Jaime Bateman Cayon, the top M-19 leader, who fled after the military intelligence located several guerrillas who were invited to a guerrilla "summit."

Reynaldo Franco Lozada, the mayor of Girardot Port, told EFE that 30 guerrillas have been surrounded by military units supported by Colombian air force planes who flew from the Apiay air force base.

B-2 spokesmen told EFE that the entire eastern region of Cundinamarca Department, in central Colombia, has been placed under military control in an effort to find the M-19 cell.

In their headquarters, the guerrillas were making plans to take over a student rally which was to be officially presided over by Nid a Quintero de Turbay, the Colombian president's wife.

VISITING M-19 PRISONERS BANNED--Bogota--Hundreds of relatives and friends of political prisoners at La Picota prison today staged a demonstration to protest the government's last-minute-decision of not allowing the general entrance into the jail. A massive visit of relatives of prisoners who are being held for having alleged ties with the 19 April movement [M-19] was scheduled for today. However, the government made the last minute decision to only allowing women into the jail. An unprecedent deployment of troops is currently underway around La Picota prison where hundreds of persons are trying to visit alleged M-19 members. The unexpected government decision to ban men from entering the jail caused a great stir among relatives who had arrived there from various cities today. Only women were allowed to go in but under the most strict security measures. [Text] [PA211916 Bogota CADENA RADIAL SUPER in Spanish 1730 GMT 21 Sep 80]

FORMER PRESIDENT ODUBER DISCUSSES DETERIORATING ECONOMIC SITUATION

San Jose LA NACION in Spanish 10-24 Aug 80

[A series of 15 articles on the domestic economy by former President Daniel Oduber]

[Part I, 10 Aug 80, p 10A]

[Text] This is the first in a series of articles by former President Daniel Oduber on the national economic outlook; LA NACION will be publishing them on an exclusive basis:

Since 8 May 1978 I have endeavored to stay out of domestic politics as much as possible, to give the current president and his administrative team the opportunity to run the government in accordance with the programs announced during the election campaign, and in a climate of absolute respect both for the ideas of those who take differing ideological stands and for the democratic institutions that the Costa Rican people, through the inspiration of the National Liberation Party, has succeeded in building over the last three decades.

I remained silent as long as I could. But everything was in vain. The current administration's lack of respect for the values of our people; its underestimation of their intelligence; its abuse of their good faith; its arrogance in power and its administrative ineptitude are all factors that forced me to come before the public and now to write these lines. This is the first of a series of articles in which I will point out the major deceptions and mistakes of the economic policy that has been taking shape under the Carazo administration. In subsequent articles I will discuss various aspects of the domestic economy, the major ones being the fiscal situation, the underspending of the budget, the cumulative domestic debt, balance of payments policy, foreign indebtedness, bank credit, monetary policy, output, prices and inflation.

Deterioration

Since Mr Carazo became president of the republic, all economic indicators have pointed to a steady and rapid deterioration of our economy. Production has been falling; prices have been rising; the budget deficit has tripled; foreign exchange reserves have been used up; our trade balance deficit is at an unprecedented level; unemployment is beginning to be felt in various activities; businessmen, workers and housewives are complaining. But all of this does not seem to worry the administration or its closest advisers.

Instead of facing up to the problems and seeking responsible solutions, Mr Carazo has discovered a new style of governing, which is not exactly the government-by-decree that he is now announcing. What characterizes his presidential style is government by excuse, by omission, by improvisation.

After wasting many months unsuccessfully seeking evidence of corruption among public officials of previous administrations, he has now devoted all government energies to searching for and inventing excuses for his inability to resolve our major problems, which are even threatening to undermine the very foundation of our institutional fabric and our social peace. Thus, for each problem they have come up with an excuse, and all these excuses are based on the central excuse that goes: "We inherited all our problems from National Liberation, in particular from the Oduber administration." The other excuses are the ECLA [Economic Commission for Latin America] model, oil prices, the inefficiency of the Legislative Assembly and the press's lack of understanding. These are the five pillars underlying the entire complex rationalization that the current administration has devised to justify its incompetence in government. If deficit spending increases, the inaction of the Legislative Assembly is to blame. If inflationary trends worsen, oil prices are to blame. If monetary reserves decline, the Oduber administration is to blame. If people complain, the press and journalists are to blame because they are not reporting accurately and objectively on actual conditions in the country.

Moreover, this process of self-justification has led the highest officials of the current administration to disparage the intelligence of their fellow citizens by citing false data and slanted information. The president and his finance minister announce to us every week on television that they have managed to underspend the federal budget by more than 1 billion colones and that they have cut the rise in government expenditures to unprecedented figures. Nothing could be further from the truth, as I will demonstrate in a subsequent article. The Central Bank has resorted to paid-up deals and has utilized cunningly devised numbers to make the people believe that credit has been earmarked to finance productive sectors, not the government. The president said shamelessly on television that his administration would not make use of bank credit, but the banks are closed to producers because their funds are earmarked to cover the current expenditures of the central administration.

The finance minister has just announced at the Chamber of Commerce, taking a piece of information out of context, that inflation this year is going to be a bit more than 5 percent, when official figures themselves indicate that prices rose by almost 10 percent over the first 4 months of 1980 and will probably be up by some 21 percent by year end. This is deceiving the people and abusing the good faith that Costa Ricans have in their leaders, even if they did not vote for them. You can fool some of the people some of the time, but you cannot fool all of the people all of the time, the proverb goes. And when there is deception, I cannot remain silent and thus I have decided to write these articles.

Dangers

Even more important, this administration's obvious ineptitude, contradictory measures, lack of vision in goals and of coordination in action, immaturity and inexperience in public administration, irresponsibility in managing affairs of national interest and arrogance in the exercise of power have undermined and weakened our economy to the point of endangering not only our economic recovery but our country's institutions, democratic values and social justice as well.

There is only one field in which they have been consistent, the nationalization of banking, which with the collaboration of the Central Bank of Costa Rica they have constantly tried to discredit and abolish. The fact of the matter is that the current situation of state commercial banks is due to the present administration's monetary and credit policies, as diligently executed by the Central Bank. I will discuss this in a subsequent article.

I should clarify that my writing of these articles is not motivated by political interest. I am not seeking to nor will I apologize for my administration, even though my performance and that of my collaborators is faulted every day by the new economic mandarins of the current administration. The people know what I did and did not do. My concern is the same that every good citizen ought to have: to demand respect, sincerity, competence and responsibility of their elected officials. My intention is to point up the errors of the present, not to defend the accomplishments of the past. Only in this way will we be able to offer the generations to come a Costa Rica with a future of peace and freedom.

[Text] Production Down Because of Economic Policy

The country's economic development depends fundamentally on our production efforts. The earnings of Costa Ricans, their job opportunities and the satisfaction of our mounting basic needs depend crucially on what and how much we produce. If output grows more than the population, the country moves forward. If the opposite takes place, the country moves backward and grows poorer. Unfortunately for Costa Ricans, because of the haughtiness of those who govern with words and look for excuses for their failings, Costa Rica has been growing poorer. This is an incontrovertible fact.

The purpose of this article is to demonstrate that the economic stagnation that we are now experiencing is due not to chance or outside circumstances but basically to political experimentation, irresponsible action and the low priority that the Carazo administration has attached to the country's production sectors. The table below contains the basic information in this regard.

Domestic Production (Annual Percentage Growth Rates)

Sectors	1977	1978	1979
Production sectors	7.1	7.2	0.9
Agriculture, forestry, hunting and fishing	2.2	6.6	-1.0
Industry, mines and quarries	12.7	8.2	1.4
Construction	3.9	5.8	5.4
General government	5.0	5.0	6.0
Others	11.8	5.5	5.2
Total	8.9	6.3	3.3

Drop in Output

The first conclusion that we can draw from it is that the country's production efforts have fallen off dramatically since 1978, as the rate of increase in the gross domestic product (GDP) has dropped from 8.9 percent in 1977 to 6.3 percent in 1978 and to just 3.3 percent in 1979. The Carazo administration's goal for 1980, as set by the Central Bank, is an increase in output of just one percent, the lowest in many years. This means that output per inhabitant in Costa Rica is rising less all the time, inasmuch as the population is increasing at a rate of about 2.4 percent. Thus, while output per inhabitant in our country increased by 6.5 percent in 1977, in the 2 subsequent years the rise was just 3.9 and 0.9 percent, respectively, and it will drop by 1.4 percent in 1980. Hence, the only promise that President

Carazo has kept was the one he gave in telling Costa Ricans that years of "steady impoverishment" for all were in store.

But let's get back to the figures in the table. An analysis of how the various economic activities have performed shows that production sectors have been the ones hardest hit by the general deterioration that the country is mired in. Thus, whereas production sectors grew at an average rate of 7.1 percent in 1977, they expanded by just 0.9 percent in 1979, which is tantamount to economic stagnation. Note in particular the plunge in farm production, which decreased one percent in 1979. This is in stark contrast to Mr Carazo's campaign and presidential promises to give priority to the agricultural sector, and ultimately to his ongoing assertions that his administration's sound economic policies have brought us a bonanza unprecedented in the country's history. What a tall tale indeed!

The significant growth in the farm sector in 1978 was basically due to the larger coffee crop and to the rise in meat production resulting from the incentives granted to these activities in previous years, as the Central Bank itself acknowledges in its 1978 Annual Report. On account of unsound economic policy, corn output also dropped in 1979 by 16.7 percent; black beans by 6.6 percent and sorghum by 7.5 percent. The latter crop had expanded by 32.8 and 28.3 percent in 1977 and 1978 respectively. As a result of the production disincentives, the country had to import corn, beans and sorghum, and of course essential items such as milk, eggs, cooking oil, butter, sugar and beans were in short supply in Costa Rican homes. Not only were beans in short supply, but we had to eat the hard beans that the National Production Council imported from a number of South American countries, which evinced an astonishing ineptitude or an inexcusable ignorance of what the basic nutritional needs of the Costa Rican people are.

Industrial Sector

The industrial sector, which had been extraordinarily buoyant during the entire decade of the 1970's, expanded by just 1.4 percent in 1979, the lowest rate in the last 15 years. This dramatic drop in our industrial output was due mainly to the climate of insecurity created by the current administration, to its tight credit policy and to the financial assault by the Central Bank on this and other production sectors.

Since Mr Carazo took over, he has created an atmosphere of total uncertainty in the manufacturing sector by constantly changing the rules of the game. First, he fought with the members of the Central American Common Market, thus jeopardizing our exports to those countries. Then he cut import tariffs on a series of manufactured goods and later launched an attack on industrialists and assembly plants. Starting in October 1978, the current administration's financial policy has undergone one of the strangest and most unexpected turnabouts; no one can tell what winds will blow tomorrow in Zapote. Businessmen need clear-cut ground rules, a clearly defined economic policy and a relatively stable climate. But we have had none of this in Costa Rica since 8 May 1978.

Another decisive factor in the falloff in domestic output has been the credit policy adopted by the Central Bank. It has attached the lowest priority to financing production efforts. As I will point out in a subsequent article, in 1979 production sectors received only 17.7 percent of the total increase in credit, whereas the public sector garnered two-thirds of the rise. In 1978, the last year in which a credit program worked out by my administration was in effect, almost 45 percent of the increase in credit was earmarked for financing production sectors. How is it possible that in Costa Rica, a basically agricultural country, the farm sector receives just four percent of the total expansion in credit?

How is it possible for the Central Bank to restrict credit for production when the country is mired in a deep fiscal and balance of payments crisis? The long lines of small- and large-scale producers waiting vainly at banks for loans are eloquent testimony of the Carazo administration's economic short-sightedness.

Financial Policy

Since October 1978, uncertainty, scorn and insufficient loans for production have been accompanied by a disastrous financial policy. The "financial repression" that the Central Bank says existed against stock market investors has been transformed by the bank into true "financial aggression" against producers. I will analyze the ultimate objectives of this policy in a later article. I am now concerned about pointing out the further negative impact on domestic output of the unprecedented rise in the cost of internal credit.

Continued high interest rates, which the Central Bank has justified at its convenience, at times by citing international rates, at times by pointing to domestic inflation and most recently as a function of its own intuition as to the supply of and demand for money, have not only unnecessarily punished domestic producers but have also discouraged production efforts by spurring high-return securities investments. Why run the risks inherent to the production process when you can earn a handsome interest rate simply by depositing money in state-controlled banks or private finance companies?

It is vital to boost domestic output in order to get the country out of the chaos into which the current administration has plunged it. Those who irresponsibl encourage financial speculation to the detriment of our production capacity, those who aid speculators and attack producers, those who build castles in the air and congratulate each other flatteringly while the country collapses are doing a disservice to our nation. Those now in power are impoverishing Costa Rica and destroying the business capabilities and the production system that we have expended such great efforts to erect for the good of Costa Rica.

[Part III, 12 Aug 80, p 10A]

[Text] Carazo's Explanation of Inflation

Prices are the area in which it is perhaps most difficult to fool Costa Ricans. Every day, each person and each family feels price rises directly in their pocketbooks. Maybe this is why the current administration has aimed its efforts at shifting the blame for its mistakes in the area of prices to the Oduber administration, as well as citing its other favorite excuse: oil. The fact of the matter is that after 2 straight years of price stability in 1976 and 1977, when inflation totaled 4.4 and 5.2 percent, respectively, the country has, since 1978, been propelled towards a dangerous inflationary spiral that erodes workers' buying power, sours labor relations, flays small producers, encourages speculation and discourages production efforts.

The scant official figures that are made public are eloquent, as we can see in Table 1 below.

Price Indices for 1976-1980 (annual changes)

	1976	1977	1978	1979	1980*
Consumer prices (1975 base)	4.4	5.3	8.1	13.1	19.5
Wholesale prices (1966 base)	7.2	7.4	9.4	24.0	21.0

Increases

Note in the table that prices rose three times faster in 1979 than in 1976. Inflation is expected to hit almost 21 percent this year, and this does not take into account the tax increase decreed as of 1 August to cover the wage boost. In light of these facts, which all Costa Ricans can attest to, it is strange that just a few weeks ago the finance minister told the Chamber of Commerce of the Americas that inflation this year will be below six percent (LA NACION, 12 June 1980). Whom does he think he is kidding?

But as I pointed out at the outset, since it is impossible to conceal the major inflationary trend that we are experiencing, the Carazo administration has constantly cited three excuses: the first, that Oduber is to blame for price rises; the second, that inflation is imported and is due to oil prices, and the third, that although we are in bad shape, we are better off than other countries. I will now analyze each one of these propositions.

In its zeal to foist off its own mistakes on previous administrations, the Executive Branch has given instructions to the Central Bank to "technically" justify its view of reality. Casting tradition aside and abandoning its status as an independent policy-making institution in our economy, the Central Bank yielded to the desires of the chief executive and asserted in its 1978 Annual Report that price increases that year "...were detected by the index as 1978 price movements when in reality the increases must have occurred in previous periods, inasmuch as the prices of a number of items were arbitrarily kept lower than they should have been under the circumstances..." (page 39 of the Annual Report).. But on the next page the Central Bank inadvertently disproves this assertion by demonstrating that the rise in the wholesale price index was due almost exclusively to the explosive increase in the prices of a group of goods not subject to controls, an increase almost double that of the price-controlled group. In other words, the inflation since 1978 has been due to measures and developments since that time, not before.

Imported Inflation

The second excuse is that inflation is imported. Although the prices of imported goods, petroleum in particular, do have an impact on our economy, the government is trying to exaggerate their importance to cover up the blunders of its domestic economic policy that have fueled and worsened inflation. We can use the information in the wholesale price index, which is drawn up by the Central Bank of Costa Rica, to determine the impact of oil prices on price increases. Table 2 shows the percentage rises in prices from January 1978 to April 1980.

Percentage Increases in Prices January 1978 to April 1980

	Price Increases January 1978-April 1980	Each Category's Share in Total Rise
Foodstuffs (beverages and food)	57.2	54.3
Other items	35.1	32.6
Fuels and electricity	83.7	13.1
Total	49.1	100.0

Note that although the price of fuels and electricity over the last 2½ years rose 83.7 percent, its impact on overall inflation was just 13.1 percent. This is because fuels are consumed in smaller amounts than other items. In contrast, the Central Bank's numbers show that more than half (54.3 percent) of the extraordinary rise in prices was due to higher prices for food, which is not imported. Under this administration we Costa Ricans have seen food prices rise 57.2 percent. You can feel it, can't you?

We can thus conclude that the argument that our inflation is due to oil prices is groundless and is merely one more excuse to conceal the current administration's ineptitude. In the next article I will look into the arguments that inflation is due to the higher prices for the items that we import and that we should console ourselves because we are in better shape than other countries.

[Part IV, 13 Aug 80, p 10A]

[Text] Inflation Is Not Imported

In the previous article I demonstrated that higher oil prices have had little direct impact on our inflation rate over the last 2 years. The argument can be advanced, of course, that although petroleum contributed little in direct fashion to rising prices, it triggered increases in other categories. The best way to estimate these indirect or induced effects is through what economists call the input-output table, which reflects the interrelationships between the various sectors of the economy. Costa Rica does not yet have the access to these tables that it should; however, a recent study by the Center of Central American Integration and Development Studies, a branch of SIECA [Secretariat of Central American Economic Integration] (Document ECID/EIP-EF-001-79), on Guatemala, which utilized this analytical tool, concluded that oil price increases from 1972 to 1976, which were relatively much larger than those since 1978, had a significant impact only on the price of fuels, electricity (Guatemala relies heavily on thermoelectric power) and fishing, and much less of an effect on a few other items and transportation. Although the study was concerned with Guatemala, we can reasonably assume, given the similar production structures in Central American countries, that the impact of crude oil price rises on our country has been comparable.

Relationships

The low-level linkage or integration of the various sectors of our economy means that the impact of oil prices does not carry over into other activities to the same extent that it does in the industrialized countries. This reinforces the conclusion that the government is not telling the truth when it asserts that our inflation is due to rising oil prices.

Nor do Central Bank figures square with the pet argument that inflation is imported in the sense that it stems from the rising prices for the items that we import. The Central Bank's breakdown of the wholesale price index into domestic and imported goods shows that close to 85 percent of the rise in prices in 1978 and 1979 was due to increases in the prices of domestic goods while only 15 percent was attributable to imported items. Furthermore, the imports price index rose 14.8 percent in 1979, and since imports account for only 35 percent of total output, it is patently obvious that the 24 percent inflation rate that we had that year was not of foreign origin.

But if the above arguments are not enough to convince the people who are trying to confuse the public by taking advantage of their positions, we can turn to other approaches to determine whether our inflation is imported or the result of the domestic economic policy blunders committed by the current administration. One is the approach used by the Economic Commission for Latin America (ECLA) and cited by former President Jose J. Trejos in an article of his that LA NACION published on 26 October 1977. According to this view, inflation is basically of internal origin when the budget deficit comes to represent a sizable percentage of total expenditures. Since 1977, when the deficit amounted to 23.6 percent of total expenditures, the ratio has risen to 28.5 percent in 1978 and to the incredible figure of 37.8 percent in 1979 (Annual Report, General Comptrollership of the Republic, page 37). In other words, the government's current revenue barely covered 60 percent of total outlays.

Showing a lack of imagination, as well as their ineptitude in rationalizing expenditures and boosting revenue, the administration's neoliberal economists irresponsibly resorted to "bank petroleum," in other words, issuing money without backing. Credit for the public sector has risen from 2.3789 billion colones in 1977 to 5.721 billion in 1979, which is more than a doubling in just 2 years. In other words, an increase of 3.3421 billion has been financed with paper that has no real backing. These are the economic policy blunders that have have triggered our inflation, not oil.

Decontrolling Prices

To the above foolish moves we must add the misguided prices policy that the government, inspired by the model advocated by the "Chicago Boys," has promoted. Decontrolling the prices of essential goods, on the one hand, and the lack of production incentives, on the other, have made foodstuffs not only expensive but unobtainbale as well. Meat, eggs and milk have disappeared from the diets of middle- and low-income families because they are priced too high for them. Other items are in short supply, because of speculation or a lack of foresight on the part of responsible government institutions, such as the National Production Council (CNP); in this case, the item is beans.

Finally, Mr Carazo tries to comfort us by telling us that we are in better shape than other countries, among them Chile, Argentina, Brazil and others. This is nothing new, as the figures in the table below illustrate. According to them, between 1970 and 1976 Costa Rica had lower average inflation rates than many other countries. In 1976 and 1977, in fact, before Mr Carazo took office, our country had lower inflation rates than industrialized countries like the United States and some members of the EEC. From 1978 on, however, the rise in our domestic prices outstripped and this year will double that of those nations.

The president should face reality and take up his responsibility to the country and to the people. Please, no more excuses and deception, and much less consolation. Let us remember, after all, that "the misfortune of many is the consolation of fools."

[Text] Genesis of Fiscal Errors

In November 1977 I approved the Oduber administration's economic program for 1978. Its main objective was to maintain a steady rise in the country's economic development, an acceptable climate of social peace and the usual stability in exchange rates and prices. On that same occasion I spelled out the strategy to be pursued, the corresponding priorities and the measures and actions to be taken to implement the program.

We knew the obstacles that would be encountered in putting these measures and actions into practice, since we were in the midst of an election campaign that was to conclude on 5 February 1978. I also knew that whatever the outcome of the election, it would be hard to implement some of them because they were unpopular or complex, especially the tax and monetary measures.

Immediately after the Supreme Election Tribunal declared Mr Carazo president-elect, I sent him a note opening the doors of all Costa Rican government offices to him and all his closest followers, advisers and consultants so that they could inform themselves as to the degree of implementation of government plans and programs, as well as the country's economic, financial and social situation. It was just a few days later that, like bumblebees in May, several dozen of his political followers showed up, seeking to win the president's favor and to distinguish themselves enough to secure high-level government jobs by doing research work and acquiring a knowledge of government.

People From the "New Breed"

The new breed team showed up early in the morning at the Central Bank and the Finance Ministry. A few days before, anticipating that we would have to boost the pay of civil servants and take care of major budget shortfalls, I requested a detailed proposal for a fiscal solution to be drawn up, based on budgeted economies and the creation of new sources of revenue. The new breed that took over the government on 8 May 1978 obviously ignored our economic plan and, of course, the proposed fiscal solution. The glory resulting from an election victory might have triggered a negative reaction to all of the programs and projects that were being implemented or planned at that time.

Thus, the current administration began wasting many long months, as well as its manpower and technical resources, in a bid to uncover illegal, illicit or criminal actions to justify the intensive campaign that it mounted against corruption. All of the new administration's efforts were in vain (this was to be expected), and the few cases in which they were hopeful of proving corruption were thrown out by the courts.

Thus, by devoting so many months and so many people to a witch hunt, as if we were in the Middle Ages or in the midst of the Inquisition, they wasted valuable time that they could have spent seriously examining the nation's real problems and the social and economic situation of the world around us, as well as dispassionately assessing the proposals that had been drawn up or working out other measures in keeping with the neoliberal philosophy that the new administration was going to apply.

The current administration also devoted many months to the political and military developments that were taking place in the other countries of Central America, instead of earmarking its priority efforts for learning about and resolving Costa Rica's major problems. In point of fact, the failure to attend to our domestic problems and the excessive time devoted to problems not directly related to Costa Rica's interests, among other things, caused out fiscal and balance of payments situations to deteriorate enormously in the last 2 years, to the point that each today is almost unmanageable from the standpoint of traditional solutions.

Federal Budget

In mid-1978 the Executive Branch discovered that there was a budget shortfall of some 800 million colones, and it made a tremendous fuss about this matter, such as we have never seen before. Every government, regardless of political affiliation, postpones certain expenditures and commits itself to new outlays on the condition that it has enough tax revenue to cover them, whether from an anticipated boost in revenue over the rest of the year or from the creation of new sources of revenue. This is a fully accepted budgetary practice. In contrast, what is not acceptable is to submit to the Legislative Assembly a draft budget with inflated government revenue figures, as the current administration did with the draft budget for 1980, for example.

One of the deputy finance ministers acknowledged this when he stated publicly that expected revenue this year will be less than originally estimated, including, of course, the increased taxes on coffee exports and on gasoline, liquor, cigarets, soft drinks, etc that took effect in December 1979. From the table below we can clearly see that government revenue was inflated by almost 650 million colones in the draft budget. This is one way of unnecessarily expanding the federal budget, of concealing budget shortfalls (such as the ones they found in mid-1978 and about which they made such a fuss) and of then calling for new taxes or the passage of a quick tax package. The country's public finances obviously cannot and should not be handled this way. This is aggrandizing makeshift measures, blunders and deception in public administration. See the table below.

Government of Costa Rica Revenue as Estimated in the 1980 Budget
(millions of colones)

Revenue originally estimated by the Finance Ministry	5,367
Plus, estimated revenue from the tax increases ordered by the Executive Branch in December 1979	470
	5,837
Minus, revenue anticipated by the Finance Ministry at that time, including revenue from the presidential order	5,200
Total inflated revenue in the 1980 budget	637

Returning to the budget shortfall that existed in mid-1978 (around 800 million colones), I should underscore the following. Instead of settling down to think seriously about the problem and find suitable solutions to it, the current administration made a big journalistic fuss about it and ignored the prescription that we had worked out to finance the deficit. It thus did precisely the worst thing for the country and for a sound management of public finances, and all because it based its actions on goals clearly motivated by political passions.

Possible Solutions

They unquestionably took the wrong road. They should have proceeded in one or more of the following ways: a) put aside the 800 million deficit, based on the premise that it consisted of commitments made by the Oduber administration, not the new government; b) replace the shortfall with other expenditures already included in the 1978 budget and which, in their opinion, were not priorities for the new administration; c) submit to the Legislative Assembly an expanded budget with the deficit in question, which would be financed with the resources recommended by the previous administration, while stating the reservation that such resources were not the responsibility of the new government, and d) draw up a new expanded draft budget, based on revenue other than what my administration recommended, and submit it to the Legislative Assembly as the new administration's own prescription. But instead of doing things sensibly and resorting to one or more or these possibilities, the new administration took the least suitable road and employed cheap political demagoguery, which in the end turned out to be extremely expensive for Costa Rica and Costa Ricans. They chose a mistaken approach.

In my next article I will continue looking at the consequences that this decision brought, as well as those that occurred later, a chain of blunders that has ultimately led to the most critical fiscal situation in our history.

[Part VI, 15 Aug 80, p 10A]

[Text] Main Fiscal Mistakes

As I explained in the previous article, the current administration decided to send the Legislative Assembly an 800 million colones draft budget increase to cover the 1978 shortfall. It erred, however, by financing it almost exclusively through a bond issue. Thus, the shortfall had to be covered later with part of the 600 million colones that I had left them in the National Treasury as of 7 May 1978, and the rest apparently with an issuance of currency approved by the new Central Bank authorities during the second half of 1978.

The only logical explanation that a rational and sensible person can come up with for the adoption of a measure like this is that the Carazo team lacked ideas, programs and experience when it took office on 8 May 1978.

I am certain that if President Carazo and the officials now in office had suspected the negative consequences that this erroneous decision would entail for them, they would never have made it, inasmuch as it immediately backfired on them. But since to them the primary thing is to pursue an electioneering policy instead of looking out for the national good, they chose the wrong road. This is the first fiscal mistake they made, and they magnified and added to it many times over in subsequent years.

Recurring Expenditures

In point of fact, the new breed of officials did not realize in submitting a budget amendment financed by a bond issue that they were creating an expenditure that would recur annually while backed by funds having a one-time budgetary existence. Thus, the expanded 1978 budget must have boosted the budget deficit by many millions of colones, triggered major pressures for a much larger 1979 deficit and, in effect, prompted a further rise in the 1980 budget shortfall. We can logically see, therefore, how the Federal Government deficit rose from 984 million colones in 1977 to 1.76 billion in 1978 and to 2.607 billion in 1979.

We can immediately see the parallel between the increase in the deficit and the budgetary increase that President Carazo should never have submitted to the Legislative Assembly the way he did. Blinded by the desire to begin his term by blaming the Oduber administration for everything that would happen during it, he started with the deficit problem, but what Mr Carazo and his team did not or refused to realize, and this must be repeated as often as necessary, was that they themselves were putting their own head through the noose by making a misguided political decision or an erroneous technical decision or both.

This blunder by the inexperienced current administration at the very outset of its term had to be resorted to the following year by the same officials who had erred initially, when they were faced with the 1979 deficit problem, which included pay boosts and subsidies for universities. They had to quickly draft a proposed budget apparently backed by a tax package that never had the support of the government party members of the Legislative Assembly. This lack of support from Unity Party deputies and the negligence shown by this same political group in the Financial Affairs Committee forced the Executive Branch to boost coffee export duties and taxes on gasoline, liquor, cigarets and soft drinks by executive decree (a procedure that Mr Carazo has always bitterly criticized).

We should note here that if President Carazo had taken this action to generate funds towards mid-1979, it would have not unnecessarily prompted last year's larger budget deficit, but unfortunately his sense of timing was off. This was the second fiscal error committed by the current administration, thanks to the stolid passivity of the government party contingent in Congress and to the poor timing of the people in the administration. Instead of looking for solutions other than just printing money without backing, instead of waiting patiently for their own deputies to pass the unsuccessful tax package and instead of doing nothing when the Legislative Assembly made its decision, administration officials accepted the defeat that their own party members, their own deputies inflicted on them. They then reacted by blaming the entire Legislative Assembly, hurrying to the Central Bank and giving instructions to the executive president and the other members of the Board of Directors to issue, without backing, the monies needed to cover the pay boosts for civil servants.

Once again the current administration unfortunately took the wrong road, which in the end turned out to be the most convenient for it but the most costly to the country. And once again, instead of showing a creative, rational and imaginative approach, as ought to characterize a government in the straits in which we were at the time, it again blamed the Oduber administration for all of its troubles.

Cut in Revenue

The very liberal policy that the current administration adopted with regard to tax cuts and exemptions became its third fiscal blunder. Pursuing a policy of tax revenue cuts at a time when the country is sailing in waters fraught with serious problems is folly. This is another mistake in timing. In fact, it seems incredible that after having created an enormous budget deficit and being unable to cut public expenditures, it would have occurred to them to reduce tax revenue while carrying on a campaign of multipurpose activities, some of them quite remarkable. Let us take a look at some examples.

Ordering a cut in the tax on luxury imported items is unthinkable at a time of fiscal and balance of payments crisis. This should have occurred to the current administration at a more opportune time, but unfortunately the move occurred to it at the worst time.

Faced with demands by civil servants, the current administration also was forced to boost income tax deductions at an ill-advised moment, without the Legislative Assembly having passed an offsetting fiscal measure.

It should have thought of other forms of compensation and other solutions that would not have brought on a drop in current revenue when it most needed it. The policy of government revenue reduction, simultaneously with the application of a new, neoliberal economic model that has had a direct impact on the productive sector and domestic output, has resulted in a falloff in economic activity in Costa Rica and, therefore, a major drop in government revenue. The rate of increase in current government receipts in 1979 was the lowest of at least the last 10 years.

The current administration made another mistake in the approach it took to Carazo's first tax package. It seems incredible that they let a year pass without negotiating the passage of that package with the Legislative Assembly. It seems incredible that the 27 Unity Party deputies in the Legislative Assembly were unable to reach an agreement. It seems incredible that they did not converse with each opposition political group represented in Congress to determine common ground, to find alternative solutions and to negotiate a more balanced proposal. It seems incredible that a whole year has passed during which the administration has been unconcerned about reviving its tax package, knowing that it would be faced with a budget deficit of more than 3 billion colones in 1980. It seems incredible that they forgot about the tax package when they accepted the pay boost for civil servants. It seems incredible that they have taken such a passive attitude towards this matter when they are faced with so many accumulated problems in just 2 years in office.

Another Mistake

This attitude will probably lead them into another mistake. In fact, when the president of the republic was in France and Belgium, the current administration overnight substituted a new tax package for the old one.

It was substituted immediately after the president sent a string of letters urging the passage of the first tax package to rescue the country from the crisis into which they have plunged us since the outset of this government of economic blunders and deception. We know that the government, having made so many wrong decisions, has all too often been faced with a cash problem in covering its day-to-day expenses. Having exhausted all of the legal and standard procedures that the government has always had for financing itself, they let their financial imagination run wild and discovered "bank petroleum." This new and bottomless source of easy financing for the government has turned out to be very costly to all Costa Ricans.

The government of the republic, the present administration, the Carazo administration has decided to open up the black well of "bank petroleum" that the Central Bank has available, to fill the wide fiscal gap that Carazo's incompetence and lack of foresight has broadened in a little over a year. With the executive president of the Central Bank and its Board of Directors looking complacently on, they began using "bank petroleum." On account of the Central Bank's lack of authority to oppose this inflationary method of financing, which is so dangerous for the national economy and for all Costa Ricans, an unprecedently large sum of inflationary funding was utilized in 1979.

The Central Bank approved and the present administration utilized more than 2 billion colones in "bank petroleum," which fueled the fires of inflation and depressed domestic production. The Central Bank's complacent attitude, as well as its meager technical and scientific authority, became the fifth fiscal policy blunder of the present administration.

In these two articles I have highlighted the main fiscal mistakes that the Carazo administration has committed in less than 2 years. As we have seen, these mistakes were due to poor timing, excessive institutional acquiescence and placing political interests before technical decision-making, all of them staged in a scenario that helped to confuse and deceive public opinion.

[Text] Underspending the Budget

The underspending of the budget is one of the topics that the present administration has talked most about. In almost all of his speeches, messages and declarations, the president of the republic highlights as one of his government's main accomplishments the sizable unspent government funds over the 2 years that he has been in office, thanks to orders issued by him and faithfully carried out by his finance minister.

The last time that he stressed this was in the speech that he delivered to the Chamber of Commerce of the Americas on 22 May 1980, stating: "My administration has taken a series of anti-inflation economic policy measures to combat inflationary pressures...The most important measure has been reduced government expenditures by underspending the budget to the tune of 1.0243 billion colones in 1978 and 1.2848 billion in 1979, a total of 2.3091 billion colones in just 20 months..."

By repeating these figures so often and with such assurance, but without explaining where they come from, he has apparently been able to deceive and surprise many people. Furthermore, every time that the chief executive talks about the billions of unspent colones, he never mentions how much he really spent that year, much less what the unspent sum consists of.

In point of fact, if we examine the source and the significance of these figures, we come to the conclusion that he has not spoken the truth and that he attempted to deceive the members of the Chamber of Commerce of the Americas and public opinion in general. The large sum of unspend budgetary funds that President Carazo has repeatedly talked about is based on information supplied by his finance minister and represents one more attempt at deception by his administration, complementing the long string of falsehoods that he uttered during his entire election campaign.

A Look at the Numbers

Having said this, we should now take a look at these figures in the light of an impartial and independent source of information, the General Comptrollership of the Republic, which is not subject to the influence of the presidential palace.

Page 26 of the Annual Report of the Comptrollership (Monitoring Government Finances) indicates the following: "We should point out that total authorized expenditures for the fiscal year amounted to 8.2635 billion colones, of which 875.5 million were transferred to the 1980 budget because these funds are for projects to be carried out over more than one fiscal year. As a result of this transfer of funds to the immediately subsequent fiscal year, authorized outlays for 1979 totaled 7.388 billion colones, 409.2 million of which were not spent, as indicated previously." In addition, the 1978 Annual Report of the Comptrollership says the following on page 21: "We should point out that of total authorized expenditures of 6.7708 billion colones, 681.3 million were transferred to the 1979 budget; thus, the appropriation for fiscal year 1978 totals 6.0895 billion. Of this amount, as was indicated, the aforementioned sum (343.1 million colones) was not spent."

These two excerpts clearly show that the underspent sum cited by the president is not correct, inasmuch as it includes amounts that are not exactly expenditure savings; they are, instead, funds that have to be carried over to the next year because they are financing projects taking more than one fiscal year. What a way for a president to "inform" Costa Rican public opinion and foreign executives residing in our country. The truth is that the economies practiced by the Carazo administration totaled just 409 million in 1979 and 343 million in 1978, never the 2.3091 billion colones publicly claimed by the president.

Now that we have demonstrated this, we should analyze more closely the amounts that were really spent over the last 2 years and make the necessary adjustments to compare them with the 2 previous years.

The table below has been drawn up on the basis of the annual reports of the General Comptrollership of the Republic; it illustrates how much of the federal budget was spent from 1976 to 1979.

The National Budget, Authorizations and Expenditures (in millions of colones)

	1976	1977	1978	1979
1. Authorized budget	4,191	5,012	6,771	8,264
2. Budget spending	3,630	4,198	5,606	6,849
3. Unspent amount	561	814	1,165	1,415
4. Breakdown of unspent sum:
i) Monies not spent	139	168	343	409
ii) Monies carried over to subsequent fiscal year	422	646	822	1,006

Source: General Comptrollership of the Republic and the Finance Ministry

Erroneous Information

Based on this table, we can make the following principal remarks: First, it is not true that there was sizable underspending of the budget as announced by the president of the republic on 1 May 1979 and 1 May 1980 to the Legislative Assembly, the other branches of the government and the foreign diplomatic corps stationed in Costa Rica, and as reiterated to the Chamber of Commerce of the Americas on 22 May 1980. Unspent funds totaled just 343 and 409 million colones in 1978 and 1979, respectively. In other words, in a bid to show that he was keeping the promise that he had so often made, first during the campaign and then in office, he was forced to inflate the unspent sum more than threefold.

Second, in order to inflate the unspent sum, they had to avail themselves of the funds that they had to carry over to subsequent fiscal years, since they represented financing of projects to be completed over more than 1 year. These carryovers are not and have never been expenditure savings ordered by the president and faithfully implemented by his finance minister. They have merely resulted from the requirements of projects under construction.

Third, what has indeed been large is the total budget actually spent by the current administration, which has boosted outlays to the record figure of 5.606 billion colones in 1978 and to 6.849 billion colones in 1979, which represent yearly increases of 33 and 22 percent, respectively, whereas the rise in 1977 was only 16 percent. What Mr Carazo advocated as a candidate and what he is doing now as president are unquestionably two quite different things.

Fourth, if budgetary underspending in 1978 and 1979 totaled just 343 and 409 million colones, as the annual reports of the Comptrollership of the Republic clearly confirm, the "enormous efforts" made by the Executive Branch to curb public spending were very meager indeed.

In fact, it seems that these much-touted efforts were nothing more than wishful thinking on the part of the president.

Fifth, it would not surprise anyone if at the end of 1980 the present administration announced that it has underspent the budget by more than 1.7 billion colones, since it will have found a way to inflate the authorized federal budget and to include in the total amounts that it must carry over to 1981 and 1982 to finance projects under construction. Once again they will be endeavoring to deceive and confuse public opinion and, of course, international organizations.

Sixth, if the Oduber administration had wanted to deceive Costa Ricans, as the present administration is now doing, it could have asserted that it had saved 814 million colones in 1977, but unfortunately it would have been lying.

[Part VIII, 17 Aug 80, p 10A]

[Text] Financing the Budget Deficit

There are three traditional ways to calculate the government's budget deficit. The first is to use total expenditures, including extra-budgetary outlays. The second is to use total actual expenditures, and the third is to use total budgeted expenditures.

No matter which of these three methods we employ, we can readily draw the conclusion that the fiscal problem got out of hand for President Carazo. All of this was due to the decisions that the current administration made in working out its economic policy and to the mistakes it made in handling public finances, such as the ones I mentioned in preceding articles and the ones I will discuss in this and subsequent commentaries. This is one of the main reasons why the chief executive chose to stage a wideranging publicity campaign, utilizing all of the mass media available to him, to make people believe that all of the ills and problems arising in just 2 years of his administration were due solely and exclusively to the Oduber administration. How easy it is to blame others when one discovers that one is incapable of coping with the most routine, basic obligations of every government.

Table 1 shows the government's budget deficit, including extra-budgetary outlays.

Budget Deficit of the Government of Costa Rica (millions of colones)

3. Budget deficit	1,634	1,573	2,228	3,948

Source: General Comptrollership of the Republic

Magnitude of the Deficit

We can clearly see that the federal budget deficit totaled almost 4 billion colones in 1979, with spending at 8.441 billion colones. We can also see that the deficit fell in 1977 and that it was starting in 1978, with the new government's economic policy, that Costa Rica's fiscal situation deteriorated markedly. As I explained in previous articles, the mistakes made by this administration, not the Oduber government, are to blame for our worsening public finances. The current administration has obviously not succeeded in cutting public expenditures, as it had promised; on the contrary, it has boosted them substantially by applying fiscal measures that are not backed by sound, anti-inflationary resources.

I explained in previous articles that this government's main fiscal error in 1978 was having sent the Legislative Assembly a proposal to expand the budget by 800 million colones to cover increased pay and other shortfalls that year. It financed these extra outlays solely with a bond issue, instead of turning to the tax revenue proposal that the Oduber administration had drawn up or instead of preparing another alternative.

The misguided approach taken by the present administration cost Costa Rica a budget deficit increase in the range of the 800 million deficit that the budget in question contained. The very same increase in the deficit has logically been sustained in subsequent years, inasmuch as the budgetary revenue that this administration, not the Oduber administration, chose came in only once whereas the outlays that it authorized recur every year. This was one of the most serious mistakes that this administration made in 1978, and all Costa Ricans have been paying for it since. If it had not committed this elementary blunder, the deficit would have been comparable to the previous years's but never larger than the one we had anticipated in the objectives of the economic plan, which were set forth in November 1977 for the next year.

Table 2 shows the budget deficit based on a comparison of current revenue and total actual expenditures.

Improper Measures

This table also leads one to the same conclusion as the previous one: on the one hand, that the deficit began to shrink in 1977 and, on the other, that the deficit expanded as of 1978. But what I am now interested in demonstrating is that the current administration, in addition to having increased public spending, made serious economic and fiscal policy errors that had an adverse impact on tax revenue. I term this approach another of the serious blunders committed by this government.

Table 2 shows that current revenue increased from 4.111 to 4.344 billion colones from 1978 to 1979. This is an increase of just 5.6 percent, whereas in previous years during the decade the rate hovered between 17 and 40 percent. As I mentioned in a previous article, the main reason for the marked deterioration in public sector revenue in 1979 was the Carazo administration's policy of cutting duties on unessential imports, of granting tax exemptions that should have been tried at a more opportune time, of agreeing to higher personal income tax deductions, of contracting economic activity and output and of instituting high interest rates, which led to a postponement of timely tax payments. These are just a few examples of its misguided and poorly timed decisions at a juncture characterized by serious fiscal troubles.

As the growth rate of its revenue fell abruptly, the present government was faced with a mounting cash deficit, which it initially chose to cope with by using treasury bills. But once it had utilized all of the treasury bills permitted by law, the Executive Branch discovered a very expeditious system of issuing currency. Given the obliging attitude on the part of the Central Bank Board of Directors and executive president, this system yielded the administration magnificent results from the standpoint of irresponsibly managing public finances, jeopardizing the country's future economic life and pulling it into the clutches of the present inflationary trend. This "scientific" system of issuing currency, which we have called "bank petroleum," enabled the Carazo administration to come up with more than 2 billion colones, issued by the Central Bank, to purchase an equal amount of government bonds.

In 1980, hearing the harsh criticism that all circles were leveling at the Executive Branch for pursuing the unpopular "bank petroleum" policy, this administration chose a new tack, which guarantees an inflow of cash by obliging autonomous institutions to purchase government bonds with their own funds from the Finance Ministry. The insatiable voracity that the current administration has clearly demonstrated is going to totally erode the assets of the decentralized institutions by stripping them of close to 1.1 billion colones, which instead of being earmarked for scheduled investments or social programs, will now be used to cover the mounting, unrestrained outlays of the present administration.

Public institutions will have an even larger financial problem to cope with over the next few months because their current accounts have been frozen and centralized in the Central Bank through the creation of an Equalization Fund aimed at having them buy more and more government bonds. Estimates are that this new method of monetary extraction imposed by the Carazo administration will make possible the purchase of some 700 million colones worth of bonds. The paradoxical thing about this affair is that the creation of the Equalization Fund was a minor element in the creation of the Budgetary Authority, but it now turns out that it was the primary and most important point. Furthermore, funds that ought to be earmarked to finance the production activities needed for the country's development will now have to be used to purchase more government bonds. Access to the funds of the state's decentralized institutions will be a new source of millions of colones for the government, as "bank petroleum" was in 1979.

[Text] Liberal Economists and Credit Policy

In credit as well as in fiscal policy we find dramatic examples of politically inspired trial-and-error methods, irresponsible improvisation, economic blunders and deliberate deception of public opinion. From the outset of the Carazo administration a new caste of young liberal economists has controlled the axis around which the country's monetary and credit policy revolves: the Central Bank and the ministries of economy and finance. This development marked the beginning of the "new economic model" and the end of our economic growth this decade. To paraphrase Churchill, it was not the end of the beginning but the beginning of the end.

"In the past the government made exaggerated use of bank credit, thus depriving farmers, industrialists and Costa Ricans in general of the loans that they needed," said President Carazo in his first televised speech on 17 August 1978. The president could employ these same words today to explain to Costa Ricans the results of his last 2 years in office. His administration has unquestionably made exaggerated and unprecedented use of bank credit, thus depriving farmers, industrialists and all Costa Ricans in general of the loans they need.

The Central Bank

It is sad to see how the Central Bank, adopting a submissive attitude and abandoning its traditional technical conscientiousness, has repeatedly resorted to the press (for example, LA NACION, 9 September 1979; and LA REPUBLICA, 20 September 1979 and 20 May 1980) in a bid to show that "the Central Bank has pursued a suitable credit policy for the private sector, enabling commercial banks to continue spurring this sector, which is the most dynamic element in our economy" and that "the increased financing for the public sector has not cut down on the financing earmarked for private business."

I will not take the time here to point out the statistical tinkering that the Central Bank engaged in to distort the facts in its press articles because I do not want to offend those who might feel some embarrassment for having authorized them. I will simply present the figures of the Central Bank itself so that Costa Ricans can draw their own conclusions.

The table below shows the increases in credit granted to the private and public sectors and within the former to production sectors in 1978 and 1979. It also lists each sector's share in the total rise in credit. The year 1978 is included as an element of comparison because credit that year was governed basically by the Oduber administration's last credit program, The new Board of Directors of the Central Bank modified the financing system in October 1978, and it was not until 1979 that we saw the effects of these measures and of the first credit program drawn up by the new technical economists now entrenched in the Central Bank.

The numbers in the table point unmistakably to two facts. First, whereas in 1978 two-thirds of the credit increase was earmarked to the private sector (64 percent) and only one-third to the public sector (36 percent), 1 year later the situation was totally reversed, and the private sector received only one-third of loans granted, while almost 3 billion colones (more than 3 times the previous year's amount) went to finance the outlays of the public sector. Second, the rise in credit to the public sector was at the expense of production sector financing, which after accounting for 43.7 percent of the 1978 credit increase, fell last year to just 17.7 percent. Such was the disregard for production sectors that in 1979 they were granted 30 percent less credit in absolute terms than the year before.

Hardest Hit Sectors

Note, in particular, that farming and industry were the sectors hardest hit by the "new credit policy." Loans to them increased barely half as much as in 1978, and these major sectors were assigned just 10.1 percent of the total rise in credit in 1979. Furthermore, loans to "other segments" of the private sector (headed by commerce, services, personal loans and construction) increased at the same pace as total credit, and therefore they received 53 percent of the credit expansion for the private sector.

In other words, not only was insufficient credit earmarked for the private sector, but what was granted went mainly to finance activities that do not help boost our output and, on the contrary, do encourage consumption and imports, thus worsening the critical balance of payments situation that this administration has gotten us into.

The truth about the "new credit policy" formulated by the "Chicago Boys" and backed by President Carazo is this: production sectors, the underpinning of our development, receive only 17.7 percent of the rise in credit, whereas the government garners 62.3 percent and earmarks the rest for financing consumption. This is the importance that it attaches to production efforts in its scale of values, and the consequences of this policy can be seen in higher prices and lower production, as demonstrated in other articles in this series.

In the next article I will analyze the Carazo administration's financial policies and its attempts to abolish and discredit the nationalized banking industry.

[Part X, 19 Aug 80, p 10A]

[Text] Attacks on Nationalized Banking

The platform of the coalition that ran in the 1978 elections under the name of the Unity Party called for a renewed and strengthened attack on nationalized banking by its traditional enemies. But as strange coincidence would have it, under the Carazo administration the personal profit-making zeal of those who want bank business for themselves or wish to surrender it to foreign capital has been complemented by the theoretical justifications of the prophets of economic liberalism. We must not forget that liberalism is not just an economic doctrine; it is also a system that in its zeal to perpetuate the privileges it grants to the strongest economic power groups, penetrates and undermines the existing institutional structure. The Carazo administration's financial policy revolves around this duo of "speculators-liberal economists," and its main objectives are to strengthen private banking and to abolish and discredit nationalized banking.

The administration attempted to bolster foreign and domestic private banks in late June through an intricate strategy consisting of two basic steps: first, decontrolling interest rates and the credit portfolios of banks and private finance companies, and second, abolishing state banks by allowing private banks to operate free from controls.

Measures Adopted

The first step was taken in October 1978, under the pretext of modernizing the national banking system and making its deposit and loan operations more streamlined and flexible. The real intention became known a few days later when the fathers of the "financial system modernization" disavowed the bizarre creature that they had spawned and, arguing that it was an experiment gone wrong, decided to get rid of it. We Costa Ricans never dreamed that we would have a Dr Frankenstein in our Central Bank. The problem is that like the terrifying legend, the monster is on the loose and can cause serious harm to our people. Private finance companies would thus have free rein to profit from the people's money, as the hands of state-run banks would be tied.

Complementing this now flourishing speculation, the administration implemented a series of measures to financially and economically strangle our nationalized banks, while launching a publicity drive to discredit them. To achieve this end, it availed itself of the Central Bank, which used to be the policy-making body of the nationalized banking system and which has now become the main tool of those who wish to destroy it.

The Central Bank has moved to financially strangle state banks by a series of measures that include 100 percent reserve requirements on time deposits in dollars, the fastest growing category; freezing direct foreign credit to state banks; reducing the amount that these banks can rediscount at the Central Bank; the Executive Branch's imposition of massive modifications programs on commercial banks, and the creation of the famous Budgetary Authority and the Financial Equalization Fund, which are nothing but an elaborate excuse for the Federal Government to get its hands on the bank accounts of autonomous institutions.

All of these measures have drained away the available funds of state commercial banks for financing purposes, which has prompted sharp restrictions in loans for production over the last 18 months.

Economic Suffocation

Furthermore, the Central Bank is economically suffocating state-run banks by making their funds more expensive and, at the same time, by forcing them to lend at subsidized interest rates. As a prominent liberal economist stated at a seminar on nationalized banking at the Legislative Assembly, the objective is to abolish it by causing the foundation of its financial backing, demand deposits, to disappear or shrink considerably. It is with this in mind that the Central Bank freed interest rates on loans and deposits in October 1978. The results were not long in coming and can be starkly seen in the table below.

Commercial Divisions of Banks (total deposits as of February of each year, in millions of colones)

Deposits	1977		1980
	Amount	%	Amount	%
Demand deposits (checking accounts and savings accounts)	3.7884	60.3	6.1741	50.7
in colones	3.4724	55.3	5.4228	44.5

Total	6.2845	100.0	12.1775	100.0

Source: Central Bank of Costa Rica, Weekly Economic Report, 14 March 1980.

The numbers show how in less than 2 years the Central Bank managed to decrease from 60.3 to 50.7 percent the share of relatively inexpensive deposits, demand deposits, in total deposits. At the same time, the exorbitant interest rates paid on time deposits caused them to rise from 34.8 percent of total deposits in February 1978 to 45.2 percent in February 1980. This trend, which had been in evidence previously, but at a much slower pace, intensified so much as of October 1978 that today time deposits account for a greater share of bank funds than checking account deposits. This means that commercial bank funds have become significantly more expensive as a result of the Central Bank measures.

But this was not, in itself, enough to suffocate the nationalized banking industry. It had to be forced, at the same time, to lend at subsidized interest rates, even though the Central Bank announced pompously in its 1978 Annual Report that such rates "distort and hamstring social economic development" (page 27) and that the bank "abolished the use of subsidized interest rates as a development tool" (page 31). The fact of the matter is that in 1979 more than half of the loans granted by bank commercial divisions were at subsidized interest rates. But the stark inconsistency between the two policies, with interest rates on deposits up to 10 points higher than interest rates on loans, made the business of siphoning off credit so attractive that a large portion of the loans granted to production sectors was probably diverted into speculative activities that do not benefit the country at all.

Consequences

The consequences of these policies were not long in coming. Credit has been insufficient, and a rapid trend towards nationalized banking disinvestment has begun. But since the goal is to abolish not just suffocate nationalized banks, the Central Bank has undertaken, parallel to its other moves, a costly publicity campaign to discredit state commercial banks, a campaign reminiscent of another that Costa Ricans still remember.

For several months now we have heard the Central Bank announcing patriotically every day on every radio station that it has allocated many hundreds of millions of colones to the agricultural and livestock sector, thus creating the impression that this money is available for lending, when in reality it was already loaned to farmers by state banks under the credit program that the Central Bank formulated. The intent is clear: when peasant farmers, ranchers or growers get to the bank counters and discover that there are no funds, they will assume that the commercial banks do not want to loan the millions that the Central Bank allotted to them. What a despicable way to deceive the people!

I should highlight another point that emerges from the figures in the table. Deposits in dollars are increasing at a much faster pace than deposits in colones. Whereas in 1977 only 12.3 percent of deposits were in dollars, 2 years later the proportion jumped to 20 percent. This shows that we are seeing a trend towards the "dollarization" of our economy, resulting from the uncertainty and chaos created by the Carazo administration in the economic and labor spheres. The public has lost faith in our currency and, lured by high interest rates, would rather invest in dollars.

In addition, the Central Bank found it very expeditious to attract speculative foreign capital to make up for its inability to maintain a sound foreign exchange position. In June it made short-range commitments of more foreign exchange than it had available, and therefore the net reserves of the Central Bank went into the red. But as in everything else, instead of facing up to reality and explaining the situation to the nation, the Central Bank resorted to cover-ups and statistical tinkering and ordered that from now on only gross reserves figures would be made public, since these exclude liabilities in foreign currency. It is as if a company mentioned only total assets, not liabilities, in its balance sheet. Once again a person must ask himself: Whom are they trying to kid?

[Text] The "Secret Document" of the IMF

As I indicated in one of my initial articles, towards the close of my administration I ordered all ministries and public institutions to take stock of their situations so that we could determine what we had achieved and the goals that still remained. In the monetary sphere, the Central Bank prepared a document in early 1978 on the national economic situation, with particular emphasis on the results up to 1977, the prospects for 1978 and the measures that should be taken to consolidate the favorable economic conditions that the country had achieved as of 1977.

The preparation of this document coincided with the visit of the International Monetary Fund mission, which the Central Bank had requested at the time, to assess the country's economy. In March 1978 the IMF mission concluded its study and also drew up a report, which analyzed Costa Rica's economic situation up to 1977, looked into the prospects for 1978 and 1979 and suggested a number of different policy measures. I must point out that this report never reached my hands.

Conscientiousness and Politics

The IMF has always been known as a highly esteemed, conscientiousness technical institution, but as everywhere, some of its officials like to play politics, thus sacrificing the technical side. The IMF mission that visited us in early 1978 was guilty of that sin. Even though we were the ones who invited it, from the beginning the mission curried favor with the new officials appointed by President-elect Carazo, who were interested in discrediting the performance of my administration and apparently influenced the mission into writing a report that, when published by the IMF, they could use as technical backing for the political assault that they began launching against my administration as of 8 May 1978.

Two years after the report was issued, which a number of government party deputies called a "state secret," the president of the republic still refers to the points in it that he can reap the most political benefit from, with the surprising, tacit approval of the Central Bank, which under the present administration has been reduced to the barest of utterances.

Seeing that their policies have been unsuccessful, the "Carazo-young neoliberal economists" team, the promoters of the "new economic order," are concealing their failures by blaming the problems inherited from the past and using the IMF report to support their arguments.

In one of his many messages to the Legislative Assembly to pressure deputies into passing the tax package, President Carazo recently threatened to devalue the colon, reminding them that the IMF had cautioned in the oft-mentioned "secret document" submitted in March 1978 that "...if immediate measures are not taken, the government will probably have to devalue the colon no later than 1979..."

I think that neither public opinion nor the deputies deserve to be deceived, much less so in the way that the current administration is doing. I will now analyze the core aspects of the IMF "secret document": the prospects for 1978 and 1979 and its policy recommendations.

Growth

As far as the outlook is concerned, the fund assumes initially, based on the good performance of domestic production in 1976 and 1977, that the GDP will show real growth of six percent in 1978 and 1979 and that the inflation rate will be nine and seven percent, respectively.

Within this frame of reference, the IMF officials reach the following main conclusions regarding needed policy measures:

1) The gap between domestic supply and demand will widen since the presistent high demand of the private sector will be reinforced by the demand pressures generated by the expansionary trend in fiscal policy, to the extreme that the gap will represent 10 percent of the GDP in 1978 and 12 percent in 1979; 2) even with a sudden rise in foreign loans, the inflow of net capital will not be enough to finance the current account deficit of the balance of payments, which will increase from $219 million dollars in 1977 to $419 million in 1978 and $577 million in 1979; 3) as a result of this situation, there would be a loss of net international monetary reserves of $100 million in 1978 and $200 million in 1979, which would mean a reserves drop of more than $300 million between June 1978 and December 1979, and 4) the fund projected a budget deficit of 1.568 billion colones for 1978, but it did not give a projection for 1979 because it did not know what kind of expenditures and revenue policy the new administration was going to pursue. In any case, the report notes that only 743 million colones from the national banking system should be used to finance the deficit.

Note that these estimates are based on a worst case scenario: "...if suitable measures are not taken immediately to prevent the national economic situation from deteriorating..." The fund underscores the urgency of these measures by stating in its report that "...the ideal thing would be for them to be adopted during the transition period until May 1978, but a decision cannot be postponed much past mid-year..." (Do you think that this assertion could have just occurred to the fund officials, or was it perhaps a suggestion by the officials that President Carazo had just appointed?)

The IMF report goes on to say that "...the imbalance between exports and imports could be so large that an adjustment to satisfy needs at a given moment might not be achievable without resorting to a change in the value of the colon, along with a longer-term economic stabilization program. If immediate steps are not taken, the government will probably have to devalue the colon no later than 1979, and by that time the necessary adjustment will be much more difficult to accomplish."

Persuasion

We can infer from the way in which these recommendations are worded and from the insistence on certain dates that the IMF mission was persuaded to write them by the newly appointed officials, who wished to stage a political and, therefore, fictitious, groundless devaluation. The IMF report itself, the "secret document," tells us the reason why. By the end of December 1977, net international monetary reserves stood at $232.5 million, and a $50 million increase was projected from December 1977 to June 1978. According to the fund mission itself, this would put reserves at $282.5 million, enough to finance almost 3 months of imports. (I should point out that when I left the office of president on 8 May 1978, foreign exchange reserves stood at more than $350 million.) The fund went on to say that "...a change in the value of the colon would be necessary because of poorly managed demand, not because of cost pressures."

Any layman, not to mention President Carazo and his economic mandarins, would realize the absurdity of recommending a devaluation of the colon in March 1978 when the country had reserves of $232.5 million and when, thanks to existing economic policies, an additional $50 million was expected by June of that year. The numbers in the IMF "secret document" prove this. Given this foreign exchange boom, my administration obviously could not accept the IMF's capricious recommendation 1 short month before the end of its term of office.

We did, however, agree that the colon would have to be devalued if measures were not taken as of 8 May 1978 and if everything that the fund predicted was allowed to happen: "...a loss in net international monetary reserves of around $350 million from June 1978 to December 1979."

By failing to pursue suitable and timely policies, the current administration has lost those $350 million, has negative monetary reserves, has foreign exchange commitments of more than $50 million and has sworn solemnly not to devalue the colon. How then could we have accepted the recommendations of the IMF in March 1978? The answer is clear and conclusive.

[Part XII, 21 Aug 80, p 10A]

[Text] Who Should Have Carried Out the IMF Proposals

The immediate measures that the IMF recommended in the "secret document" and that should not "be postponed much past mid-year" (1978, of course), can be summarized as follows: a) reduce the aggregate demand of both the public and private sectors; b) immediately reassess the programs of the Federal Government and the autonomous institutions, while pursuing a much more conservative policy in Executive Branch transfers to the decentralized agencies, in order to cut public sector spending; c) boost consumption and sales taxes, improve the tax collection system and reassess the system of exemptions; d) tighten credit to the public and private sectors, in addition forcing the private sector to become self-financing and to incur more foreign obligations, while imposing stricter standards for commercial bank loans requested by private enterprise; e) modify the policy for setting interest rates, and f) gradually eliminate redeemable government bonds.

In addition to these measures, the fund recommended a complete reassessment of the public sector revenue and expenditures policy as part of a stand-by financial program. Among its main functions, the IMF also sells stand-by programs in order to exert greater control over the economies of developing countries and thus raise more money for itself, because when all is said and done, it too is a lending agency.

Nothing New

As we can see, the steps recommended by the fund were nothing novel, but for obvious reasons they could not be implemneted between the end of March and 8 May 1978. For example, public sector outlays could not be immediately reassessed when a new administration was about to take office. The logical thing would be to let the new administration issue the policy measures it deemed most appropriate, in keeping with its election campaign platform. Likewise, I was not going to order or propose new taxes a scant 38 days from the close of my term of office just because the fund recommended that in its "state-secret document," as government party deputies dignified it. In this case as well, it was up to the new administration to set forth the guidelines for tax matters.

The above should not be construed as meaning that my administration sat idly by. As I commented in a previous article, at that time we had an economic program for 1978 and another for the 1978-1982 period, which could have been implemented opportunely to offset the adverse impact that a fall in world coffee prices and other similar developments were to have on the national economy. Moreover, as far as taxes are concerned, in 1976 my administration had requested ECLA to work together with us in conducting a comprehensive assessment of Costa Rica's tax system and, in light of this study, to prepare for an overhauling of the tax structure.

ECLA completed the study in early 1978, and in April at a public ceremony held at the Presidential Palace I personally gave a copy of the study to the finance minister-designate, explaining to him that it was the result of a major effort by national and international experts and that it could serve as the basis for revamping our country's tax system. I do not know what became of the study. To judge by subsequent developments and the exclusively fiscal tax packages that fared so poorly in the Legislative Assembly, it must have been filed away.

Furthermore, my administration could not in April 1978 adopt the tight credit policies that the IMF recommended (which would have meant revamping the monetary program that had been worked out in December 1977 and that had been in effect just 3 months), because in a few short days the Central Bank Board of Directors would be completely different, and it could logically be expected to chart its own course for monetary and credit policy.

Whose Responsibility

These clear and practical examples show that it was not up to my administration to adopt over a period of 38 days all of the policies recommended by the IMF in March 1978. On the contrary, it was instead up to Mr Carazo and his new team of economic prophets, alchemists and mandarins to adopt them if they fit into their government program. We must remember that they were perfectly familiar with the IMF "secret document," laying eyes on it at the same time as or before we did, and that they apparently even influenced it for their own benefit with the acquiescence of certain international officials.

The public must recall once again that in February 1978, after Mr Carazo had been declared president-elect, I made the entire public administration available to him and issued instructions to inform the newly appointed officials of the progress that had been made in implementing programs and policies in their respective departments. Thus, in March 1978 the president-elect accepted my offer, and Guillermo Gonzalez Truque, the executive president designate, took up his office in the Central Bank and, on a daily basis, examined the national economic situation, interviewed Central Bank technicians belonging to his political party and requested several studies, one of them concerning the devaluation. In addition, as we all now know, Gonzalez Truque had the IMF report in his hands as of that March.

As we can see, this major deployment of officials designate and Gonzalez Truque's constant presence in the offices and corridors of the Central Bank led us to believe that as of 8 May 1978 Mr Carazo's administration would be implementing its government program, taking the necessary economic measures to guide the country along a road of economic and social tranquility and peace. Gonzalez Truque was in the position of an older person going back to school. In taking a written examination, he had been shown beforehand the possible questions and the answers to them so that he would pass and not be psychologically scarred for the rest of his life. But when it came time to take the exam, when the moment of truth arrived, he forgot the lesson, he forgot the questions and answers and he even forgot that he had under his arm the "crib sheets" that he had wisely prepared at home.

Witch Hunt

I do not have to highlight now what ensued. The Costa Rican people know the facts. Domestic producers know what ensued. Mr Carazo and his team of prophets and mandarins engaged in a ferocious witch hunt of Liberation Party members and, similar to what happens after a revolution or coup d'etat, dedicated themselves to obliterating every trace of the National Liberation Party in order to thus begin the "Carazo era." They lost valuable time with this witch hunt; they let the government drift and they later demonstrated that they were not and are not prepared to govern. Unfortunately for Costa Rica, the "Carazo era" has plunged the country into the worst social and economic crisis in its history.

In point of fact, because of the lack of clear-cut, timely and intelligent measures as of 8 May 1978, the economic situation in 1978 and 1979 was even gloomier than forecast by the IMF in the "secret document" that frightened several government party deputies, and things have gotten worse in 1980. We must remember that the GDP grew at a real rate of 5.5 percent in 1976 and 8.3 percent in 1977, whereas in 1978 it began dropping sharply, from 5.8 percent in 1978 to 4.3 percent in 1979, and the administration and the Central Bank have predicted a growth rate of just 1 percent for 1980.

In light of these figures we cannot but recall that in its "secret document" (discovered by Carazo) the IMF itself forecast growth of six percent for 1978 and 1979 if no immediate measures were taken by mid-year. In other words, if the Carazo administration had done nothing (the worst case scenario), domestic output would still have shown stable growth, thanks to the bouyancy that we had injected in previous years. But, unfortunately, they did something.

[Part XIII, 22 Aug 80, p 10A]

[Text] The Failure of the Agreement With the IMF

In March 1978, with all economic indicators at satisfactory levels, the IMF painted a gloomy economic picture and recommended that the government sign a stand-by agreement if it did not take the steps the fund suggested in the "secret report" that I have discussed in prior articles.

In order for all Costa Ricans to grasp the significance of signing a stand-by agreement with the IMF, I must make the following point clear: after the international monetary crisis of 1973 and its failure to prevent it, the fund reemerged strengthened in 1976 by the passage of the second amendment to its charter, which granted it wideranging powers to regulate countries' exchange systems and to impose stifling contractual conditions on them when they needed IMF financing.

Loans taken out with the IMF are currently the most burdensome because of these conditions. Therefore, countries resort to them when they are in dire straits, when the government realizes that it has been incapable of coming to grips with the economic situation and when the economy is on the verge of collapse, in other words, when a country and a government have no other choice but to resort to the IMF because foreign private banks would refuse it the credit. When a country is faced with an economic situation like Costa Rica's at the moment, private banks make it a main requirement that the government sign an agreement with the fund, to insure that it will undertake a serious revamping program and that they will recover their money. Furthermore, in the world of international credit IMF loans have the most strings attached, because they restrict and impair the economic sovereignty of nations by setting limits on their economic and social development and by transferring de facto control of national economies to Washington.

Medal of Ineptitude

Now that I have made this point clear, I should note that Mr Carazo's administration, anxious to win awards, set out to win the Olympic medal of ineptitude and after 18 months of irresponsible training, while breaking all records for inefficiency, it earned the coveted prize, in Washington, not Moscow. It won the IMF's stand-by medal. Incapable of even maintaining the sound economic situation that it inherited on 8 May 1978, the Unity Party administration was finally forced to admit to the international financial community that it had brought the national economy to the brink of disaster and that its only salvation was to surrender Costa Rica's economic sovereignty to the IMF, to whose headquraters in Washington the finance minister travels every month to receive instructions as to what should or should not be done in economic, monetary, credit and fiscal matters.

Here then is an interesting paradox that we Costa Ricans ought to know about. Since 8 May 1978, the Unity Party administration, under the banner of a new neoliberal economic model and blandishing the sword of nonintervention, has bedeviled businessmen, harassed farmers, scared away investors, devastated consumers, encouraged speculators and, as a result of all this, in just 19 months demolished the Costa Rican economic system. In December 1979, after this calamitous endeavor had run its course, the Unity administration, submissive and defeated, sought the protection of the world's biggest interventionist overseer, the International Monetary Fund. Thus, the administration of nonintervention asked for intervention. What a contradictory administration! But at least we have the consolation that we can feel the difference, can't we?

Given the precarious economic situation at the time, the government then signed the stand-by agreement with the IMF. In exchange for $100 million in loans over 2 years, in quarterly installments, it agreed to a 1980 economic-financial stabilization program whose main objectives are the following: 1) improve the country's external standing by narrowing the gap between imports and exports; 2) drastically cut the public sector's credit requirements; 3) reduce aggregate demand; 4) maintain a suitable level of net reserves; 5) curb price increases, and 6) try to keep the current exchange rate.

Ceilings

The IMF's stabilization program called for and set ceilings on 1) the net internal assets of the Central Bank (in other words, curbing the bank's internal credit expansion); 2) net Central Bank loans to the non-financial public sector, and 3) the public sector's net foreign indebtedness flows.

Finally, and some people would say fortunately, in light of the irresponsibility of the current Unity Party administration, the IMF wanted to bring its wild experiment to a screeching halt, even if this were to bring us right to the brink, and everything for a few dollars more, as the title of the movie goes. Too bad about those $360 million in international monetary reserves that I left them with on 8 May 1978. By the way, what could have become of those $360 million that I left them in the Central Bank, plus the 600 million colones that I also left them in the National Treasury?

But that is not all. The government signed the stabilization program agreement, but returning to San Jose from Washington, the finance minister was fully convinced that the Unity administration would not be able to comply with the recently signed pact and that, therefore, it would not get the sought-after $100 million that the IMF offered it to alleviate the reserves shortfall over the next 2 years.

Before continuing, I should clarify that although they could not, in fact, comply with the IMF demands, the stand-by agreement enabled them to continue contracting sizable debts with private foreign banks, especially short-term loans (some people say as much as $300 million).

In this way the patient has been kept alive (albeit comatose) so far in 1980. The stand-by agreement also enabled them to put heavy pressure on the Legislative Assembly to force passage of the tax package that they had submitted various versions of, and ultimately to enact the executive decree calling for a general increase in the consumption tax to pay for government pay boosts.

The fact is that at no time has the Unity Party administration observed the ceilings set by the fund. The finance minister was quite right: it was impossible to comply with the agreement that he had signed just hours before. If he knew that the pledge was not going to be kept, why did he make the pledge? The goal of the Unity Party administration has been to deceive one and all alike.

Early last July, Lidiette Brenes de Charpentier, a conscientious journalist, told us in LA NACION that for the second straight time the government had broken the agreement it signed with the IMF. She cited the figures available as of 30 June 1980 to demonstrate this. A few days later, the finance minister contradicted her in the same paper, but only with regard to the numbers, because basically they were in agreement. Yes, it was true that the government had not kept its word. The reporter cited a figure in the millions, and the minister reduced it by a few dollars, but both confirmed that the Unity administration had failed to comply.

But there is more. What the public does not know is that as of 15 July 1980 the ceilings set by the IMF have been far exceeded, the first by $363 million and the second by $168 million.

Explanation for the Failure

The Central Bank argues that the Unity government has failed to comply with the IMF agreement because imports have risen rapidly and thus international monetary reserves have fallen sharply, because the government has required additional funding and because the credit granted the public sector has also helped to push imports higher.

Thus, the figures published by the Central Bank itself prove that the Unity administration has been unable to keep the commitments it made in the agreement with the IMF. The current administration thought that signing the agreement was the same as signing and endorsing a government program drafted to deceive the Costa Rican electorate. But this time the plan backfired on them. The IMF cannot be fooled by smiling faces on television or doctored numbers. The fund has begun tightening the screws on them. The finance minister has tried to fool them with creative accounting at the close of each quarter, but so far his sleight of hand has done him no good. The finance minister has been urgently called to Washington by his new bosses, to renegotiate the ceilings and bring back a few more dollars, but the most important reason for his trip is that private international banks want to ease up on their exposure in Costa Rica, because in light of the economic crisis that they have lately gotten us into, they have started to categorize us as an area of high financial risk.

We will have to wait and see what new commitments the Unity Party administration will incur so that foreign banks again turn on the dollar loan faucet for us and keep the patient alive. They are capable of doing anything internationally for a few dollars more. (In this instance, they already have quite a bit of experience with transferring foreign exchange.) Moreover, it would not surprise me if the Carazo administration, no longer able to blame the Oduber administration but continuing the tradition of the past 2 years, resorted to blaming the IMF for its failure to comply with agreement, arguing that the fund's officials did not properly calculate the ceilings or are unfamiliar with actual conditions in our country.

What a sad situation! Look at where this administration's ineptitude has gotten us! Surveying this situation, I find it hard to believe that this administration's economic mandarins, whose submissiveness, ineptitude and haughtiness have contributed to the chaos, ruin and uncertainty that prevail throughout the country, are still calmly going about their official tasks. None of them might be allowed to join any of the various Unity factions, because associating with the people who bear the burden of the total failure of the neoliberal model, which is no longer of any good even to Carazo, would mean catching the the disease of the Chicago Boys, whose symptoms are: harassing businessmen, national economic ruin, repressing industrialists, anguish for farmers and crushing burdens for consumers.

[Text] A Worsening Balance of Payments

Our balance of payments situation and the external stability of the colon have undergone a dramatic deterioration under the Unity Party administration, as a result of its irresponsible and misguided handling of economic policy.

The assault on production sectors, a basic objective of the new economic model of the current administration's mandarins, has brought a drop in domestic output, as I explained in the second article in this series. Remember that the growth of production sectors fell from 7.1 percent in 1977 to 0.9 percent in 1979 and that the rise in total domestic output dropped from 8.9 percent to 3.3 percent over the same 2 years.

This falloff in domestic output logically had to show up in the country's exports, whose rate of increase dropped sharply, along with foreign exchange, of course. According to Central Bank figures, exports rose by 20.2 percent in 1976 and by almost 40 percent in 1977, whereas in 1978, the first year of blunders, the rate was 7.6 percent, even though the unit value of exports was up 5 percent last year. The drop in export volume, due to the deterioration in production sectors, was what prompted the low rate of growth in foreign sales of our goods. As a matter of fact, the exportable output of bananas, cocoa and sugar shrunk; coffee was the only exception.

The smaller expansion in exports cannot be attributed to the turbulent situation in Central American countries either, as the government has been suggesting. Once again according to Central Bank figures, exports to Central America have remained steady, dropping only 1.1 percent in 1979. Furthermore, the drop in exports to Central America was offset, thanks to the buoyancy of the persecuted industrial sector, by exports to Panama and other areas outside our region.

Imports

Moreover, President Carazo and his Unity Party colleagues, some of whom are now washing their hands of the matter, pursued an irresponsible imports policy, with imports rising from $1.027 billion in 1977 to $1.413 billion in 1979. Imports jumped by $386 million in just 2 years, while imports were up only $101 million. The increase in imports was due basically to this administration's free imports policy, which was intensified in 1979 with a series of duty reductions. This was the government's third fiscal error, as I pointed out in my sixth article, and one of the many it made with regard to our balance of payments.

These higher foreign purchases were aggravated by the need to make up the shortfall in basic grains, which was caused by the administration's policy of ravaging production sectors and by the credit policy of financing consumption, not output.

The current Unity Party administration is pointing to oil prices as an excuse for the sharp rise in imports. They have indeed had some effect, but not nearly as much as it claims. According to figures furnished by ECLA, the unit value of imports rose by 10 percent in 1979 and by 6 percent in 1978. In contrast, in 1974, when oil prices soared, the unit value jumped 36 percent. Hence, the rise in oil prices is a poor scapegoat, especially since fuel imports account for barely 10 percent of total imports.

With exports at a standstill as a result of the neoliberal economic model of "financial aggression" and with imports skyrocketing on account of fiscal demagoguery and economic blunders, the current account deficit in the balance of payments has risen from $226 million in 1977 to almost $500 million in 1979, practically doubling in 2 years.

In this regard we should recall the predictions that the IMF made in its "secret report" of March 1978, which was coauthored by members of the Unity Party in a bid to prompt a devaluation during the initial months of their administration that could be blamed on my government. The "secret report" said that in the absence of "immediate policies, the current account deficit would rise from $219 million in 1977 to $557 million in 1979." The IMF deserves our recognition for having made an accurate prediction and for having assumed that the new administration would do nothing to preclude this from happening.

The current account deficit expressed as a function of exports rose from 27 percent in 1977 to 65 percent in 1979; in other words, our exports cover barely 35 percent of our imports. The deficit jumped from 7.3 to 14.4 percent of the gross domestic product over these same 2 years. These indicators clearly illustrate, in all its magnitude, the worsening economic situation in our country, thanks to the irresponsible actions of the new breed of economists and of the Unity Party administration, which have indeed been united in their blunders.

To cover this deficit in the current account of the balance of payments, the government has resorted to mass foreign indebtedness, which it had bitterly criticized during the election campaign. As the saying goes, he who finds fault commits two sins, except that in this instance the sin was much bigger. At the end of 1977 the public sector's foreign indebtedness totaled $833 million; by 1979, according to Central Bank statistics, it amounted to $1.345 billion. In other words, during these 2 years the overseas spending binge rose by $512 million, a sum equal to the total debt at the close of 1975.

Paradox

The paradoxical thing about this nine-figure shift is that we do not know what was done with these millions of dollars, because the government is almost without money, the National Banking System is issuing practically no new loans, and other major public institutions are also virtually bankrupt. Moreover, these same overseas debts were not enough to offset the current account deficit in our balance of payments, and the government of economic blunders and deception had to irresponsibly spend the country's international monetary reserves.

By December 1979 they had used up $115 million and, as all Costa Ricans know quite well, they have now squandered the $360 million that I left them as of 8 May 1980. In other words, they have spent $873 million between reserves and debts, and as the people say, "...you don't hear anything about it and you don't notice any difference," and I would add: "...you can't even see the money."

We Costa Ricans must realize that by the end of 1979 servicing the public sector's foreign debts cost almost $200 million, a $96 million increase since the close of 1977.

If we call to mind that exports over that period rose by just $101 million, then all of the country's production efforts, translated into a feeble increase in exports, went to pay for the new international spending spree by the Unity Party administration. This is why international banks have begun to close the credit windows on them and hence their desperate efforts to obtain the aid of the IMF, even though the price has been a surrender of Costa Rica's economic sovereignty and a major recession at home.

The external weakness of our currency is attributable to the irresponsible management of our balance of payments, not to the speculation that the second vice president of the Unity Party administration naively accuses Salvadorans and Guatemalans of. Always looking for excuses this government! Here is another that we can add to the five major alibis (as discussed in my first article) that this administration gives for its governmental incompetence.

Our worsening balance of payments and plummeting international monetary reserves, upshots of the misguided economic policies pursued over the past 2 years, are responsible for the current weakness of our currency. The colon is as good as devalued today.

[Part XV, 24 Aug 80, p 10A]

[Text] The Time Has Come To Set Things Straight

This is the last in a series of articles in which I have analyzed various facets of the national economic situation and explained the main reasons for the grave crisis that we are experiencing. The major conclusion to be drawn from this entire analysis is that the economic crisis into which we have been plunged over the last 2 years and the incipient breakdown of our institutions are basically due to the errors made by President Carazo and his administration, not to outside factors or inherited situations. This does not mean that everything was a bed of roses in May 1978 or that I am trying to ignore the structural problems that typify economies like ours.

Quite to the contrary; it is precisely these structural characteristics, such as foreign dependence and the vulnerability that that dependence entails; the importance of our agricultural sector; the expansion of the state and its functions beyond the increase in its revenue, and inadequate domestic savings to finance the investment projects needed for our continued development, that demand that our leaders have a clear view of where we are headed, detailed knowledge about our real capabilities and steadfast determination to mobilize all of the country's resources so that we can proceed resolutely towards a more prosperous, more free and more just Costa Rica.

At the Brink

We are protesting the current administration's incompetence, not its ideological roots; its attitude, not its social standing; its mistakes, not its legitimacy. In his search for headlines President Carazo has forgotten his most elementary responsibilities as a leader. The proposed programs for peace and the organization of caravans to Monimbo are now more important than boosting production and battling the scourge of inflation. While the president dreams overseas of establishing a University for Peace, the country awakens in an upheaval at the brink of an abyss that threatens to destroy its economic potential and shatter its social peace.

Peace cannot be achieved with fanciful proposals; it is built patiently with our daily actions and is nourished by respect for ideas and individuals. Arrogance is an enemy of peace, and political and military adventurism could lead to war. Hunger, unemployment and dejection are also forms of moral aggression and violence. With their actions and omissions our incumbent leaders are pushing the country towards chaos and creating conditions that could sweep us inexorably towards violence.

As this series of articles concludes, there are still many issues to be broached, errors to be pointed out and deceptions to be exposed. This administration is so prolific in its blunders and fantasies that the pen moves much more slowly than developments themselves. As far as the economy is concerned, in these articles I have not touched on issues and facts of comparable importance, such as corruption and the shipments of arms. The numerous denunciations of corruption that Mr Carazo made as a candidate and the many investigations of incumbent and former Liberation officials that he ordered as president only resulted in the indefinite postponement of action on national matters that demanded the immediate attention of the new administration. In contrast, the evidence of corruption that they vainly and zealously sought to find in Liberation Party members has ironically begun to appear in the Unity Party administration. First it was the smuggling of livestock, then the now concluded La Verbena transactions, and most recently the shipment of arms, to mention just a few. Without exception, those public officials who believed Mr Carazo's campaign promises and reported instances of corruption were fired or forced to resign. At the same time that President Carazo travels to Europe to pontificate about peace, Costa Rica is becoming an international center for the traffic of war materiel.

I also did not discuss other major economic issues such as unemployment and the use of monetary reserves. Official figures still do not reflect the disquieting and dangerous rise in unemployment as production has fallen. Some 20,000 Costa Rican families might join the ranks of the unemployed by the end of this year, which will trigger major political and social demands.

In addition, the current finance minister went too far a few months ago when he assured the plenary session of the Legislative Assembly that the Central Bank's monetary reserves were deliberately being lowered because, according to him, it was inadvisable and unnecessary to maintain high levels of foreign exchange. Today, that same minister is desperately trying to negotiate additional foreign loans in Washington and Mexico City while in our country the colon has undergone a de facto devaluation and the Central Bank has even spent the dollars that constituted demand liabilities; hence, our monetary reserves have been negative for more than 2 months.

Excuses

Even though it realizes that it is in hot water, the administration still prefers to resort to deception and offer excuses rather than acknowledge its mistakes and change course. The new economy minister has just announced in the press with extraordinary naivete that inflation this year will be a bit more than 5 percent, that our trade deficit will total just $240 million and that the banana strike is to blame for our lack of dollars.

There are some individuals whose ignorance remains in doubt until they speak up.

Costa Rica is experiencing perhaps its worst crisis this century. But even more serious is the fact that every day our capacity to overcome the crisis wanes. Our mechanisms for adjustment are running out, and our institutions are growing weak. Truly, never before has so much been destroyed by so few in so short a time. The outlook is gloomy, and time is of the essence. No longer can we Costa Ricans who are living this painful nightmare console ourselves with the thought that institutions outlive men, because the institutions themselves are in danger.

The time has come for the government to make major changes, to humbly acknowledge its serious mistakes and to modify its policies and its attitudes. Only rivers do not reverse course, a great Costa Rican statesman used to say. If the determined accusations that citizens are now leveling at the government only serve to heighten the crisis, not to resolve it, then history will rightly condemn those who because of their arrogance and shortsightedness inexcusably imperiled the very foundation of our institutional fabric and of our democratic system.

U.S. ACTIVITIES IN EL SALVADOR QUESTIONED

Havana GRANMA in Spanish 14 Aug 80 p 6

[Article by Orestes Valera: "Sinister Plans for Intervention"]

[Text] The suspicious and continuing series of visits of military and diplomatic visitors from the United States to the area of Central America is fooling no one about the true purposes of setting up aid from other Latin American nations toward a "peacekeeping force" which is to intervene in El Salvador with the intention of wiping out the people's revolutionary movement.

The Yankee plans for intervention, according to many statements from parties, political, labor and religious organizations and persons of international reputation, envision three alternatives:

1. Direct U.S. military intervention

2. Indirect intervention, directed and supported by the United States, but carried out by Venezuela, Costa Rica, Colombia, Honduras and Guatemala.

3. Intervention by the armies of Honduras and Guatemala.

The present U.S. administration prefers the second alternative because it is the eve of elections and because the goal is to avoid appearing chiefly responsible for the massacre of the people, such as occurred in the Dominican Republic in 1965. This accusation was made recently by the Legal Aid office of the Archbishop of El Salvador.

However, this alternative lacks full Pentagon support because the U.S. military have been urging the Department of State for weeks to decide for direct intervention. High officials of the Yankee Department of Defense are "impatient" to use its special "Rapid Strike Forces" on some Latin American nation.

As a last resort, the fevered and confused brains of the U.S. destabilization operation would accept the third option, but it holds no assurance of success.

The El Salvador Democratic Revolutionary Front, according to the Nicaraguan daily BARRICADA, has announced that the intervention plans were developed by a committee of the Chiefs of Staff and the directors of the U.S. Strategic Command with headquarters in the Canal Zone of Panama.

BARRICADA said that the representative from Honduras at the Organization of American States (OAS) recently asked about the date cited for the invasion of El Salvador and said he also insisted that "it is necessary to carry it out as soon as possible."

The urgency felt by the imperialists and their followers is based on the fact that the genocide in El Salvador imposed by the military-Christian Democrat junta, in spite of millions of dollars of economic aid and huge supplies of arms, as well as the presence of numerous "advisers" and "instructors" from the United States, Israel and the Somoza camp, has been unable to hold back the surging development of the armed struggle carried on by the valiant people of El Salvador.

The imperialists and their followers are quite concerned about the failure of the junta's offensive against the areas of Santa Ana, Ahuachapan, Trifinio, Chalatenango, San Miguel and the departments of Morazan and La Union, where the bloodthirsty members of the forces of repression killed hundreds of farmers, slaughtered animals, tore down homes, destroyed crops and, in battles with the guerrillas, suffered defeat and serious casualties.

Strengthened by its victory over an offensive of over 5,000 soldiers, the revolutionary movement has called a general strike for 3 days to demand an end to genocide, to condemn Yankee involvement in El Salvador and to call for release of political prisoners.

Half a million workers of El Salvador, supported by the people's defense commandos, are shaking even the foundations of the fascist junta in power, and will teach the "impatient" aggressors how dangerous it is to invade a people committed to freedom and equipped with the fighting skills of the revolutionary forces and support from progressives throughout the continent and the entire world.

BOLIVIA: COUP BY 'DRUG DEALERS,' 'MAFIA'

Havana TRABAJADORES in Spanish 5 Aug 80 p 3

[Text] Mexico City, 4 August (PL)--According to Hernan Siles Suazo, Bolivia has fallen into the hands of an alliance composed of gangs of drug dealers and fascist military figures supported by the Argentine military dictatorship.

EXCELSIOR, the Mexico City newspaper, today published these statements of the Bolivian president-elect speaking from underground. He has been in hiding since the coup carried out by a military group under Gen Luis Garcia Meza prevented the candidates elected on 29 June 1980 from taking office.

"The military coup took place before my government took office in order to prevent the destruction of the drug rings," Siles Suazo stated.

He added that in their efforts to conceal their misdeeds and their liaison with the drug pushers, now the military government is releasing a great deal of anticommunist propaganda in hopes of winning help from other neighboring governments of the same type.

Siles Suazo is wanted "dead or alive" by the military government, according to the interview in EXCELSIOR which took place in Siles Suazo's hiding place somewhere in Bolivia.

The Bolivian military junta meanwhile was stepping up its repression of foreign residents of Bolivia, persons the government has under strict control, and continuing arbitrarily to arrest political, labor and student leaders. Other such leaders have been simply disappearing.

It is estimated that the repressive action of the government since 17 July 1980 has left 1,000 persons dead so far, 2,000 arrested and an unknown number unaccounted for; it is feared these persons have been killed.

Diplomatic sources said about 150 persons, including several former presidents and officials of the former constitutional government, have taken refuge in the embassies of Venezuela and Mexico.

VARIOUS PRINTED INFORMATION SOURCES DISCUSSED

Havana JUVENTUD TECNICA in Spanish Apr 80 pp 18-24

[Article by the Academy of Sciences of Cuba: "Are You Well-Informed?"]

[Text] In the scientific-data activities (ACI) field, which is that responsible for collecting, processing by means of analysis and synthesis, storing, researching and distributing the scientific information obtained in the process of learning about the objective world, scientific-technical literature is and will continue for a long time to be the most important source of scientific information and the main tool for transmitting it in space and time. For this reason, it is necessary to establish the informative importance of each of the various types of documents which make it up.

On the other hand, there is an increasing tendency to draft "unpublished" scientific documents, outstanding among which first of all are the reports generated by bodies with a scientific-technical content, laboratory records, work plans, documents containing measurement data, etc, and these are sometimes not included as elements in scientific-technical literature.

Also, bearing in mind the important contribution scientific-technical literature makes to experts and technicians in their research work, let us consider the structure of the channels for distributing scientific-technical information from its sources to the users, also pointing out the activities of the auxiliary institutions which are to be found along these paths.

Our schematic diagram [at end of text] shows the personal contacts among scientists, their correspondence and exchange of drafts and copies, in its outer lines. The intermediary lines show the distribution of unpublished documents, such as dissertations in defense of theses at research and academic and scientific-technical institutions, which after approval by those institutions are made available to users through the scientific-technical data bodies or specialized libraries. The central line shows the channel for primary documents published, those which are given in manuscript form by the authors to book publishing houses or the editorial staffs of periodicals or newspapers for later publication.

The scientific-technical data bodies and the libraries represent one of the most important institutional systems in science, because they serve as intermediaries between those who originate scientific information and those who use it. In addition, they are responsible for the systematic handling of information, seeing to the distribution of scientific documents through the establishment of channels.

As the schematic diagram shows, primary documents are a kind of raw material (input) for the information bodies and libraries, and the processing of them yields secondary documents or responses to the questions of the users.

In the development of science, articles in scientific periodicals are of great importance and they retain unchallenged priority among all the types of scientific documents. Articles are divided into three categories:

1. A category made up of original articles containing research results, enabling the scientist to analyze, evaluate and, potentially, to reproduce the experiments and observations of the author, as well as to verify his conclusions.

2. A category including preliminary publications and notes characterized by some scientific novelty, but not equal to the first category in terms of exhaustive and precise description.

3. A category of so-called descriptive articles, which rarely contribute any new scientific information, and the purpose of which is to analyze and discuss information previously published on a given subject.

In fact, this system of articles in periodicals only took shape recently, taking on some functions formerly reserved for scientific texts, and it constitutes the best extant mechanism for transmitting developments in science and technology, since these articles are published more speedily than are books, although they contain much less general material and therefore are out of date sooner.

Division of Documents

Until a short time ago, the division of documents into the published and unpublished category was regarded as the most important. With the development of data information, a discipline studying the structure and properties (not the content) of scientific-technical data, as well as the regulations governing scientific-data work, its theory, history, methodology and organization, has given priority to the division of documents into primary and secondary categories. This is a conventional decision, since it affects basically scientific-technical data as such and not the documents which contain it, but it is more useful because it is consistent with the documentary flow which has developed historically in the API field.

Moreover, a division of primary and secondary documents is appropriate, for it makes it possible to characterize the different types of scientific-technical document flow in information work.

The primary documents, which will be the subject of this work, reflect the direct results of scientific research and design and experimentation work. However, many currently existing scientific documents also reflect the results of scientific research and data obtained in the logical processing of data contained in documents published earlier. Articles in periodicals, monographs, textbooks, and no less important, bibliographies, are examples.

In the scientific-technical field there are many investigations and experiments carried out throughout the world by experts, technicians and researchers pursuing their activities in the various branches of knowledge, such that a large quantity of information set forth in primary publications is generated. However this is not the best medium for distributing scientific knowledge, since as Soviet academician A. N. Nesmeionr has said, mankind is saturated with scientific information, and taking chemistry as an example, he illustrated the complexity of the problem of the increase in information:

" . . . Worldwide, almost 10,000 periodical articles appear each year, and these periodicals list at least 200,000 publications on chemistry or technologies related to this discipline. In addition, 5,000 books and more than 30,000 patent descriptions related at least in part to chemistry are published . . . " And he adds: "If a chemist were to begin on 1 January to read all the publications coming out during the year and of interest to him professionally for 40 hours per week and at a rate of 4 publications per hour, he would by 31 December have only succeeded in covering 20 percent of the total."

Now then, the transmission of knowledge has taken on such importance in our day that it becomes necessary to describe the main types of primary documents for publications in order to know what scientific documents exist and what their functions are. Secondary documents and publications will be dealt with in our next article.

Description of Primary Published Documents

Books and Pamphlets

Books. Books are the form in which broadly generalized theoretical studies are published, exploring the crucial problems of science, technology, the economy and culture. They are an unequalled means of education, training and culture for the new generations of scientists and technicians.

Monographs. A monograph is a work on science or scientific dissemination providing an exhaustive and broad consideration of a single problem, inquiry or theme. This was the predominant form of the scientific books in the last century. It generally gives a description based on a very detailed plan covering the aspects of the theme or phenomenon under consideration.

Collection of Articles. This is a book containing single articles by one author or several authors. Collections need not cover a theme exhaustively, but may deal lightly with some of the general aspects. This has come to be one of the most widespread types of scientific books, and given the importance of the data contained, is indispensable for the use of specialists.

Conference Reports and Minutes. These are generally published after the closing of these meetings of scientists. They contain summaries and sometimes the complete texts of the reports presented, as well as summaries of the discussions. More than 50 percent of the data published in such books does not appear in other publications, which is the reason for their great value in scientific-information work.

Textbooks and Manuals. These play a special role among the books used in scientific work. They describe only the main facts set forth and are, for the most part, designed for teaching purposes.

Official Publications. These are edited by bodies and institutions and are documents containing information pertaining to the activities of the institutions responsible for such information. These publications have no scientific value, although in some forms they may contain important scientific information.

Periodical Publications. A periodical publication is a published work which appears at established intervals, in separate printings with different content, but under the same title. Publication is planned over an indefinite period of time and generally, the editions have the same format.

Serial Publications. These are copies of scientific works from other materials published by various societies, institutions and bodies, over unspecified intervals or very long periods, never less than a year (yearbooks and editions appearing every 2, 3, 4, 5 or more years). Numbered sections with a fixed format and a very general title ("Works," "Notes," "News," etc) are published. Serial publications are an important source of scientific information.

Magazines. These are periodical publications which appear regularly in weekly, monthly, bimonthly, etc, editions. They include articles or other materials of scientific-technical or socio-political content, in addition to literary works. Magazines provide current news information and describe recent advances in science and technology in detail. The articles in scientific magazines are currently the main source of scientific information and retain unchallenged priority among all the types of scientific documents.

Daily Newspapers. These we define as publications usually appearing daily, or once, twice or three times weekly, containing information about current events of a basically socio-political nature. They also regularly publish popular science articles and the leading news on science and technology.

Special Types of Technical Publications

Norms. These are scientifically proven technical documents. They are used to guarantee high product quality. Analogous to them are the sectorial or intersectorial technical documents established in the absence of the corresponding norms. They also serve as a source of information about technical achievements.

Patent Descriptions. These are an important source of scientific and technical information and facilitate the researching of the history of an invention or discovery. They set forth a clear view of the current status and trends in the development of scientific thinking in the scientific-technological field involved. Timely familiarization with patents prevents the duplication of inventions or the development of already-existing techniques and machinery. Finally, these include a brief summary of the single object of the invention, defining its distinctive characteristics comprising the invention as such, which are subject to legal protection.

Technical Catalogs. These are lists of products manufactured by industrial enterprises and establishments, etc. Generally, they contain a description of each product, with sketches and photographs, and they sometimes indicate the price, model, and other supplementary data. Technical catalogs are widely used by engineers, economists and scientists in the study of existing equipment, with a view to its purchase, use or improvement.

Description of Unpublished Primary Documents

Scientific and Technical Reports. These are an important source of information on the advance of science and technology. Since scientific-technical reports are not regarded as publications and their circulation is limited, many nations are taking the steps necessary to have an official registry and a centralized index of such documents.

Theses and Dissertations. These are research works submitted by candidates for an academic degree in the sciences. Because they come within a given discipline or subject, dissertations may pertain to different types of scientific work.

Informative Card Files. These can be used as the main means by which local establishments supply a central body with scientific, technical, industrial and economic data. They are the main source of primary information, providing information on the achievements of research and planning institutes, design bureaus, etc.

Translations. Some translations are published in the form of schematic collections, and essentially they are in no way different from books and periodical publications. However, the majority of the translations of scientific-technical literature are simply typewritten and national and sectorial repositories are created. On almost all translations, the cover page shows the name of the institution where the work was translated, the number of the translation order, the date and the title.

Preprints and Separate Printings. These are preliminary printings of an article or another work run off prior to the official printing for the purpose of dispatch to a limited number of persons interested therein. They have the advantage of coming out before the official publication of scientific documents, sometimes by as much as several months, and providing a more rapid dissemination of ideas and scientific events to the experts.

Many periodical and serial publications also make separate printings of certain articles along with the main printings, sending them to the authors who usually distribute them among their colleagues.

Manuscripts. These are materials prepared for printing. Due among other things to the time-consuming nature of the copying process, these documents constitute a third of all the scientific and technical literature on any matter published in recent years. They are a part of a special category of unpublished documents, and when they are of interest to a limited circle of experts, copies may be dispatched on the decision of the editors, publishers of periodicals or research institutes and information bodies. To this end, manuscripts are listed in special bulletins or catalogs, and copies can be obtained by application to the corresponding information body.

To summarize, let us stress that the types of publications put out correspond to the informative materials and exchange of experience which make the new advances achieved in the fields of science and technology known. They are distinguished by their wide variety of content and presentation, as we have seen.

Unpublished materials differ from printed works in certain peculiar aspects which we must keep in mind in the development of scientific and information activities, since these documents exist in single copies, which do not always have the necessary collective scientific support. Handwritten and typewritten documents are the most difficult to read and reproduce.

Finally, let us note that the recovery of these unpublished documents involves great difficulties, because the ordinary channels of information do not provide data about them and for this reason the use of special methods is necessary to obtain, logically process, store and locate them.

'BOHEMIA' EXPLAINS CRITICISM OF YUGOSLAV MAGAZINE

Havana BOHEMIA in Spanish 29 Aug 80 p 79

[Article by V. Robles: "Differences in NIN Between Spirit and Letter"; passages enclosed in slantlines printed in boldface; for first BOHEMIA article, see JPRS 76331, 29 Aug 80, No. 2182 of this series, pp 92-97]

[Text] In a recent article, the editors of the Yugoslav magazine NIN tried to portray themselves as victims who nobly forgive the alleged offender.

To consider themselves "attacked" by BOHEMIA because of our response to that magazine ("When, in Order Not to See the Forest, a Tree Is Invented," BOHEMIA, 25 July 1980) is so absurd that it is difficult to take them seriously.

This becomes even stranger when, in recent years, we have had the opportunity to read different articles in the pages of NIN whose texts and tones have verged on anti-Cuban campaigns orchestrated by well-known interests.

It would suffice to glance at what NIN has published in recent times to note that the editors of NIN have not shown comradeship in their articles on Cuba, Cuban policy in the development of socialist construction and Cuban international positions. They now reproach us for lacking this feeling of comradeship in our article.

It could also be verified that NIN attempts to show Cuban reality and policy through ambiguous statements and confusing concepts while the behavior of BOHEMIA--and, in general, all the Cuban press--toward Yugoslavia is based on respect for a country whose people share basic socioeconomic aspirations and aspirations of international order with us. We base that respect on principle which, by definition, excludes childish demands for revenge.

NIN accuses us of inaccuracies and misrepresentations. However, it only refutes the fact that BOHEMIA compared the "Cuban refugees"--as they, the imperialist news agencies and their imitator, XINHUA, insist on calling the antisocial elements--to the Yugoslav workers who temporarily work abroad.

In this context, the editors of NIN show some sleight of hand through their writers' feints. NIN stated with frank benevolence: "We are /willing/ to understand the problems that our Cuban comrades have with /massive flight/ from their country."

In this way, NIN probably strengthens its readers' belief in the purity of its intentions. Following this logic, we should be grateful for this fraternal willingness to /understand/ our problems.

It is necessary, however, to repeat some facts. We do not deny that we have a small amount of social trash in our country. At the same time, we congratulate ourselves for sweeping it up and sending it to the perfect dump.

To ease the minds and hearts of those who say they are so concerned with our alleged problems, we can assure them that the departure of this turbulent minority helps us rid our society of impurities and helps carry out a social prevention campaign that our people are grateful for.

However, if the editors of NIN still have twinges of doubt about the subject, we invite them to review the many wire dispatches of the capitalist news agencies themselves which narrate the "antics" of these "refugees" in the United States, Peru and other places where they have sown uneasiness and terror.

There is more. If the editors of NIN--as the sharp professionals that they are--demand even more evidence, we suggest that they look up and read the reports and commentaries of several international news agencies about the way many Cuban "refugees" are reacting after they collide with the reality of the alleged U.S. paradise. As those sources say: "They have become disillusioned with the U.S. myth."

Perhaps we could ask a question. If NIN had to use its pages and editors to present the case of the Cuban antisocials who left the country in this way, will it be equally willing to reflect the facts that demonstrate the eventual failure of that adventure?

Also what exactly are the editors of NIN willing to understand? Do they understand that this phenomenon has its origin basically in the constant hostility, armed aggression, sabotage, economic blockade and obstinate efforts of 20 years of successive U.S. administrations to destroy the Cuban revolution?

As to the linguistic subtleties that they use with the different meanings of the terms emigrees, refugees and emigrants, we will not try to contradict this semantic tightrope walking. However, we are not remiss in accepting differences between the social trash that leaves our country and those who temporarily leave Yugoslavia.

BOHEMIA's "attack" gives the editors of NIN an opportunity for a "defense" that is as unnecessary as it is contradictory. We could add some things to emphasize the difference between the trash in our country and the Yugoslav workers who, by the hundreds of thousands, sell their physical and mental energies to the best bidder in the capitalist market.

They are different, in the first place, because while the Yugoslav workers make up the working class of that fraternal country, the trash are the vagrants of our society. They are also different because the Yugoslav workers who work outside their country are obviously patriotic and do it because they do not have jobs in their fatherland. The trash that choose to go to the United States are stifled in Cuba because they try to live without working.

NIN applauds the fact that such a system is routine in its country. We do not question that right. Each judges according to his own set of values and, of course, according to the material conditions of his social way of life.

Lastly, the editors of NIN censure us for not treating them like comrades. We accept that. Perhaps we mistakenly took the spirit instead of the letter since, in these matters, it is not usually enough to be something and to want something; it is necessary to act that way also.

SEX EDUCATION, LOWER MARRIAGE AGE DISCUSSED

Havana JUVENTUD TECNICA in Spanish Apr 80 pp 29-33

[Interview with Dr Celestino Alvarez Lajonchere, professor at the Higher Institute of Medical Sciences and the Institute of Health Development, by Jose R. Garcia Gonzalez; date and place not given]

> [Text] Sexual relations in humans go beyond the simple reproductive act. Their psychological and social implications make this subject a primary concern in all the socialist countries, due to its importance in the total formation of the younger generations.

"Sex education is part of the total education of the human being, and in the end it must be imparted from the earliest age in the family, in the childcare centers and in the schools," explained Dr Celestino Alvarez Lajonchere, professor at the Higher Institute of Medical Sciences and the Institute of Health Development.

"Now then," he continued "throughout history, the subject of sex has been taboo, and the possibility has been denied even of educating children as to where they come from, how they are formed and how they are born. Religion has played a serious role in this process. Sex education is directed, first, to answer a basic need in the anxieties which beset man spontaneously because of his very existence and concerning his personal relations.

"The child is concerned, specifically, about the most elemental aspects of biology, which he observes in animals and which cause him to ask questions.

Furthermore, the function of sex education does not stop there; it must be understood as a part of education for social life, for the formation of the couple, and to learn what conditions are historically determined, since the couple at the dawn of civilization was not the same as in our times. In other words, it includes social elements of a historical nature.

"But still, that is not all; the almost total ignorance of specific functions of the body, such as sexuality, creates problems and endangers our daily behavior.

"Sexual relations, besides being necessary biological actions for reproduction, present other components which affect us; that is, the affective relations which must govern and precede the sexual act and even follow it. This type of education is complex, varied and important and includes a series of elements which we cannot leave to chance, to erroneous information surrounded by a morbid atmosphere which can lead to inadequate, reproachable behavior.

"Children should receive this type of information, initially, from their parents; but the fact is that in most cases adults do not know how to deal with their children or how to answer their questions, and it is on this problem that we are working.

"The first concern of the Task Force for Sex Education has been to compile basic informational materials and to study some of the experiences of other socialist countries for the purpose of analyzing and fitting them, insofar as possible, to conditions in our own country.

"We have collaborated in the publication of materials concerning sex education: texts directed at parents and professionals, since it is not only the former who are directly concerned with this problem. There is a sector of specialists who have an even greater obligation than education; these are the psychologists and certain medical specialists who hear the concerns of married couples who desire to solve the problems they confront in their sexual relations.

"The same is true of pediatricians and teachers, who must not only have this knowledge, but must know how to transmit it, according to the case and age of those involved.

"Everyone who is in contact with this problem is in need of training; in addition, some require certain specialization to apply therapy, since there are couples who need treatment.

"After having begun a national sex education program," added Professor Lajonchere, "it is logical that one should begin to think in terms of the existence of an 'epidemic' of problems; this is natural, since the cases are real. However nobody wants to admit that he has such problems, but once this information gets to the people, those affected will see themselves reflected and will understand that there is a solution now that there are specialized personnel who can help them.

"Concerning our own situation at this time, we cannot quote any figures, since we do not know the magnitude of the problem, but we do not believe that it is any greater or lesser than in the general population of other countries. What we do urge is the training of people suitable to deal with these problems.

"Now then, there are so-called 'indirect indicators' which give us a view of what is happening in our society. For example, it is well known that in Cuba there has been a phenomenal decrease in the average age of married couples; this is a problem, then, since when a girl marries at 14 or 15 years of age, that is indeed something to think about, because at that age, generally, her reproductive organs are not fully developed, a fact which represents a risk from the biological point of view. In addition, it is a serious matter socially, since that couple has an insufficient degree of maturity and training. What kind of responsibility can they take for raising the product of their union? In these cases the young woman is the one most directly affected: she finds obstacles to her social and professional development. To deny this reality would be unjust, because the figures prove it: in a high percentage of present marriages, the girls are under 20 years of age, and the same is true of abortions. However, the opposite is true of women over 25. The birth rate has declined, as well as the rate of interrupted pregnancies. What does this mean? That we are becoming aware of this, since although our activity is directed basically at children and youth, it does not ignore the concerns of adults. We are convinced that our work must have a broad scope, that it must include the entire population, clearly, with more emphasis on the younger generations. This task is real and pressing.

"We have had some very advantageous experiences, which have received the support and cooperation of mass organizations and state agencies, such as the FMC [Cuban Women's Federation], MINED [Ministry of Education], UJC [Union of Young Communists], MINSAP [Ministry of Public Health], the Children's Institute and the Jose Marti Pioneers Organization.

"In addition, the texts printed by the Ministry of Education for primary and secondary education include some specific aspects (biological and social) of sex education.

"Also, with the assistance of MINSAP and MINED, a cycle of nine lectures has been given to 10th and 12th grade students, to cooperate in the total formation of the youth, including aspects of interpersonal relationships, the formation of the couple, the family and sexuality. Ignorance can also affect one's health; we all know the danger of attempted abortion in an unsuitable setting, to cite one example.

"These lectures have made it easy to achieve a more familiar atmosphere between the students and the speakers, which then has made it possible for the former to express their concerns, either directly or through anonymous written questions.

"The centers chosen were: a rural high school, students at a teacher-training institution and teachers in child-care centers. These experiences gave us a chance to broaden our knowledge.

"Our next immediate task will be to develop new lectures based on the results obtained and to include a greater number of specialists and of centers to be visited.

"The problem of sex education is being treated as a multidiscipline, from various angles, unhurriedly and without sensationalism. This problem is complex and must be seen from different branches of science, and these must be reconciled and must cooperate, since otherwise the result could be damaging." To further broaden our knowledge of the problems which exist among our youth in this regard, Monika Krause Peters, an official of the National Directorate of the FMC and coordinator of the Task Force for Sex Education of the Permanent Commission on Children and Women's Equality of the National Assembly of the People's Government, also spoke:

"In Cuba the youth have a freedom they did not have before; however, adults have not been able to prepare them adequately so that they know how to use it, particularly in the sexual sphere.

"Our youth, for the most part, has an erroneous concept of sexuality; clearly this is the result of ignorance on the part of parents, teachers and specialists who could have trained them. Both boys and girls are ignorant of the stages which must develop before love actually becomes something deep and full of happiness.

"In addition," she added, "in many places, intimacy is considered almost a 'sport;' that is, instead of concluding this deepening of their relationship with the most intimate contact, frequently they begin with it, unaware of its psychic and social implications. Furthermore, many couples do not use any sort of contraceptive, because they believe that nothing will happen 'the first time,' thus demonstrating their total ignorance, since that first time may indeed result in pregnancy.

"It also demonstrates irresponsibility and can lead to frustrations; we must take into account that we have a very high rate of divorce, mostly among young couples who have been married less than a year.

"While we are training the new generations to be useful to society, we must also prepare them for a happy marriage, such as our socialist system desires."

Objectives of the Task Force for Sex Education [p 31]

1. To educate men and women who are capable of interacting with the opposite sex and their own, through attitudes and convictions which correspond to the norms of socialist morality.

2. To achieve a level in sex education, in regard to intimate feelings, affection, friendship and love, which will help the person to achieve full individual happiness as well as happiness within the family.

3. To guarantee the formation of scientific concepts of biological and social problems of sex, the peculiarities of development and the behavior of women and men.

4. To direct the training of youth so that they will be capable of actively confronting the moral bourgeois concepts which still survive, the damaging influences of the environment which may remain within them as immoral habits and modes of behavior and also so that they may act honestly and convincingly according to the concepts of sexual relations which are in agreement with the principles of socialist morality.

5. To have an influence on the training of youth for marriage and the formation of a stable, healthy and happy family, where the children will be adequately trained and educated in sexual matters.

Lectures given [p 32]

1. Philosophical questions concerning human sexuality.
2. The male and female reproductive systems. Sexual response.
3. From conception to adolescence.
4. The family in socialist society.
5. Some psychological questions of adolescence.
6. Methods of contraception.
7. Veneral diseases.
8. Sexual variations and deviations.
9. Final thoughts about human sexuality.

Immediate Tasks [p 32]

1. To continue to gather and study materials and experiences basically from the socialist countries.

2. To collaborate in the publication of books in accordance with the objectives of sex education in our country.

3. To participate in the preparation of materials for lectures to specialists, teachers, professors, parents and family members.

4. To select and propose the publication of educational materials which will help parents to inform their children adequately on the fundamental aspects of reproduction and sexuality.

5. To cooperate in the training of personnel who will give the necessary consultations, deliver lectures and multiply the efforts being made today on a very small scale in some middle level centers.

6. To contribute to the training of specialists in the fields of medicine, psychologists and teachers, so that they will be capable of satisfactorily meeting the needs of the people in matters of prevention and treatment of sexual problems and sex education.

CTC'S VEIGA DISCUSSES WOMEN IN WORK FORCE

Havana GRANMA in Spanish 19 Aug 80 p 2

[Interview with Roberto Veiga, CTC leader, on 20th anniversary of FMC: "We Can Verify Results, Successes in Our Work Centers Where Women Participate More Effectively in National Economic Life"]

[Text] [Question] 1. How does the CTC [Central Organization of Cuban Trade Unions] evaluate the work done by the FMC [Federation of Cuban Women] in these past 20 years to achieve the participation of women in national economic life?

[Answer] To attain full participation of women in national economic life is a common objective of the FMC and the CTC; therefore, we work very closely to achieve this objective. This has permitted us to verify the systematic work done by the FMC since its formation in the ideological training of women and the development of the awareness of women, gradually replacing the residuals of capitalism with the new values of the socialist society.

Cuban women very quickly understood their duty to work actively in the construction of the new society and joined their organization, the FMC. The FMC helped take women out of the limited framework of the home in order to study, advance and exchange opinions with their comrades, achieving a new awareness.

The FMC has participated in fighting against illiteracy, educating peasant women, training domestic workers for productive jobs, eliminating prostitution, incorporating women in work, social struggles and tasks to support education and public health campaigns and developing political awareness and internationalist spirit in the hearts of Cuban women.

That systematic, profound and selfless work of the FMC has materialized in the widespread incorporation of large female contingents in the production and service fronts and social tasks.

We can verify the results and successes in our work centers where women participate more effectively in national economic life.

[Question] 2. We would like to know your opinion of the objective conditions created to achieve the incorporation and permanence of women in jobs.

[Answer] To achieve the massive incorporation of hundreds of thousands of women in social production (from 194,000 in 1958 to more than 800,000 in 1980), it has been necessary to create the material conditions that are established in our country as it advances along the road to construction of socialism and communism.

Since the very moment of the revolutionary triumph, the study and putting into practice of ways and means to help women combine work with the rest of their social activities, especially those as a mother, have been the constant concern of the CTC, the FMC and corresponding state organizations.

We must point out the establishment of day-care centers in 1961. We now have 770 installations of this type with planned enrollment of 97,100 children. Although this is still not enough in some areas, the situation will improve with the new construction included in the Single Plan for National Economic and Social Development.

The semiboarding primary schools lend a valuable service to working women with children 6 years of age or older. Now 282,115 children can enjoy this service.

Our extensive plan for scholarship students covers more than 500,000 boarding students at the different educational levels.

The people's government with the support of the Union of Cuban Pioneers, the unions, the FMC and state organizations annually organize vacations for primary students during the July and August vacations; priority is given to the children of working mothers.

Social nutrition is another aspect to which special attention has been given with priority for the establishment of worker and student dining rooms.

Also the laundry network has been expanded as much as possible, implementing the self-service system in several areas.

The promulgation of Law No. 1263 on the Maternity of Working Women--which constitutes an extraordinary advance from the medical and scientific point of view--provides 4-1/2 months of paid leave and includes complementary unpaid leave.

We believe it is necessary to mention here the serious problems with the schedules of the industrial and food products stores as well as service units which do not correspond to the interests and needs of working women.

In order to solve this situation, the CTC, the FMC, the National Commercial and Restaurant Workers Union, the Ministry of Domestic Trade and the local people's government organs were asked to study the situation and suggest alternatives in order to modify the existing schedules to permit working women to solve their problems and those of their families without having to take time off from their jobs.

The new schedules have already been put into practice in some places and soon will be applied in all the provinces.

In spite of this great effort, working women still face objective problems that will only be eliminated by constant work, increased productivity and efficiency and the progress achieved in the economic field. Those are the fundamental bases to supply the material conditions that the incorporation and permanence of women in work demand.

[Question] 3. What work is being done now in the country to raise the cultural and technical level of working women?

[Answer] One of the main objectives of the work of the CTC concerning working women has been the improvement of their cultural and technical skill and their incorporation in all levels of education as a basic premise for the economic and social development that demands women's skills more each day.

There is a movement in our country to advance working women which offers them unlimited possibilities of study.

Nevertheless, concrete procedures have been established to contribute to those objectives. These include:

To specify in the enrollment of the personnel training courses the required percentages of women in the courses developed in MINED [Ministry of Education] institutions as well as in those organized by enterprises and budgeted units. This has resulted in an increase in the number of women enrolled in the professional and technical training courses.

One representative figure of the incorporation of working women to study is that 33.5 percent of all working women are in different levels of education. This figure is proportionally higher than that for men.

In the battle for sixth grade proposed by the labor movement for this 5-year period and ratified at our 14th congress, there have been good results with the women who, from the beginning, supported the project with extraordinary enthusiasm and went as a mass to the classrooms. Of all the workers enrolled to finish sixth grade, 50.1 percent are women.

Housewives, organized by the FMC, have contributed in an important way in this task. From the beginning of the battle, many thousands of housewives have obtained sixth-grade educations and have been placed in a very favorable situation for incorporation to the different tasks of the construction of socialism in our fatherland.

[Question] 4. It would be interesting to know how the female work force participates in emulation and if this corresponds with the percentage of working women in the country.

[Answer] The working women participate actively and enthusiastically in socialist emulation and, like other workers, make commitments and try to fulfill the technical and economic plans of their work centers. In this way, they contribute to the success of the collective where they work.

As an expression of the above, it is enough to indicate that more than 383,000 women achieved the position of advanced worker last year, representing 46.7 percent of all working women. The men who won that aware only represent 40.4 percent of all working men.

In this year of the Second Congress and in salute to this great event of the Cuban communists, more than 400,000 working women have committed themselves to emulation. They work enthusiastically and selflessly to achieve the position of "fulfiller" in the nomenclature established by the new methodology of socialist emulation.

[Question] 5. Cuban women have played an important role in support of the solidarity offered by our country to other fraternal countries. Would you please discuss the attitude of the Cuban women as internationalists?

[answer] Revolutionary patriotism, solidarity and internationalist behavior have always been consubstantial to the Cuban people and have increased throughout these past 21 years.

Among the thousands of compatriots who give their support to economic and social construction in different places around the world, the thousands of women who participate in those tasks, in demonstration of the profound sentiments of solidarity of our people, stand out.

That unconditional and active solidarity of Cuban women is materializing in countries in Asia, Africa and Latin America.

We can find selfless women doctors, nurses, teachers, builders and technicians as well as professional cadres of the FMC in Vietnam, Angola, Ethiopia, Algeria or Iraq.

To refer to the nearest and most recent case, we can speak of the solidarity aid to the fraternal people of Nicaragua. Of the 1,200 Cuban teachers in Nicaragua, almost 50 percent are women and those women do not teach in the cities but in the most isolated and frequently inhospitable areas.

In order to express the great solidarity and internationalist spirit of our people, especially of Cuban women, their self-denial and heroism, nothing is more eloquent than the closing words of our commander in chief, Fidel Castro, in his speech at the main celebration of the 27th anniversary of 26 July.

Fidel said: "When I ask myself what is a communist, I have the answer when I find a doctor in Bluefields or a woman doctor who is a wife and a mother but can leave her family to go save lives thousands of kilometers from her fatherland. I think: That is the communist man and this is the communist woman."

ATAC CONFERENCE CONCLUDES WITH DEVELOPMENT PLANS

Havana ATAC in Spanish Sep-Dec 79 pp 38-50

[Theses and resolutions unanimously approved at plenary meeting held on 14 Oct 79 at Palacio de las Convenciones as part of 42nd ATAC Conference; original paragraphing not followed; passages enclosed in slantlines printed in italics]

[text] The history of ATAC [Cuban Association of Sugar Technicians] must be divided into the prerevolutionary period and the period after January 1959. The first is characterized by the following:

A lower number of members than now which was not caused by any admission restrictions;

Interest of the members, especially those with technical prestige, in presenting papers and proposals at the conferences that served to strengthen their individual technical status;

A certain critical attitude by the technicians toward the landowners' lack of interest in the technological development of the industry;

General good quality of the technical workers even though many suffered from a lack of an experimental or research basis because of insufficient means;

Economic support of commercial firms, landowners (owners of sugar mills) associations and farmers (cane growers) through dues as /sponsor members/; advertisements in the bulletin and in the annual reports; and External material support: ATAC was given room for its offices and library in the Landowners Association building for several years.

Internally, ATAC did not escape fights because of personal interests, ambitions and class differences; members included influential and well-paid technicians, then /in alliance/ with the landowners and certain members of the upper class who had become technicians. Along with these upper strata, there were hundreds of technical workers who had limited income and less access to the sources of scientific and technical information; they found ATAC a propitious way to channel their professional problems and interests.

Within this framework that was typical of the times, ATAC had attained international prestige by 1958 after 30 years of existence.

After the Revolution

After the triumph of the revolution, two events that directly affected ATAC occurred: many technicians left the country and others devoted themselves entirely to revolutionary work.

ATAC was weakened almost to the point of disappearing but it was sustained for 2 or 3 years by a group of technicians who did not leave the country but who maintained an allegedly /apolitical/ position.

This situation made many associates who were totally in agreement with the revolution view ATAC as the refuge of opponents to the new regime in the country. Although this feeling was partly true, it should be recognized that that group prevented ATAC's total collapse.

In 1965 a new stage was initiated led by Rafael Pedrosa Puertas, president of ATAC. The massive entrance of new technicians trained by the revolution was encouraged. This policy was endorsed by then minister of the sugar industry, comrade Orlando Borrego, and ATAC began a new life with greater strength and energy, practically free of petit-bourgeois attitudes and interests. This created a firm basis for the development of the institution.

In the present decade, ATAC has had two important aspects. One is the conferences of 1970, 1972, 1977 and 1979 which had the greatest participation of delegates and guests as well as proposals discussed. In the last three conferences (before the 42nd), there were 599 technical papers which represent 37 percent of the total presented in ATAC's 52 years of existence.

This was due to a great extent to scientific and technical development in the field of sugar production which includes the specialized organizations and those of higher education which work basically on sugar and cane research and which have taken the results of their work to these conferences. In addition, production technicians have also made a large and valuable contribution in technological improvement which has been most conclusively demonstrated in the results of the recent sugar harvests.

The other aspect that affected ATAC in this decade is a period of 4 years (1972-1977) when there were no conferences. Although the establishment of the new political-administrative division of the country and the celebration of the First Party Congress occurred during this period which limited the opportunities to hold the conferences, it has to be recognized that this interruption in the basic activities contributed to a certain weakening in ATAC and discouragement among its members. This is revealed clearly in the number of voluntary resignations and expulsions for nonpayment of dues.

It is possible to summarize the present situation of ATAC with two basic but conflicting facts:

a) The conferences, as isolated phenomena, have quantitative as well as qualitative prestige and have resumed their normal rate in the past 2 years; and

b) ATAC, in its institutional operations, has shortcomings and, in this sense, does not satisfy all the demands of its present significance or of its projections for the immediate future.

1. On Statutes, Regulations, Internal Organization, Administrative System

Thesis

According to existing statutes, ATAC is governed by two deliberative organs: the executive committee and the general council of members. The executive committee is made up by: the president; seven vice presidents in charge of agricultural affairs, agroindustrial affairs, industrial affairs, derivatives, international relations, public relations and coordination of ATAC events; the executive secretary; and the treasurer.

It was agreed at the plenary meeting to ask the new executive committee to study expansion of the vice presidents to include one for irrigation and agricultural machinery.

There is a first vice president who is appointed from among the different vice presidents by the executive committee.

This leadership structure complies with the legal precepts of Law No. 1320 (Law on Associations) promulgated on 27 November 1976. At the same time, it satisfies the need for introducing structural modifications to respond to the present realities of ATAC.

Comparison of the new and old statutes reveals the following significant facts:

a) Replacement of the secretariat with a smaller executive committee; this committee and the general council are the deliberative organs that govern ATAC.

b) Most operational work is done by the executive committee so decision making is more dynamic and expeditious.

c) A quorum for holding sessions was established.

Based on the experience of the past 2 years, this central leadership structure satisfies the functional needs of ATAC.

Administratively, the central organ of ATAC has acted satisfactorily. Nevertheless, it seems advisable to include a technician of recognized prestige in the administrative organ to give greater unity to different tasks inherent to the library, the selection of technical reports to distribute among the members, support to collaborations for REVISTA ATAC and responsibility for certain national relationships that will again fall on the administration in the near future.

ATAC's economic income comes from the annual dues of the members, admission fees to the national conferences and the financial contribution of MINAZ [Ministry of the Sugar Industry]. This income is allocated to: payment of salaries, administrative expenses, publication expenses of REVISTA ATAC, expenses of the national conferences and others.

Without being critical, ATAC's present financial condition does not permit it to increase its present activities and occasionally imposes certain restrictions on it.

Resolution

In view of the facts expressed and taking into consideration the growing responsibilities that it will have to contract as an institution that unites technicians of what is and will be for a long time the most important production in the country, it is necessary to adopt the following measures:

1. To comply with all the provisions of the statutes and regulations of ATAC and to introduce modifications to these as necessary for the complete fulfillment of its objectives.

2. To study in detail the administrative structure and functioning of the central offices and to incorporate a technical official, if it is definitely considered suitable, to channel the tasks indicated in the thesis. This official would be subordinate only to the board of directors of ATAC and would not take executive prerogatives away from the administrator.

3. To negotiate economic support for ATAC, similar to what it receives from MINAZ, from other state organizations whose activities are related to the objectives of ATAC and which are represented in it, mainly the Ministry of Agriculture, the Academy of Sciences of Cuba and SIME [Steelworking Industry].

To study the need to modify the composition of the vice presidencies as to branches of specialized activity, principally those that correspond to technical functions.

2. On Creation, Development of Provincial Branches

Thesis

In its 51 years of existence, ATAC has directed all its work under the centralized direction of its executive committee and, until recently, its secretariat.

This organizational structure does not facilitate active participation by all the members in the tasks of leadership, development and fulfillment of the objectives for which ATAC was created, objectives that acquire greater strength and significance today within the framework of the Marxist philosophy that governs all the activities of the country.

Following the policy of the Cuban state which promotes and stimulates the formation of professional associations as a way to strengthen and accelerate the scientific and technical development of the different specialized branches of human knowledge, it is necessary to structure ATAC so that it maximizes its chances to contribute to development in the field of sugar production. This objective can only be attained by creating mechanisms that facilitate the active participation of all the members of the association.

ATAC has a unique characteristic: it is the only multiprofessional association in the country. Practically all branches of professional and technical activity are represented in it within the field of application to sugar production. This characteristic accentuates the need to create mechanisms capable of making the objectives of the association fulfilled equally in all professional and technical branches.

In recent years, there have been attempts to create provincial branches so that ATAC's contribution to scientific and technical development is not limited to conferences and publication of REVISTA ATAC and that all the work tasks, organization of congresses and leadership activities are not limited exclusively to the executive committee. The members in general can only participate in deliberations during the general council sessions.

These attempts have not been successful, principally because they did not have the necessary support of the official provincial organs. Every professional association, even if it is private, inevitably needs the support of the principal branch of the productive activity or service that will be the beneficiary of its work.

An analysis of that lack of support indicates four main causes:

a) ATAC is considered an institution of exclusive interest to its members.

b) ATAC has not worked hard enough to make its real significance--past, present and future--for sugar production understood by official organizations.

c) The members themselves have felt they belonged to a passive association since there was a period of 5 years without any conferences and because there is limited technical information available due to delays and irregularity in the publication of REVISTA ATAC.

d) The technicians in the provinces have felt left out of the activities of the organization because the sphere of activity is basically centered on the national capital.

In other countries the sugar technician associations have a structure based on the number of their members and their economic dependence on the contributions of the productive enterprises, firms that sell machinery, etc. There should be a brief reference to the associations of three developed countries that produce cane sugar.

/Queensland (Australia)/ It has a central organic headquarters with branches in the main sugar production centers (Cairns, Burdekin, etc.). At these branches there is a functional executive committee (not organic) and annual congresses are held, preferably in different cities in the production areas.

/United States/ There is one association of technicians with two branches, Louisiana and Florida. Each has its own leadership and both form the administration of the joint association. Each branch holds its own regional congresses; there are also association congresses.

/Mexico/ ATAM [Sugar Technicians Association of Mexico] has its main headquarters in Mexico City and branches in the main sugar production states: Veracruz, Jalisco, etc. These local branches hold events like round tables and forums and every year ATAM holds a national congress.

The need to spread ATAC's influence throughout the country in leadership as well as in promotion of scientific and technical work at all levels and in all sectors included in sugar production has become more obvious. This reality supports the need to create provincial branches and to obtain direct and effective support from all the branches of MINAZ, the vice ministry of agriculture for cane, the branches of the Ministry of Education and the Ministry of Higher Education as well as other organizations involved in sugar production.

The provincial branches must be basic elements of ATAC to consolidate the provincial unity of the members and develop scientific and technical activities in coordination with the intermediate and advanced technical education centers, the research centers and the sugar production leadership systems. In this way, they will be a creative source and means of selection of proposals for national and international congresses and papers of general interest to be published in REVISTA ATAC.

Naturally, a provincial branch will cause a certain amount of administrative work and communication with the members so it requires:

a) Professional personnel;

b) Payment of salaries to this personnel with funds from the branch itself; and

c) A site for the branch office.

Resolution

ATAC, as a multiprofessional entity that has contributed to the improvement and advancement of sugar production for more than 50 years, has the obligation to strengthen itself through the creation of the fundamental bases for its development throughout the country.

To make this possible, it is necessary to establish an organizational structure capable of creating an active association nationally.

Taking the above into consideration, it is necessary to adopt measures:

1. To create provincial branches of ATAC within 1 or 2 years;

2. To publicize the objective of these branches among the members, pointing out the significance that they will have for them;

3. To make the necessary negotiations viable through the executive committee of ATAC for minimal support from the governing organs of agriculture and the sugar industry in order to create these branches;

4. To study and define the financing that will be established for these branches and the central leadership of ATAC;

5. To appoint a negotiating committee of members in each province, preferably made up by those who have participated in two or more conferences and who represent all the official or private entities necessary for the materialization of this objective;

6. To appoint a committee of members of the executive committee of ATAC to be in charge of activities concerning the creation of the branches; and

7. To stimulate nationally, through the conferences, the branches with the best research and organizational work and with the largest participation in technical activities.

3. On National, International and Provincial Conferences

Thesis

When ATAC held its first annual conference in Havana in 1927, 24 papers in three technical sections were discussed.

This event was held annually beginning that year until 1961, a total of 35 conferences.

From then until 1979, only seven conferences have been held: in 1965, 1967, 1969, 1970, 1972, 1977 and 1979. It can be observed that there was a lapse of 4 years between the conferences of 1961 and 1965 and 5 years between those of 1972 and 1977. Nevertheless, the situations in these periods were very different; this can be expressed numerically.

Conference	Year	Number of Technical Sections	Total Papers Discussed
34	1960	4	15
35	1961	3	8
36	1965	5	34
37	1967	4	50
38	1969	7	57
39	1970	7	135
40	1972	7	264
41	1977	8	200

The reasons there were no conferences between 1972 and 1977 were explained in the introduction of this article. After the 39th conference, an agreement was adopted to hold this event biennially, given its high cost because of the size it had acquired. This is demonstrated by the increase in technical sections and the number of papers presented.

Before the revolution, ATAC's participation in international events was limited to the occasional presence of a member who attended on his own or with the economic support of an institution. This cannot be considered as real participation by ATAC.

Starting in 1971, delegations have been sent to the congresses of ISSCT [International Society of Sugar-Cane Technicians] and the Sugar Technicians Associations of Mexico and Jamaica. This participation can be summarized as follows:

a) 14th ISSCT Congress in Louisiana in 1971--delegation of 19 comrades headed by comrade Rafael Francia Mestre. This had great political importance since the entire delegation was arrested in U.S. territory and prevented from participating in the congress.

b) 15th ISSCT Congress in South Africa in 1974--delegation of 24 comrades also headed by comrade Francia Mestre. It presented 11 papers of which 7 were accepted and discussed.

c. 10th ISSCT Congress in Brazil in 1977--delegation of 15 comrades headed by comrade Raul Trujillo. Eight of the 17 papers presented by ATAC were discussed.

d. ATAM conferences--5th conference in 1975 attended by a delegation of three members; 7th conference in 1977 with a delegation of three members; 8th conference in 1978 with a delegation of three members who presented and received approval for four proposals; and 9th conference in 1979 with a delegation of four members.

e. Conference of Sugar Technicians Association of Jamaica--held in 1973 and attended by a delegation of 10 members who presented five proposals.

The above shows that the activity concerning national and international conferences has increased noticeably in the present decade.

Its international influence has also become greater due to the fact that, beginning with the national conference in 1967, the participation of foreign guests has fluctuated between 30 and 120. There are no data about this before 1959.

The national conferences, together with REVISTA ATAC, constitute the only ties between ATAC and its associates; therefore, the need to strengthen these ties in any way possible is obvious. It should be pointed out that a provincial conference was held in Las Villas before the 41st conference.

The quality of the papers discussed showed some decline due to the massiveness of the 40th conference. At that time, committees to review admission were established and this resulted in stricter scientific requirements for the proposals presented at subsequent conferences. The committees have been particularly demanding as to research basis and the possible applications of results.

A fundamental problem with the conferences is the great delay in publishing the reports. The present situation is as follows: 39th conference--two of the three volumes of the report have been published; 40th conference--there are six volumes at the publishing organ of the Ministry of Culture; and 41st conference--the originals have not yet been printed.

Until now it has not been possible to expedite the printing of these reports but their contents become less interesting with time.

Financing of the events has been handled differently in recent years. At the 40th conference, all expenses were paid by ATAC and MINAZ. At the 41st conference, with a changing economic situatio , the members had to pay an admission fee of 20 pesos and ATAC paid for their room and board. At the 42nd conference, the admission fee was reduced to 10 pesos but the members had to pay for their own living expenses while at the event. In the future a uniform system for all national conferences must be established.

Resolution

After analyzing the background of the different events held by ATAC and those in which it is represented by members, it is considered appropriate to put the following measures into practice:

1. To hold an ATAC national conference biennially and to study this situation again after 1983. This will permit a 43rd conference in 1981 and careful preparation for the 18th congress since our country was accepted again as its site.

2. To hold provincial conferences every 2 years or less, sponsored by the branches and supported by the ATAC central leadership as a way to stimulate the participation of members at all levels. This would make it feasible to select the sugar production topics that are of the greatest interest for each province for these conferences. The best papers would be selected for presentation at the national conference and publication in REVISTA ATAC.

3. To hold provincial scientific and technical distribution activities, selecting subjects on which the best specialists in the province itself or those invited from other provinces have written.

4. To draw up a foreign currency plan for ATAC annually based on the international events to which it should send delegations. Because of the particular characteristics of these expenses, there should be mechanisms to permit ATAC to present its plan directly to the Sugar Office of the Central Planning Board so that this organization can make the allocation to ATAC within the MINAZ framework.

5. To acquire the mechanisms to quickly distribute the papers discussed in the national conferences to the members. One alternative proposed is to publish summaries and distribute them to the members. They could obtain complete copies of the papers they were interested in at a suitable price.

6. To continue the admission fees for the national conferences as necessary income to pay the expenses that they incur.

7. To establish procedures to make recommendations at the end of each conference to the appropriate organizations concerning the convenience of applying the results of technical papers that have merited general approval because of their technical and economic usefulness.

8. To guarantee that all delegates to international sugar technology events be members of ATAC for at least 2 years actively and have adequate technical and scientific ability.

9. To offer help to ATAC members by providing technical means for the preparation of papers for the different conferences and extensive publicity about the different technical events to which they can submit their papers.

10. To grant prizes and awards to stimulate the best authors and papers at the conferences.

4. On Incorporation of Technicians in ATAC, Support of Central State Organizations

Thesis

In the years just before the triumph of the revolution, ATAC had 900 to 1,000 members who, according to the imprecise data available, were distributed as follows:

	Percentage
Advanced-level professionals	42
Intermediate-level professionals	37
Others	21

After the short period of decline at the beginning of the 1960's and after encouragement of incorporation of new technicians trained by the revolution, the number of members totaled more than 2,000. Now there is a peculiar situation. The number of registered members is 2,467 but only 1,500 to 1,600 fulfill all the requirements each year as to payment of annual dues.

Many of those who have not paid pay the dues for several years as conferences approach. Others do not and are expelled. The composition of the members now is as follows:

	Percentage
Advanced-level professionals	42
Intermediate-level professionals	51
Leaders and administrative personnel	3
Those not classified as technicians	2
Others	1

There is another fact that is not decisive but is significant--the absence from ATAC of technicians from very important branches like transportation and human resources with its different specializations. There is no logical explanation for this, particularly since transportation is a technical activity that started with sugar production.

The need to stabilize membership and to channel ATAC activities based on the composition of its members is obvious since these have specific interests. There are substantial differences, for example, between an intermediate-level professional who works in production and a specialist who works in research. It is also necessary to determine the reasons the technical branches mentioned above are not represented in the membership.

Active and consistent participation by all the associates will make ATAC more of an organ of support to the entire sugar production sector. This can be achieved if ATAC in turn receives the necessary support from the official organizations which would contribute to the incorporation and stabilization of the membership.

Resolution

Based on the above, it is necessary:

1. To promote the incorporation of sugar technicians in ATAC through:

a) The realization of technical and scientific activities in the provinces which would also serve as propaganda;

b) The creation of nuclei of activists in organizations and educational centers directly related to sugar production; and

c) The establishment of ties with the leadership organs of cadres and training organs of the organizations as a way to stimulate participation of specialized personnel in ATAC activities.

2. To advocate that the information contained in REVISTA ATAC as well as in the national conferences and in the different activities developed in the country be balanced based on the composition of the members and their specific interests.

3. To stimulate the creativity of the intermediate-level professionals and to advocate the distribution of their papers through REVISTA ATAC, provincial conferences or activities and the national conference.

4. To provide technical information through bulletins or similar simple printing means which would keep all the members up-to-date.

5. To stimulate the creation of local organizations in those centers where conditions permit it.

5. On Propaganda and Publicity

Thesis

Propaganda and publicity are basic elements of modern society which contribute to the increase of knowledge, greater control over life situations, ideological formation and cultural development. In the particular case of ATAC, these elements should be devoted toward two main objectives:

a) To publicize and accredit the association; and

b) To aid scientific and technical development in the Cuban sugar sector which is its major raison d'etre.

Until 1972, the means of publicity used by ATAC were its bulletin, begun in 1942, the reports of the conferences and the conferences themselves. The REVISTA ATAC has been published for the past 8 years. It now has a defined form and is properly balanced in content. It fulfills its objective of contributing to the development of technicians and specialists of the Cuban sugar sector. It publicizes selected technical papers and reports on the main events of interest to ATAC members in particular and its reading public in general. It focuses on the most important aspects of cane agriculture, production technology, transportation, research and the marketing of sugar and its derivatives. In general, it is considered one of the best specialized magazines in the country.

In other countries that produce cane sugar, there are specialized magazines which are mainly commercial and their contents are essentially technical; INTERNATIONAL SUGAR JOURNAL (United Kingdom) and SUGAR JOURNAL (United States) are the most important. Many others are published in countries that produce sugar beets. Of the socialist countries, SUGAR INDUSTRY (USSR), LISTY CUCROVISKY (Czechoslovakia) and CUKORIPAR (Hungary) provide extensive technical information on the research, problems and advances in all activities related to sugar production. In the capitalist countries, the most important are LE SUCRERIE BELGUE (Belgium), LE SUCRERIE FRANCAISE (France) and ZUCKER INDUSTRIE (FRG) which are very similar to those published in the sugar-cane countries.

ATAC propaganda has restrictions. Its means are REVISTA ATAC, the conferences, the reports and occasionally press articles and press conferences. The situation of the publishing delay of the reports has already been explained; this unquestionably diminishes its effectiveness as a means of communication. It is hard to change this situation since the polygraphic enterprises of the Ministry of Culture use all their available production capacity.

Therefore, other means for propaganda and publicizing ATAC activities among its members must be used; they do not necessarily have to be printed material. Also REVISTA ATAC can acquire a more concrete nature as ATAC's press organ.

Resolution

Since the need to strengthen propaganda and publicity as a function of ATAC is obvious and any means that helps fulfill this objective should be used, the following measures should be adopted:

1. To present television panels organized by ATAC in coordination with the ICRT [Cuban Institute of Radio and Television] regularly in order to explain, analyze and discuss the advances and technical and economic plans of the sugar industry, with members who are selected for their knowledge of the subjects discussed participating in such panels.

2. To organize a special television panel after the national conferences to examine the most important proposals, pointing out their basic aspects and their significance for the economy and progress of the country.

3. To organize conferences sponsored by ATAC in which its members discuss experiences from trips abroad, attendance at congresses, etc.

4. To propose that 4 November, the birthday of scientist Alvaro Reynoso and Sugar-Cane Day, become Sugar Technician Day. Its celebration would include commemorative ceremonies and visits to places of interest for the members such as research centers, new factories, etc., with adequate publicity by the mass media.

5. To make REVISTA ATAC the official organ of ATAC in order to define its objectives and principles more directly.

6. To include reports on knowledge and experience acquired in trips abroad in REVISTA ATAC. Written reports should be required from all members who travel abroad representing ATAC and voluntary reports should be obtained from those who travel with study missions.

7. To regulate publication of technical articles in REVISTA ATAC, establishing limits in the number of graphs, tables and other illustrations since these often take up more space than the text, making comprehension difficult, limiting the opportunity to publish more articles and increasing publishing costs.

8. To create a correspondence section in REVISTA ATAC to which readers can send their opinions and suggestions. This will help direct REVISTA ATAC toward the main interests of the members.

6. On ATAC Work with New Advanced-Level Specialists in the Sugar Sector

Thesis

After the triumph of the revolution and the departure of a number of technicians who were ATAC members, the incorporation of new technicians trained by the revolution led to a new stage of work in ATAC as explained in the introduction.

In this new stage, there has been enthusiastic and important participation in the ATAC conferences by the CES [Higher Educational Institutions] through collective as well as individual papers presented by the teachers and students in recent years. In general, these papers have been of very good quality and have helped maintain and increase the scientific and technical level of these events. This has been one of the elements that has helped some of those enrolled in the CES to have some knowledge of the industry, cane agriculture and the association itself when they start to work in sugar activities.

These new workers usually request admission to ATAC immediately if they are not already members. Another important segment of those enrolled have not had this opportunity either because of the location of their CES or because the specialties that they have studied have not been fully represented in ATAC. This may also be because there has not been a clear and systematic policy about this important source of income, strengthening and improvement of ATAC. Mechanisms that would permit these young technicians to have immediate knowledge and incorporation into ATAC activities are not implemented.

There is no question that the strengthening of ATAC, the expansion of propaganda and publicity and measures to achieve these objectives, the creation of provincial branches and provincial events should contribute to more effective work by ATAC with the new specialists in sugar activities. Nevertheless, new ways should be found and a well-structured policy established concerning the attention ATAC should give to the new young advanced-level specialists.

The number of students and CES has grown at an impressive rate since the triumph of the revolution. The sugar industry alone expects to have more than 12,000 advanced-level specialists by the end of the 5-year period 1981-85. Three sugar specialties are developed now in different CES: sugar technology, sugar mechanics and sugar agroindustry. The development of three new specialties has been approved: fermentation and animal nutrition, technology of bagasse industrialization and sugar thermal energy. They should be taught beginning with the 1980-81 and 1981-82 school years. In coordination with the Ministry of Higher Education, the creation of an advanced sugar technical institute in which the above specialties will be taught is being studied.

By 1985, there will be an enrollment of 5,000 students in the different CES in sugar specialties alone. If the enrollments of the advanced agricultural institutes and the different specialties that are not in the sugar sector but influence that sector like electrical energy, automatic control, industrial economics, chemistry, etc., are added, we see the importance of the CES and the new specialists in the sugar sector for its development and the development of its association, ATAC.

Resolution

Because of the above, it is necessary:

1. To create local sections of ATAC at the different CES which would be directly under provincial branches. The presidents of these local sections would be members of the provincial committees where the CES are located.

2. To develop effective publicity, scientific and technical events and other activities in the CES directed by the local sections in coordination with the FEU [Federation of University Students] and CES authorities will publicize ATAC and permit active participation by the teachers and students in ATAC papers and conferences.

3. To coordinate with the corresponding levels so that the production practices and diploma work of the advanced-level students are connected and can serve as the basis for proposals or other papers presented at the conferences and other ATAC events. There should also be coordination with the CES to achieve effective participation of ATAC members in the scientific events and conferences of these institutions.

4. The procedures and means to permit rapid incorporation and participation in ATAC of the new advanced-level specialists assigned to the sugar sector should be implemented. Extensive information on the objectives and work of the association should be given to them, visits to its installations organized and exchanges and conferences with the most prestigious ATAC leaders and members promoted.

5. To allow student members who will have reduced dues, permitting them to participate in ATAC activities and work which will help them in their future integration to work in the sugar sector.

BOURGEOIS ECONOMIC THEORIES LABELED MYTHS

Havana VERDE OLIVO in Spanish 10 Aug 80 pp 42-45

/Article by Raul Martell: "International Economic Relations: Myths and Fables About Bourgeois Theories"/

/Text/ The development of productive forces and production relations in this century dictate greater specialization and cooperation in the field of production among the nations of the world.

The objective laws on the development of modern production determine the imperative need for every country to achieve optimum participation in world production.

In response to this objective situation commercial relations among nations gain importance and interdependence and interrelation among the nations of the world increase.

Today international economic relations have become the cornerstone of economic development for all countries, especially for underdeveloped countries whose dependence on foreign trade is significant.

Bourgeois Concepts on Foreign Trade Theory

Since their inception the objective of the different bourgeois theories and concepts on foreign trade has been to sanction capitalist relations of exploitation in the international foreign trade market.

From the viewpoint of bourgeois economists from Adam Smith to J.K. Galbraith, the international division of labor essentially is the result of natural conditions in each country.

In no other area of economic theory do we see so clearly the inability of classical liberal bourgeois theory to provide a coherent explanation of existing reality than in the problems of development and foreign trade. An attempt is being made to apply the belief that capitalism is a socio-economic formula through which national economies can attain optimum equilibrium to international economic relations, to international foreign trade.

The classical liberal economists espoused their principles based on the inflexible and optimum division of international capitalist labor as the eternal formula for international economic ties among the various nations of the world.

This is implicit in writings ranging from Adam Smith's theories of comparative advantage to the apologist's ideas of FRG economist N. Klotin, who attempts to distort the demands of the underdeveloped nations, with respect to the need to restructure international economic relations, by proclaiming that these demands contradict the basic principles of the world economy and free trade which allegedly can guarantee, automatically, the perfect distribution of the means of production.

At present certain changes and adaptations are being made to the classical bourgeois theories of international economic relations to bring them in line with the pressing problems posed by the injustice of the existing economic world order today.

The classical theory of costs or comparative advantage of well-known English economist David Ricardo (1722-1823) plays an important role in the present bourgeois focus on international economic relations. His ideas are still considered as the general theoretical basis for the study of the problems of the international division of labor and international trade.

Ricardo was a prolific writer and social activists during the first quarter of the 19th Century. A long period of understanding the problems of capitalism begun by his contemporary William Petty ended in England with Ricardo.

The period in which Ricardo conducted his activities was without a doubt one of profound changes in the development of capitalism in England. Britain became the most highly industrialized nation in the world. His articles flooded almost the entire world market. Commerce reached unprecedented levels in England.

As a result, Ricardo's work has as its objective to explain this situation by relying on the theory of comparative advantage or costs. This "classical" theory still continues to be the general principle, the point of departure for the study of the problems of the international division of labor and foreign trade from alleged scientific bases, according to bourgeois theorists.

Although the theory of comparative costs uses purely empirical and superficial economic categories, such as the factors of production, their relative disposition and cost, it is still generally recognized as possessing some of the traits of international trade and the international division of labor, characteristics of a capitalist economy. It actually has been proved that the comparative level of production costs in the various countries influences in a specific way the division of labor and the structure of foreign trade.

The theory of comparative costs is based on the idea that a country not only enjoys absolute advantages, as Adam Smith said, to specialize in the production of a specific product, but that the significant factor for the country involved will be the comparative advantage it enjoys in the production of one good over another.

According to Ricardo the decision to specialize in the production of a certain item is based on a comparison of the labor costs necessary to produce the product domestically as opposed to the cost of importing it. Therefore, each country should produce those products whose cost of production is less than the cost of importing them. Thus each country will produce those goods where it enjoys a comparative advantage over another country.

Generally, each country enjoys a relative advantage where the production of goods involves the "production factor" (capital, land and labor) which it has in relative abundance. Ricardo believed that the optimum specialization of every country would be determined by lower labor costs measured in terms of the time required to produce a certain item.

The general conclusion drawn from this theory is that in international trade, which is the result of the international division of labor, no country benefits at the expense of the others, unequal trading does not exist, there is no competition, no blockading, trade embargoes and so forth and, in the end, all countries enjoy advantages in their international trade relations.

The trademark of Ricardo's theory is that each country has something to gain by specializing on the basis of comparative advantage and that it also makes joint gains because of the lower labor costs in a specialized structure as opposed to an autocratic one.

In order for this self-regulated system to work effectively, an extra-economic base is required to allow it to develop without interference.

In this way Ricardo's theory raises the issue of free trade, the free play of supply and demand, as the ideal form for international trade policy. Obviously, such a policy was in complete keeping with the interests of English capitalism which was quite widespread at that time.

Thus England practiced this policy before any other nation in the world. In England industrial capitalism finds in the state the greatest support for eliminating the restrictions which mercantilism placed on the expansion of the markets for the new industries.

Thus began a new phase in the history of economic relations among nations: The era of free trade, the basis for all Anglosaxon economic theories from David Ricardo to Lord John Maynard Keynes.

The principle of free trade is defined as that aspect of economic relations where it is possible to engage in international trade without concern for trade restrictions, significant import tariffs and where no serious obstacles exist to the movement of the so-called production factors (especially capital and labor).

Together with the theory of comparative advantage, free trade is the centerpiece of the principles contained in the bourgeois view of international economic relations.

The theory of comparative advantage is the bourgeois formula which is supposed to provide the guidelines for specialization in a given country and free trade is the manner in which said country operates in practice. This is the result of the following hypothesis: A country specializes according to its comparative advantage in the production of some specific good and, as a result, it should engage in free trade as a general rule of foreign economic policy.

The practice of this kind of absolutely free international trade has never existed, not even when the concept was introduced.

Different periods are recognized as having had some semblance of free trade, in keeping with prevailing international conditions of peace or war, of interference or increase in trade and so forth.

Since free trade is closely tied to the level of development and competition attained by a country, its importance is in direct relation to a nation's capabilities for controlling the market. This was England's case during Ricardo's time, but as soon as it consolidated its economic and trade position England opted for an open protectionist policy.

The Economic Declaration adopted at the Sixth Conference of Nonaligned Nations held in Havana in 1972 states that: "The conference expressed its deep displeasure over the protectionist measures which certain developed countries have introduced in recent years, especially in sectors where the comparative advantage was altered in favor of developing countries where there were possibilities for industrial growth..." The declaration adds: "The Conference reiterated that developed countries should eliminate existing protectionist and other barriers, refrain from creating new ones and create policies and make the necessary adjustments and modifications..."

Furthermore, the protectionist measures applied by the United States greatly affect trade in Latin America and the Caribbean. It is estimated that sugar cane producers in the area lose $650 million as a result of the restrictive policy employed by the United States. In addition to sugar cane, meats, shoes, textiles and steel are also affected by U.S. protectionist tariffs. But the most severely affected is sugar. Such Caribbean nations as Jamaica, Guyana, Barbados, Trinidad-Tobago and St. Kitts-Nevis, among others, have received only 3 cents, a price that is well below real production costs.

Other sectors such as copper, lead, zinc, tomatoes, textiles and shoes have also been seriously affected. These products are exports from Argentina, Brazil, Bolivia, Chile, Colombia, Honduras, Peru, Mexico and Uruguay.

At present the bourgeois theories of trade and international economic relations, starting from Ricardo's theory of comparative advantage, state that we are experiencing a "new kind of international division of labor" between the developed capitalist nations and the underdeveloped nations.

Some bourgeois theories such as those espoused by G. Fels and N. Kloten of the FRG state that underdeveloped countries should direct their economies towards the production of relatively low-cost agricultural and industrial products which are labor intensive and/or employ large quantities of raw materials.

In short, we find ourselves on the verge of replacing the former capitalist division of international labor, which was colonialist in scope, with a new division of international labor that could be called neocolonialist in keeping with the views and visions of the world held by the new capitalist monopolies.

Referring to this matter at the 34th Session of the General Assembly, Commander in Chief Fidel Castro said: "The developing nations reject the notion that their acceptance of the unjust and arbitrary division of international labor imposed by modern colonialism, following the Industrial Revolution in England, and expanded by imperialism means 'interdependence.'"

The new division of international labor espoused by the major developed capitalist countries reflects the desire of these imperialist states to make the slow process of industrialization existing in many underdeveloped nations work in their favor.

The neocolonialist international division of labor today condemns underdeveloped countries, although in new ways, to continue playing the role of economic appendages (not only as farmers and producers of raw materials but also as agroindustrialists or producers and suppliers of raw materials), although this international division of labor is still, in practice, an aspiration because underdeveloped countries do not as yet produce 9 percent of total world production in manufactured goods.

At his historic speech at the United Nations, Fidel, as president of the Nonaligned Nations Movement, said the following on this subject: "Our dependence is once again expressed by the fact that the nations of Asia, Africa and Latin America import 26.1 percent of all manufactured goods on the world market and export only 6.3 percent." In another part of his speech the commander in chief added: "The developed nations with market economies today absorb over 85 percent of the world's manufactured goods, including high technology industrial production. They also control over 83 percent of all industrial exports. Some 26 percent of these exports go to developing nations whose markets they control. The most serious aspect of this structure of dependence is that our imports are manufactured according to the demands, the needs and the technology of the more highly developed countries..."

These statements contribute in a theoretical and practical way to the struggle against the current bourgeois theories of international economic relations which have as their objective to justify and support the actions of the monopolies and the transnational companies. The modern bourgeois theories reflect the aspirations of the developed capitalist states to limit and take advantage of the process of industrialization in some of the underdeveloped nations and channel it to areas that are more advantageous to the developed capitalist economies.

USE OF THERMOELECTRIC POWER DISCUSSED

Havana JUVENTUD TECNICA in Spanish Apr 80 pp 66-69

[Article by Pedro Diaz Hernandez]

[Text] Why is the peaceful utilization of atomic energy in Cuba necessary, especially in the field of generating electricity?

Generally in the developing countries the introduction of nuclear energy becomes a vital necessity for development, due to the present situation of fossil fuels, whose reserves are diminishing daily and which, at the rate of their increasing use in energy, industry and modern life, are expected to be depleted in a relatively short time. This means, therefore, a rise in their costs, creating an unfavorable situation for those countries which do not produce them and which find themselves daily under more pressure. These include the majority of the underdeveloped countries.

Studies made in several countries indicate that the cost of generating electricity from nuclear energy is considerably less than the cost of electric power from other sources investigated. The figures we obtained recently as part of the evaluation of the nuclear program of one underdeveloped country showed that the cost of nuclear-generated electricity in 1987 for a 600-MWe plant will be 40 percent less than that of a plant of equal capacity which uses petroleum for fuel.

Among other advantages, nuclear energy offers the possibility of bringing the source of energy--that is, the plant--closer to the consumer, within the limits of safety, thus reducing greatly the losses incurred in transmitting electricity over long distances. In addition, those plants do not have their location determined by the proximity of mining centers, fuels or ports of embarkation--as is true of other, conventional, coal or petroleum plants or hydroelectric plants, which must necessarily be close to the sources of water --and therefore the amount of fuel to be transported is small and is only transported once a year.

We could mention other advantages such as: the CEN's [nuclear energy centers] do not pollute the environment, provided they are developed under safe conditions, with adequate protection against radioactive leaks. Now, the introduction of nuclear energy into a developing country is a delicate situation for the following reasons, which we are not going to analyze here: the cost of the basic investments, availability of the CEN and the use of nuclear fuel.

Present Conditions for Introducing CEN's into the National Electrical Energy System and Prospects for Its Development

In 1972 a plan was approved for the construction of our country's first CEN, and, in 1974, the Cuban Atomic Energy Commission was created, due precisely to the need to promote and spread the peaceful use of nuclear energy.

Cuba does not yet have a sufficiently trained group of specialists in this field and therefore must maintain an adequate rate of training of cadres to permit achievement of its immediate objectives with a view to expanding the use of nuclear energy to other branches of industry and to scientific research. The situation is very different now from that of 1958. Our fraternal relations with socialist countries and especially with the USSR allows us to count on efficient and disinterested technical assistance.

As everyone knows, Cuba has no known exploitable reserves of fossil fuels, nor has it been able to exploit water power, since it lacks water resources. In addition, from the geographic point of view, Cuba is very distant from the rest of the socialist countries, and therefore it is not possible to utilize the new methods of transportation, such as the big oil and gas pipelines; rather it is forced to use many resources to bring these products here in huge tankers, which leads to other problems, such as the unloading of the fuel, transportation, etc.

If we take into account the increase in the national demand for energy consumption, these problems become more and more acute due to the development of industry, our broad plans for the construction of social projects and population growth. This demand at present is for approximately 9 million tons of petroleum. For this reason we must find a solution of these problems, and the best solution is the introduction of nuclear energy, which is basic and urgent for the generation of electricity.

These factors, along with the forecast of the country's capacity for generating electrical energy by 1985--which will be about 3,500 to 4,000 MWe--justify the introduction of a 440-MWe CEN into the national system, without affecting the stability of that system (this would not represent more than 10-15 percent of the total installed capacity).

To cite one example which will aid in understanding these problems we have discussed, we would like to repeat some data taken from a leaflet published by the MIE [Ministry of the Electric Power Industry] Information Center, entitled "Man and the Atom" ["El hombre y el atomo"], edited by a group of specialists, which states, "Nuclear fuel is partially renewed once a year. A weight of 25 tons in fuel elements equals 750,000 tons of petroleum, or, 15 voyages of a 50,000-ton tanker."

The CEN to be installed in our country will have in operation (by the end of the second 5-year period or the beginning of the third) a 440-MWe core [bloque] (VVER-440 Reactor). These CEN's have proved to be the most trustworthy to date, and the Soviets have had good experience in their construction, assembly and development, which is the main reason they were selected.

We believe that in the future nuclear energy will constitute a substantial part of the electric energy generated in our country. That is what the forecasts indicate, where it is stated that for the decade 1990-2000, it will represent more than 50 percent of the total installed capacity predicted for those years.

All this means that our state must confront huge tasks in carrying out the plan for the development of electrification through nuclear energy and forming cadres capable of assimilating this modern technology from the scientific and technical point of view, as well as being ready to contribute to the investigation of new sources of energy capable of satisfying the growing demands of the Cuban people.

The development of the peaceful utilization of atomic energy in Cuba, especially in the field of electric energy [with the implementation of the first 440-MWe core of the CEN in Cienfuegos scheduled for the end of the second 5-year period) is nothing more than the result of the socialist path followed by our revolution throughout this period, along with the mutual aid of the USSR and other socialist countries.

This is an encouraging experience for poor nations and shows socialism and economic integration into the socialist community as the only way to achieve the levels demanded by modern science and in particular, nuclear energy, to be utilized for the benefit of man.

TIME FOR LATIN AMERICA TO ACHIEVE 'REAL' INDEPENDENCE

PA170254 San Salvador VOZ DE LA VERDAD in Spanish 1835 GMT 16 Sep 80

[Editorial: "Independence Means No Intervention, No Domination"]

[Text] Another independence day has been commemorated. We do not say it was celebrated because it was not celebrated due to the violent situation we are experiencing. It was not celebrated because independence is not a fait accompli but a process that we must complete.

It would have been fitting on this date to explain how the public debt is leading us to certain domination, just as if foreign countries were allowed to intervene in our country's policy. After marking independence day throughout Central America, international news agencies ran two items today which seem contradictory at first glance. On the one hand, efforts are being made to condemn Cuba for its alleged intervention in Latin America. On the other hand, the news that the United States is not discarding the possibility of sending troops to Central America seems to be true. This, too, is brazen monstrous intervention.

Against which intervention are we fighting? Will the OAS condemn the United States for intervening too?

In a commentary yesterday we said the government and not just the foreign minister should issue a clear statement on the U.S. intention to send army troops to Central America. The church is opposed to any intervention as Pope John Paul II stated when he asked for no intervention in the case of Poland. He said the natural right of every nation to self-determination should be upheld. Medellin [the site of the second meeting of the Latin American Episcopal conference in Colombia in 1968] also opposed intervention by any imperialism or nation some time ago.

The following are phrases from the Puebla message to Latin America [issued at the third meeting of the Latin American Episcopal conference which closed in Puebla, Mexico on 13 February 1979] noting the urgent need to build a civilization of love: the civilization of love rejects submission and dependence which are detrimental to the dignity of Latin America. We do not accept the status of being a satellite of any nation in the world or its ideology. We want to live fraternally with everybody because we repudiate narrowminded and unyielding nationalism.

It is time for Latin America to warn the developed countries not to render us immobile, not to obstruct our progress, not to exploit us but to help us magnaninously to overcome the barriers of our underdevelopment, respecting our culture, our principles, our sovereignty, our identity and our natural resources. With these criteria we will grow together as brothers of the same universal family. These should be the criteria for real independence. When will we achieve it?

INTERNATIONAL JURISTS DECRY JUNTA VIOLATIONS

PA211911 Managua Radio Sandino in Spanish 0300 GMT 20 Sep 80

[Excerpts] The Salvadoran junta is carrying out a war of genocide against the people, a commission of the International Association of Jurists has said.

The Commission of the International Association of Jurists accredited by the United Nations and made up of Luis Quintero and Professor Gerard (Truvi) has denounced the violation of human rights in El Salvador in a news conference.

The Christian Democratic junta is engaged in a war of genocide against the people, the commission noted.

Quintero and Gerard [name as heard] are members of the commission which visited El Salvador recently. They were investigating the case of the 17 Salvadoran union leaders arrested by the genocidal government. They said that they were not allowed to see the union leaders, who are accused of illegal possession of weapons and disruption of public order.

They said that their organization is willing to help the union leaders on the basis of the human rights which all persons must have. They also said that El Salvador is experiencing a wave of terror generated by the junta and that the armed forces are continually repressing the people.

The two commission members said that there are two refugee camps which attend to the needs of more than 6,000 people. One of these camps is being run by the church and the other by the state. The first camp is made up of persons who are fleeing the army's genocidal repression. Most are children. The hygienic conditions there are very bad and the children need medicine. The other camp is made up of people who have fled liberated territories.

Regarding the occupation of the OAS office, they said that they agree with the guerrillas' demands which include the release of political prisoners. They said that the armed forces started to attack the occupants in the OAS offices but that they did not because of government orders.

The Salvadoran junta cannot control the situation. Its back is against the wall. The state of siege is constant. Clean-up operations are the order of the day and many youths are arrested and tied up as a result of them.

We will now listen to part of the statements made by Luis Quintero, commissioner of the International Association of Jurists:

[Begin recording] We could see how the vehicles filled with soldiers went by at the moment we went into the building. When we got out of the building they were standing guard in the corners. We did not have to search to see the spectacle of the armed forces and the national guard fulfilling their repressive tasks. They are all over the place. We could see how they captured Salvadoran youths, tied their hands and took they away.

A high government official admitted that there are rightist paramilitary groups that are working jointly with the national guard and the armed forces in the extermination tasks. He said that these joint paramilitary actions had been investigated and that punitive measures had been applied. He spoke about the reforms that the government is trying to implement for the benefit of the people. However, when asked why we had to witness what we did witness concerning persecutions, repression and terror against the people when the people are supposedly the beneficiaries of these reforms, he explained that this is due to the fact that the reforms have not been implemented because the leftist groups, so he said, are hindering the agrarian, the banking and the other reforms.

Regarding the refugees and the two camps in the country, the Catholic camp is the only camp in which there is a remote possibility for survival. The armed forces go into those places and take with them whomever they please. The camp we visited at the archbishopric was being raided by military units as we were departing the country. Unfortunately, we were at the airport when this occurred.

This camp is the target of hostile actions by the armed forces which with their helicopters and armored vehicles carry out these actions just to scare the people. The people at this camp are also victims of neighbors who shoot at them if they get too close to their land. We could see 22-caliber bullet holes in the camp walls. These bullet holes were made by the civilians who reside nearby.

Regarding the government camp, they are made up of people who have fled the liberated areas. The government picks up the people who do not agree with those who liberated their areas and takes them to this camp. [end recording]

PA150224 Panama City ACAN in Spanish 1841 GMT 14 Sep 80

[Text] San Salvador, 14 Sep (ACAN-EFE)--According to Msgr Arturo Rivera Y Damas, apostolic administrator of San Salvador, the increase in terrorist activities calls for rejection of the leftist groups, but he also demanded less corruption and greater respect for human rights from the authorities.

In today's homily, the prelate said that the intensification of violence has been one of the week's most outstanding developments. This, he said, "seems to represent the intention of those (leftist) groups to stop at nothing in order to attain political power."

According to Rivera Y Damas, it is obvious that the extreme left does not care much about the people's support and is relying more on the force of arms to seize power in this country.

"Their (terrorist) activities are gaining them the repudiation of several sectors," the bishop warned.

Rivera Y Damas also commented on the conclusion of the crisis between the two colonels who, along with three civilians, comprise the government junta.

In the bishop's opinion, the end of the crisis made it possible to confirm the fact that "by right, power lies with the revolutionary junta."

"But the true exercise of that power still remains to be seen," he added.

"Greater respect for human rights and less corruption in the management of public affairs is needed" in order to be able to salute the power acquired by the junta, Rivera Y Damas added.

The bishop then said that, overall, political observers see a retrogression in the fulfillment of the armed forces proclamation of 15 October 1979 and a greater movement toward the right by the process begun on that date.

On 15 October 1979, Colonels Jaime Abdul Gutierrez and Adolfo Majano overthrew Gen Carlos Humberto Romero, who until then had been president of El Salvador. The two colonels promised to put an end to violence and to implement socioeconomic and political reforms.

In his homily, Rivera Y Damas said that he hopes there is still time to keep those promises.

He also denounced the occupations of Catholic churches by both leftist groups and soldiers.

The bishop then said that certain religious communities on the outskirts of San Salvador are having problems with the government's forces. He also reported that security agents had captured 13 persons, whose whereabouts are not yet known.

The bishop expressed his dissatisfaction over what he termed the military authorities' "indisciminate raids" on churches, as well as over the frequent armed holdups that take place in the capital and the anonymous threats which are issued against citizens who must pay sums of money in exchange for security.

CLAMPDOWN ON DEMONSTRATIONS--The San Salvador archbishopric's legal assistance office has charged the Salvadoran army and national guard with suppressing demonstration by relatives of at least 50 political prisoners on a hunger strike in various Salvadoran jails. According to the complaint, the repressive forces fired on the demonstrators, forcing them to take refuge in El Calvario Church and the Central Market of San Salvador. No casualty figures are available. The legal assistance office charged that last night several national guardsmen broke into the Santa Tecla jail in a bid to abduct four political prisoners on a hunger strike, including Antonio Morales Carbonell, member of the Popular Liberation Forces and son of Antonio Morales Ehrlich, member of the Christian Democratic-Military Junta. There is no doubt that the intention was to make them disappear. [Excerpts] [PA191521 Managua Radio Sandino in Spanish 1200 GMT 19 Sep 80]

NEGATIVE ECONOMIC GROWTH--San Salvador--The civil war has brought chaos to the Salvadoran economy which in the past has been one of the most prosperous in Central America. At the end of August the growth rate decreased by 18 percent. In June, the government junta implemented an emergency plan to halt the worsening of the economic crisis but its estimates have fallen short. In an interview, Economy Undersecretary Oscar Melgar said that our estimates indicated that if we did nothing the decrease in the growth rate would reach 12 percent. With the emergency plan we had hoped to reduce the negative figure to less than 2 percent but the decrease has already reached 18 percent. Economic Integration Undersecretary Arturo Guzman said that we inherited a country in economic chaos. The situation includes a balance of payment deficit, a serious capital drain, a reduction in investments, a drop in agricultural production, a high unemployment rate and factory closings. Melgar explained that there has been a decrease in the gross national product which diplomatic sources estimated at $3.4 billion in 1979. He explained that there are currently no up-to-date figures on it. The private sector and leftist organizations have reported different figures which are not accepted by the government. A spokesman of the Revolutionary Democratic Front has said that the flight of capital which began in 1976 amounts to $2 billion but Melgar said that the highest estimate is $800 million. INDEPENDENCE DAY CELEBRATION--A ceremony was held at the Cuban Institute for Friendship With the Peoples [ICAP] in Havana to commemorate the 159th anniversary of Central America's independence from Spanish colonialism. Present at the ceremony were ICAP officials, the Panamanian ambassador to Cuba, the Nicaraguan charge d'affaires, representatives of Central American parties and revolutionary movements, as well as representatives of Cuban political and mass organizations. A member of the Unified Revolutionary Directorate [DRU] of El Salvador, Rafael Menjivar, spoke during the ceremony and said that last year's celebration at ICAP honored the Nicaraguan revolution, and today the Nicaraguan revolution is a fact. Therefore, he said, today we are very optimistic when we talk about the Salvadoran revolution and we are sure that we will soon take power in El Salvador. Menjivar also said that the unity of the Salvadoran revolutionary movements led by the DRU and the Revolutionary Democratic Front [FDR] will carry out a positive struggle and obtain important results within the next few months. Jorge Gallardo, ICAP vice president, spoke about the long and difficult struggles of the Central American peoples for their independence over a period of a century and a half. As a result of these struggles, he said, the hateful Somozist dynasty was destroyed on 19 July 1979 by the victorious forces of the Sandinist National Liberation Front. Gallardo also condemned the reigns of terror in Guatemala and El Salvador, denounced the plans for a U.S. intervention to crush the popular movement in El Salvador, and urged the progressive governments to help Nicaragua in its national reconstruction task. 'PRENSA LATINA' REPORTS ON INTERVIEW WITH PUCH LEADER

[Interview with Rene Theodore, secretary general of the United Party of Haitian Communists (PUCH), by Alberto Rabilotta, of PRENSA LATINA special service, in Montreal, date not indicated]

[Text] Montreal (PL)--"The present situation in Haiti is characterized by the ever increasing activity of the working class, peasants and some professional sectors in the cities, notably journalists."

That is how the secretary general of the Unified Party of Haitian Communists (PUCH), Rene Theodore, explained the social situation in Haiti, during a long interview in this city.

The worsening of living and working conditions, as well as the lack of job security are ever more obvious, and the only response to the demands of the workers from the Jean Claude Duvalier regime are repression, blackmail and corruption, he said.

He added: "The labor union movement is gaining importance, it is becoming more active and the maneuvers of recovery attempted by the government on the level of labor union leadership are rejected by the actions of the working class."

The communist leader explained that there are also newsmen who promote public opinion opposition to the dictatorship in Haiti and who are increasingly separating themselves from the Duvalier regime.

Speaking slowly and firmly, Theodore said that among the peasants there is also ever growing opposition to the government and actions of community movement against abuses and evictions of peasants by large landowners who do not hesitate to use all means possible to enlarge their properties.

In the cities also there are protests against frequent abuses by the regime's agents and repressive organizations.

As an example of this he mentioned the action of the people of Cap-Haitien who went out into the streets in large numbers to express their disagreement with the abuses suffered by two citizens at the hands of the military commander of the area.

There is also the case of the locality of Valcartier-de-Jeremie whose citizens went out into the streets to express their repudiation of the government because of its refusal of the people's demands in connection with fires in Sainte-Helene.

Regarding the work of the labor union movement, Theodore said that it would be necessary to expand the bases of all labor union associations that recently appeared in Haiti.

He said: "Labor unions must begin a stage of worker solidarity through the organization of a new confederation or labor union that would coordinate collaboration activities throughout the country.

"For their part, professional associations--teachers and physicians among other--must try to organize at the national level and extend to all professions in order to have real representation and be able to defend specific interests of their members," he said.

He went on to say that it would be on the basis of strengthening of these organizations and a very active alliance that the Haitian progressive movement will find the framework for imposing on the country the democratization of public life, and would be able to build a political force that would propose specific goals and carry out basic political changes.

In conclusion he said: "It is also absolutely necessary that all citizens who are aware that the present regime has led the country into bankruptcy and even loss of sovereignty combine their efforts to form a large united anti-Duvalier force able to overcome the dictatorship."

GUATEMALAN VICE PRESIDENT'S RESIGNATION SEEN AS HERALD OF CHAOS

San Pedro Sula LA PRENSA in Spanish 3 Sep 80 p 6

[Article by Amilcar Santamaria in the column "Sintesis": "Villagran's Resignation"]

[Text] Guatemalan Vice President Francisco Villagran Kramer's decision to resign from the office he has held since 1978 by the will of the electorate has taken no one by surprise in Central America.

The fact of the matter is that the distinguished political leader, of social democratic ideology, had such a lack of communication and such conflict with the president of our neighboring nation, Gen Romeo Lucas, that during the last several months they did not speak to each other.

The conflict that divided them--and that has sharply and cruelly split the Guatemalan society--is an apparently irreconcilable difference in views as to the manner of resolving the problems of daily coexistence.

Whereas Dr Villagran, on the one hand, believes that the nation's political, economic and social problems must be resolved through the process of negotiation, making mutual concessions on differences and, above all, through reforms in the archaic productive structures, General Lucas, on the other hand, believes there is only way to deal with protest actions and struggle: through the use of force.

The message sent by the former vice president of Guatemala to the head of the executive branch is dated in Washington D.C., where the distinguished political leader and lawyer is currently staying.

"It is preferable that I resign from here to avoid debates," said Villagran, without revealing through his words whether he will remain in the United States, return to Guatemala, or take up residence in a third country.

Reiterating his stand of inviting the president to reconsider his "hard-line" policy, he said to Lucas Garcia: "...I urge you to reconsider the initial platform we drew up during the (1978) electoral campaign to bring about again a peaceful compromise." The chief executive's reaction to this kind of exhortation is still not known as of this moment.

Edgar Ponce, Villagran's private secretary until Villagran's resignation, said, for his part, to accredited reporters in Guatemala City, that the former vice president adheres to "a position of respect for human rights and for dialog to resolve the nation's problems of reform."

The writer of this column had the opportunity of sharing a few days of political thought and work with Francisco Villagran during the recent Conference of Liberal and Progressive Parties held in Panama some few weeks ago.

During the proceedings, Doctor Villagran presented a very frank report (with hair raising details) on the political situation in Guatemala, underscoring the climate of repression in which the country is living, and highlighting the fact that the ultrarightist circles there are so closely linked with the army and the government that it is impossible to tell where the influence of the one ends and that of the other begins.

We referred in this column to that report of the then vice president, whom we asked--on a personal basis--if he had considered the possibility of resigning his office as Alfonso Robelo, former member of the Nicaraguan Reconstruction Junta, who was also present at that Conference, had done.

Villagran told us that he was already in the final days of his participation in the regime and that, in truth, he had not left it before because he wanted to exhaust all peaceful means and to insist to the very end on the need for a conciliatory strategy based on political, economic and social changes.

He also told us that if this approach failed again, as had his previous overtures, he would end up leaving the government.

As we have seen, he has done that. And from Washington, for two reasons: one, the fundamental one of survival, since the assassins that have taken over the streets of Guatemala City almost certainly would have finished him off, and the other, so that this act of civic protest would have the maximum possible international impact.

His resignation was, for juridical reasons, presented to the National Congress, to which he sent the basic message. To President Lucas he sent a respectful but firm letter in which he invited the president to change his policy.

As things are going in Guatemala (2,000 dead in 1 and 1/2 years for political motives), it is doubtful that Villagran's voice will be heeded.

But the importance of his decision cannot be underestimated. Perhaps (as we hope) that decision will strengthen the position of the country's democratic sectors, which have been hard-hit recently, and encourage them to continue their efforts to obtain a political solution to the great crisis that Guatemala is going through, which, if it is not resolved through negotiation, will end up leading the country into chaos and definitive civil war.

COMMUNIST TAKEOVER IN EL SALVADOR FEARED IF JUNTA SPLITS

San Pedro Sula LA PRENSA in Spanish 5 Sep 80 p 7

[Editorial]

[Text] Even as a delegation of government officials, on their way to Havana, Cuba to take part in a work session of the UN's FAO, were indicating that--very soon--there will be a plebiscite in El Salvador in which the people will be asked whether they want elections in the near future or whether such elections should be put off for about another 4 years, rumors were at the same time rife in the Cuscatlan capital [reference is to San Salvador--see Translator's Note below] that at any moment there could be a coup d'etat.

The question of the Salvadoran elections has been consistently in the forefront since the strong man of the the Revolutionary Junta, Col Jaime Gutierrez, first mentioned that process as a means of restoring peace.

The delegates to whom we have alluded above in this editorial made the cited statement in San Jose, the capital of our sister republic of Costa Rica and added that (if the result of the plebiscite is favorable) the elections could take place toward the end of 1981 or in early 1982.

In their native country, however, the climate has not been receptive to peaceful solutions. To begin with, ultraleftist groups have accused Col Adolfo Majano, considered the most "progressive" member of the Junta, of conspiring against the government itself and of preparing a coup d'etat with the backing of some sectors of the opposition FDR [Revolutionary Democratic Front].

Translator's Note: Cuscatlan was the name of the 15th century capital of the Indian groups that inhabited what is now El Salvador, is still the name of the country's most centrally located department (the capital of which is Cojutepeque), and is still sometimes used familiarly, as in this editorial, as the name of the country.

Paradoxical as it may seem that leftist sectors should denounce an alleged conspiracy against the regime, it is explained--in the harsh Salvadoran political context-- by the feeling on the part of the extreme leftist elements that a coup backed by the social democratic sector would disrupt the possibility of the so-called "final offensive" of Marxism and would perhaps for a long time head off the latter's expansionary progress.

Apart from this, accredited press agencies in this neighboring country have reported that a new conflict has arisen within the Armed Forces, owing to the fact that Col Jaime Gutierrez (probably influenced by the accusations against Majano) has initiated action to remove from their positions of power within the Armed Forces those officers that sympathize with his comrade-in-arms and colleague in the Junta, the fact being that--despite their closeness--the two men hold contrasting views on how El Salvador's economic, political and military problems should be resolved.

To this end, Gutierrez has issued a "general order" reorganizing the officer cadres and commands in various parts of the country. The latter, however, have refused to obey the order, have expressed their support of Majano, and have entrenched themselves in positions of strength.

This all presages ill, for, in addition to the extremely serious problem the Junta is having with the opposition from the extreme left, it is apparently now on the verge of having to face a new conflict: a split within the Armed Forces, a split opposite which the Christian Democratic Party will have to take a stand in favor of either Majano or Gutierrez.

The disturbing thing about all of this is that if the communists in their various guises have been unable to seize power in El Salvador, it has been owing to the fact that the military establishment has been unified despite its minor internal differences.

If this germ of rivalry between the two military leaders thrives, the danger that totalitarianism will take over the country increases significantly.

Reports by the accredited press in Cuscatlan [El Salvador], citing alleged diplomatic sources, assert that it "would be a mistake to try to oust Majano from the Junta," as appears to be Colonel Gutierrez's intent behind the issuing of his order removing from their posts the personnel who back the moderate official.

The ambassadors consulted, who--as is customary--insisted their names not be used, stated that Colonel Majano has been the principal instigator of the agrarian, banking and foreign trade reforms, as well as the strongest advocate of the view that the most productive way to avoid totalitarianism is through social, economic and political change.

Precisely for this reason, these diplomatic sources fear that the disappearance of Majano from the government, should it come about, would lead to a rightward veer of the regime and, eventually, to such an exacerbation of confrontations that the current state of insubordination would degenerate into a full-scale rebellion, the only winners of which would be the agents of totalitarianism.

As can be seen, El Salvador's problems are very serious and are apparently becoming more complicated.

It is a secret to no one that the United States government as well as that of Venezuela have been backing the Revolutionary Junta, with the aim of finding a peaceful solution, and it would not be unlikely that the sources referred to in the dispatches might be located within the embassies of these two countries.

Should this be the case (and there is adequate reason to believe it is), it would be worth the while of these two democratic countries of our continent, which have been encouraging this effort to find an intermediate way between traditional tyrannies and communism, to encourage the Salvadoran Armed Forces to close ranks and struggle against a split. For, if this cancer is allowed to spread within the military establishment, there will be no human force that can prevent the transformation of Cuscatlan into a new satellite of the voracious Soviet imperialism....

PAPER STRESSES NEED FOR DEVELOPING PRIVATE ENTERPRISE

San Pedro Sula LA PRENSA in Spanish 5 Sep 80 p 7

[Commentary: "Failure of the State as Entrepreneur"]

[Text] The president of COHEP, Fernando Lardizabal, interviewed by the Tegucigalpa morning daily EL HERALDO, said on the 4th of this month that the state has failed resoundingly as an entrepreneur while squandering the nation's money.

Asked about the manner in which the public sector has managed those autonomous, semiautonomous and decentralized entities called "enterprises," Lardizabal said that the government "has taken over functions that, because of their nature and their relationship to the national economy, belong more properly in the private sector. The state unquestionably needs certain instrumentalities wherewith to make policy, but at this point I would say it would be worthwhile to make a thorough analysis of all those cases in which the state has taken the liberty of becoming the entrepreneur; for, if we examine them coldly we will note that this adventure has been a total failure."

The COHEP president also maintained that the government has "squandered the funds it could have used to promote another form of development, to fulfill the state's social obligations to the people, and at the same time to sensitize itself to the nation's problems. Instead of the latter, however, it has devoted itself to becoming an entrepreneur and has in the process failed to channel the funds that were allocated to certain projects, diverting them to other uses."

The president of the COHEP was categorical in defining what, in his judgement, must be the businessman's role. The function of private enterprise, he said, "is to make money, and we must be very clear about this."

In his view, "it is by making money that we create revenues for the state, with which the state can create the benefits required to fulfill the state's social function. The social posture which the government would have private enterprise adopt is not properly incumbent upon private enterprise, but rather upon the state."

On this point, he concluded saying that what has occurred is that there exist "a vast number of functions that pertain to the state but that the state is trying to transfer to private enterprise, and this must not be; private enterprise does not function in this manner. As a matter of necessity, we have had to assume certain tasks that are the responsibility of the state, but which the state is now trying to convert into a permanent obligation on our part."

Two points come forth from his statement: one, the utter failure of the state as entrepreneur, and two, the affirmation that private initiative is obligated to generate wealth but not to become involved in social security or welfare activities.

On the first point, there is now hardly any disagreement whatever: Throughout the world, from the British state-owned railway monopoly to the Argentine industries that were monopolized in the times of Juan Domingo Peron, the facts of life are overwhelming; the public sector everywhere has proven to be incompetent as an administrator, bureaucratized to the point of indescribability, terribly slow in arriving at decisions, an abettor of nepotism, a promoter of corruption, and, in short, a backer of unsound and antieconomic operation.

This is true in the FRG [Federal Republic of Germany], France, Mexico, Brazil, and more so in the so-called "socialist" countries, which are in actual fact countries where state capitalism prevails, since there is but one entrepreneur: the sole political party.

As regards the second point--the idea that the business community has no other responsibility but to produce efficiently, massively and to high quality standards, so as to be able to pay taxes on its profits--consensus is not universal.

In highly developed capitalist countries like the United States and Japan, the large corporations create and maintain in operation museums, symphony orchestras, pictorial programs, opera houses and other similar activities of a spiritually pleasing nature.

In not a few of these countries (Sweden, Belgium, Norway, Germany, etc), free enterprise has created universities of high academic and scientific standards and instituted environmental protection, antipollution measures, medical research and other programs of such nature.

This does not mean they have stopped paying taxes. We all know for a fact that tax burdens in the industrial democracies are so heavy that if an effort were made to impose them in the poorer countries, the result would be a revolution.

Now then, what happens in our case?

Simply, that neither the state nor free enterprise have attained a suitable degree of development, because, as Dr Luis Pazos so well put it a few days ago during a television interview, Honduras is not undergoing capitalism but rather a semifeudal phase that must be overcome if we wish to break out of the poverty with which we are trying to cope.

To do this, the rules of the game must be changed: State interventionism must be reduced and an authentic free market economy fostered; the public sector must concentrate on the tasks for which it is suited and abandon its present role of inefficient and wasteful entrepreneur; monopolies and privileged captive markets that perpetuate corporatist and semifeudal forms must be done away with; and lastly, a modern system of taxation must be instituted that will serve to finance an authentic social security system.

We are entering upon a new political era. Why not also pour the footings for a new economic order that will lead to social justice and growth...?

GOVERNMENT OFFICIALS DISCUSS TAXES, BUDGET

PA201738 Managua Radio Sandino in Spanish 0200 GMT 19 Sep 80

["Direct Line" phone-in program, with Deputy Finance Minister William Hupper and Revenue Director Gilberto Guzman answering listeners' questions--live]

[Excerpts] [Moderator] Good evening, listeners from all over Nicaragua. Once again we are here with you on the direct line program. Deputy Finance Minister William Hupper and Revenue Director Gilberto Guzman are with us tonight. Through this dialogue, our thousands of listeners will hear about a very important and up-to-date topic: taxes. Rarely has a forum with so big an audience been used here in Nicaragua to talk about the subject of taxes. But this topic is of such importance that it is worth doing because it concerns the people's money, the money that people contribute to state activities. The payment of taxes is as important as the good use made of that money.

Dear listeners, you will ask questions and Companeros William Hupper and Gilberto Guzman will provide the required information. Before going into the question-answer period, we will let Companeros Hupper and Guzman introduce themselves.

[Hupper] Good evening, companeros. We want to thank Radio Sandino for inviting us to participate in this program--undoubtedly the one with the biggest audience in national radio broadcasting--and for giving us the chance to hold this dialogue with you. The Finance Ministry is responsible for implementing our revolutionary government's fiscal policy, which includes all measures connected with public expenses and their control and with the collection of the resources needed to finance those expenses.

Three principles guide the ministry's public expense policy: honesty, efficiency and rationality. To this effect, rules have been implemented by means of the budget to guarantee that the people's resources will be invested in the priority projects defined by our revolution. With regard to the revenue policy, certain general principles guide the payment of taxes. Some of these principles have acquired great importance within the revolutionary context and we would like to mention them here to orient the listeners' questions.

In the first place, there is a financial principle that tax collections are the main source of revenue with which to finance increasing public expenses. The state must not only carry out activities aimed at forming and expanding the bases of future economic development, such as the expansion of the social infrastructure, it must also carry out a number of social activities and duties. These activities concern not only the aftermath of the earthquake, for instance, the destruction of houses, but also the destruction during the national liberation war waged by our people to overthrow the Somozist dynasty.

In the second place, as a rule of fiscal policy, we observe the principles of vertical and horizontal equity so there will be no tax differences among people in similar situations and so that tax payments are progressive, that is, so that those who have more resources will pay higher taxes.

A very important aspect is that the tax policy seeks to contribute to our country's economic development.

[Moderator] You have heard Mr Hupper. I think it would be a good idea if Guzman addressed the public. Phones are already ringing. You can make a brief introduction in order to give listeners a chance to ask questions.

[Question] My name is Ana Maria Gomez Sandino, from Leon. My question is for the revenue director. It was said that the 6 percent patriotic tax would be paid only by those who have property worth more than 100,000 cordobas. I would like to know how many of these rich people are still left in Nicaragua, since all of them have left. In other words, how many paid that tax, because I imagine there are no rich people with more than 100,000 pesos left in Nicaragua.

[Guzman] Your question is very interesting and it might be worthwhile to explain a bit about the 6 percent patriotic tax. The 6 percent patriotic tax is paid by those whose net capital amounts to more than 100,000 cordobas. We have had income tax reports filed and payments made for that amount from more than 11,000 people. A good many of these reports were filed by people in the lower bracket, so to speak, between 100,000 and 500,000 cordobas. But there have also been patriotic and honest businessmen who have been profoundly interested in fulfilling their patriotic obligation and have filed their reports and paid their taxes on time.

[Question] This is Carlos Meza, from Leon. [Words indistinct] about Nicaragua's finances. Since you can't collect all the taxes you expect to collect, will the 1980 budget goals be met?

[Hupper] Companero Carlos Meza, in the first 9 months of this year our plans based on the taxes that were to be collected have not only been fulfilled, but the collections have been slightly higher than expected. We are very optimistic that the response from all Nicaraguan patriotic sectors, who will fulfill their duty of filing their income tax reports and paying their taxes no later than 30 September will also result in a higher collection. Regarding this, we might say that the Nicaraguans are more conscientious toward their taxes this year. They know that the public funds are being handled honestly and that the money is being used for our people's priority projects.

With regard to budgeted expenses, we have begun implementing a number of measures to curb public expense. Even though an income budget and an expense budget were approved at the beginning of the year, our main task is to see that expenses are not excessively increased and to gradually implement control mechanisms to reduce expenses throughout the year wherever possible.

[Question] I am Eduardo Gonzalez, from the Costa Rica neighborhood. I would like to know what the total budget is and how it is divided among the different sectors of our country's state and social apparatus.

[Hupper] Yes, Companero Gonzalez. The budget for January to December of 1980 totals 7,190 billion cordobas. The greater part of this budget, approximately 70 to 75 percent, is earmarked for social projects or activities. In other words, 75 percent of the budget is allocated for financing the health, education, housing, culture and social welfare ministries and other government bodies whose main task--as is the case of the Transportation Ministry, for example--is to provide a service to the public. These ministries, therefore, have an important role to play in what we have decided to call the social salary of Nicaraguans, in other words, a role in raising the level and the quality of life of all Nicaraguans by improving environmental conditions, providing good health for all Nicaraguans, teaching Nicaraguans to read, and so forth.

An interesting piece of information, for your comparison, is the case of the budget for higher education, the budget for the National Autonomous University of Nicaragua [UNAN], for example. In 1979, the UNAN budget totaled 43 million cordobas. I can tell you that this figure, which is practically double what UNAN had traditionally received from Somozism, was reached because a policy geared to this end had been implemented on 19 July. The UNAN budget for 1980 is slightly over 100 million cordobas.

What is the reason for this? UNAN seeks to promote a number of training courses and is geared toward peasant and labor sectors. In general terms, the budget is directed toward activities of this type.

MAGAZINE HIGHLIGHTS CONSTITUTIONAL POWERS OF NEW PRESIDENT

Lima GENTE in Spanish 22 Aug 80 pp 4-5

[Text] Supreme Chief of the Armed Forces

Leader of the national destinies, the president of the republic was, according to the Charter of 1933, a man who, notwithstanding the moral support of the people, appeared weak in relation to the armed forces. Today, on the contrary, with the power given him by Article 273 of the Constitution, "the president of the republic is the supreme chief of the armed forces and police forces. He directs the National Defense System." He exercises this leadership, it must be remembered, in war as well as in peace time.

In this regard, the Constitution restricts the field of action of the armed forces in the provisions of Article 275, as follows: "The armed forces are composed of the army, navy and air force. Their primary purpose is to guarantee the independence, sovereignty and territorial integrity of the republic. They assume control of internal order in accordance with Article 231," and Article 276: "The armed forces organize and utilize their reserve components according to the needs of national defense and in accordance with the law." It should be pointed out that Article 231, to which the above-cited Article 275 refers, empowers the president of the republic, with the consent of the Council of Ministers, to decree the states of emergency and of seige. In other words, when the armed forces assume control of internal order, they do so by presidential decree.

It is also well to point out that Article 278 of the Constitution provides: "The armed forces and the police forces are not deliberative bodies. They are subordinate to the constitutional government." This provision is fundamental, since it establishes that the military commands may not judge the decisions of the constitutional government to which they are subordinate. The armed and police forces, as Article 280 of the Constitution states, have an important role "in the economic and social development of the country and in civil defense, as provided by law."

Constitutional Tribunal

The presidential character of the new charter is also specific about the way in which the boards of directors of the Tribunal of Constitutional Guarantees and of the Central Bank are to be made up.

The agency whose function is to prevent the abuse of power by rulers who at certain periods may control the organs of executive and legislative power is made up of nine members, who will serve for 6 years.

Three are named by the executive, three by the Congress and three by the Supreme Court of Justice; these last, it should be remembered, are to be designated by the president of the republic and ratified by the Senate. This makes it clear that the president of the republic and the Senate control the Tribunal, the agency which, in turn, must oversee them with respect to constitutionality.

As for the Central Bank, its board of directors, according to Article 151, is composed of seven members: the executive branch names four, among them the president of the bank, and the senate ratifies the latter and names the three remaining members.

Legislative Powers

In addition to promulgating and executing laws and ordering their enforcement, as well as that of the legislative resolutions, the president now has the power "to make legislative decrees having the force of law, when he is so empowered by Congress and with the responsibility of answering to Congress." This important power for the facilitation of government activity was just recently used by the chief executive when he asked Parliament for legislative powers for 120 days to resolve the legal, economic, financial, administrative and labor problems related to turning over radio and television stations by the military government.

Such a presidential request is provided for in Article 189, which states: "The proposals sent by the executive as urgent have preference in Congress."

Other Powers

In addition to being responsible for naming and removing ministers of state and the president of the Council, according to Article 216, the president of the republic also has the power (Article 227) "to dissolve the Chamber of Deputies if that body has censured or given a vote of no confidence to three Councils of Ministers."

This power, however, is not valid during a state of seige or emergency, nor during the last year of the president's administration.

The dissolution of the Chamber of Deputies can only be exercised once during his administration. The Senate cannot be dissolved; this is established by Article 230 of the Constitution.

As the man who personifies the nation, the president of the republic, in principle, is politically lacking in legal responsibility, for which reason most of his actions are prompted by his ministers. Article 221 states the following:

"The ministers are responsible, individually, for their own acts and for the presidential acts they endorse."

"All the ministers are collectively responsible for any criminal acts or acts contrary to the Constitution or laws incurred by the president of the republic or which are agreed upon in Council, although they may have refrained from voting, unless they resign immediately.

The constitutional president of the republic, in accordance with the Great Charter which governs us, can only be accused during his administration of treason to the country; impeding presidential, parliamentary, regional or local elections; dissolving Congress, except when he dissolves the Chamber of Deputies for the reasons cited above, and for preventing the meeting or functioning of the Congress, the National Electoral Jury or the Tribunal of Constitutional Guarantees.

The Constitutional Mandate

"Article 211: The powers and duties of the president of the republic are:

1. To enforce the Constitution and all treaties, laws and other legal dispositions, and see that they are enforced.

2. To represent the state, within and outside of the republic.

3. To direct the general policy of the government.

4. To watch over the internal order and the external security of the republic.

5. To call elections for president of the republic and for representatives to Congress, as well as for mayors, council members and other officials as indicated by law.

6. To summon special sessions of Congress.

7. To send messages to Congress at any time; and he is obliged to do so, personally and in writing, at the first regular annual meeting of the legislature, as well as when his administration ends. The presidential messages must have the previous approval of the Council of Ministers. The annual messages must describe in detail the state of the republic and the improvements and reforms the president deems necessary and proper for consideration by the Congress.

8. To participate, through his initiative, in the formation of laws and legislative resolutions and to exercise the right of observation.

9. To promulgate and execute the laws and order their enforcement, as well as that of the legislative resolutions.

10. To make legislative decrees having the force of law, provided Congress has delegated such powers to him and with the responsibility of answering to Congress.

11. To regulate laws without either transgressing them or changing their nature; and within such limits, to issue decrees and resolutions.

12. To carry out the sentences and resolutions of the tribunals and courts and to see that they are carried out, and to require them for the prompt administration of justice.

13. To carry out the resolutions of the National Election Board and of the Tribunal of Constitutional Guarantees, and to see that they are carried out.

14. To direct foreign policy and international relations and to conclude and ratify treaties and agreements in accordance with the Constitution.

15. To name ambassadors and ministers plenipotentiary, with the approval of the Council of Ministers. Such appointments shall require ratification by the Senate.

16. To receive foreign diplomatic representatives, and to authorize the consuls to exercise their functions.

17. To head the National Defense System and to organize, distribute and arrange for the use of the armed and police forces.

18. To adopt the necessary measures for the defense of the republic, its territorial integrity and its sovereignty in case of aggression.

19. To declare war and to sign treaties of peace, with the authorization of Congress.

20. To administer public finance, to negotiate loans and to decree extraordinary measures in economic and financial affairs, when the national interest so requires, and with responsibility to Congress.

21. To approve plans for national development.

22. To regulate customs tariffs.

23. To grant pardons and to commute sentences, except in those cases where it is prohibited by law.

24. To confer decorations in the name of the nation, with the concurrence of the Council of Ministers.

25. To authorize Peruvians to serve in foreign armies, and

26. To exercise the other functions of government and administration entrusted to him by the Constitution and the laws."

SUTEP LEADER SPEAKS ON TEACHERS' DEMANDS, STRUGGLES

Lima EQUIS X in Spanish 12-19 Aug 80 pp 32-34

[Interview with Horacio Zeballos Gamez, head of SUTEP, by Fernando Vasquez; date and place not given]

[Text] Fighter

"Horacio, fighter, the people are with you!" As never before, the slogan, the voice of order, the battle cry of thousands did not exaggerate. Horacio Zeballos Gamez, secretary general of SUTEP [Single Union of Education Workers] and today UNIR [Leftist Revolutionary Union] deputy from Arequipa, is truly one of the most combative and self-sacrificing popular leaders in the country. This is proved not only by his long periods of imprisonment, his hunger strikes, the fights for rights and the street demonstrations he has led, but above all by his health, which has been adversely affected by all these things, and the tragic death of his father and mother as a result of the repression during the last long teachers' strike.

For this Horacio merits the respect and admiration even of those who, like ourselves, strongly disagree with his Beijing-style Marxism-Leninism, but who recognize in him a union militant and true leftist, faithful to his ideals and loyal to his class. EQUIS X, in addition, has proved its friendship for Horacio Zeballos "under fire," when he was persecuted and in prison.

Today, when he is once more the leader of 100,000 teachers and has a seat in the Chamber of Deputies, we have felt it necessary to interview him here for our readers, as he is about to begin a new stage in his struggle, this time in Parliament.

[Question] How has SUTEP received the news that the Ministry of Education is going to reinstate the teachers?

[Answer] The reinstatement of the teachers who have been transferred and dismissed is the beginning of victory in SUTEP's struggles, which will not end until it has achieved all the demands and dignities which are due us. The reinstatement is, for us, the culmination of the long period of repression, hunger and poverty to which the military dictatorship brought us. It is, in turn, a new step toward a new perspective in the content of our demands. The reinstatement is part of the compensation to the teachers, to education and to the culture, which have been trod upon by the military boot. After healing the wounds caused by the last strike, thousands of teachers will now, once again, savor one of the victories awaited by all the Peruvian people.

[Question] What other demands are expected to be achieved?

[Answer] We believe that the reinstatement is not total if they do not return the salaries which were witheld. This demand is valid. We are owed about 14 months' salary.

[Question] Have you spoken with the minister of education about this?

[Answer] The minister agrees it should be returned. We have only to establish how this measure is to be implemented.

[Question] Have they offered to reinstate all the teachers, and not just some of them?

[Answer] In our interview with the education minister on 4 August, some of our demands were granted, and we agreed upon some concrete points: first, all the teachers dismissed and transferred before and after the 1979 strike are to return to their original jobs.

[Answer] More than 1,500 teachers, and they are being reinstated at this time.

[Question] Whom do you have to thank for the success of the reinstatement?

[Answer] The reinstatement is the result of the teachers' struggles. If we have to thank anybody it is the blood shed in the streets and public squares of the country, the glorious and heroic teaching profession which never surendered, the teachers who, by selling ceviche or driving taxis, gave the final blow in the resistance. I believe that it is that heroism which should be emphasized.

[Question] Why do you think the Belaunde government has begun its action to reinstate the teachers?

[Answer] Evidently within the political propaganda of Belaunde and of all the rightist groups, a large part concerned the teachers. In this sense, this is not kindness on Belaunde Terry's part. The reinstatement is a right which is ours because our positions have been budgeted. It is the result of our struggle for democratization and human rights.

[Question] Have you talked about the possibility of recognizing SUTEP?

[Answer] SUTEP must be recognized. It is the majority union which represents the entire national teaching profession. We find ourselves with a fight on our hands; we have all the legal documents required. We believe that if this administration truly recognizes the right to unionize, it must recognize SUTEP. The entire problem of the teaching profession forces us to ask the government for an overall solution. Otherwise I believe the teachers will mobilize again and hold marches and work stoppages, which are the only instruments the workers have with which to defend their interests and protect themselves from the cost of living.

[Answer] We believe that Belaunde Terry's government is one more which represents the interests of the grand bourgeoisie, the landowners and imperialism. We believe it goes arm in arm with reactionary positions. Its difference from the military dictatorship, evidently, is that it is going to try to deal with the workers' demands. Through our struggle and our pressure we can achieve some of our demands. We believe that Belaunde Terry, to justify a good negotiation, must listen to the teaching profession, otherwise he is going to find himself in a very difficult position from which he will have difficulty extricating himself.

[Answer] We have been the front line of resistance, of the struggle for democracy and freedom, for 12 years. SUTEP has been one of the few unions which has been able to turn itself into a political movement for the defense of the interests of all the workers. SUTEP has felt in its own flesh the political, ideological and repressive offensive of the unfortunate military dictatorship. We have confronted it with all our forces, and we have come out victorious as part of the people.

[Question] Do you believe the teachers' vote made your election to parliament possible?

[Answer] The teaching profession supported both me and UNIR. Most of our strength is rooted there: in that people who think, fight and move ahead, constructing the path for the others.

[Question] If the teaching profession is a large sector of the population and UNIR has not received such a large number of votes, do you not feel defrauded?

[Answer] Not at all. UNIR is first within a left which has presented as many as five candidates. We came out ahead of all of them, in spite of the fact that our group had only been in existence for 6 months. In that short time we have accomplished an extraordinary task. Political space conquered is space gained. We believe the vote we received is an important one, particularly in Arequipa, where we came in second.

[Answer] First of all, we have begun a fight for better wages, salaries and living and working conditions for all workers. We believe that that struggle is a long one, and we have a long way to go. We know how to do it, first with direct action by the masses: the struggle in the streets.

[Question] You have never been an admirer of nor a party to parliamentary work, have you?

[Answer] Parliamentary work exists and has always existed, even in socialist countries. Parliaments are centers for polemics, where the class struggle is reflected and where sometimes the workers need support to be heard and to air their problems. In that regard, the parliamentary question is not one of taste, but of accomodating oneself to a function and a need, as the circumstances demand.

[Question] And how do you feel now about being in Parliament?

[Answer] I am a deputy and I am proud of already having made my first speech, sustaining the motion for political and labor amnesty, which was entrusted to me by the entire leftist membership. I defended it warmly, and I believe the majority of its points have been considered to achieve political, democratic and union freedom for those of us who have been struggling.

[Question] All the leftist parties have been in favor of turning over the newspapers to the workers. However, the government has returned them to their former owners. What does the left propose to do in view of this concrete, actual fact?

[Answer] Actually, it appears we have done nothing yet. And it is the way in which Belaunde returned the newspapers to their owners which surprised us. The left must arm itself urgently and necessarily. It must launch a campaign in depth, I believe, along with the progressive journalists, to make the public aware that the press cannot be circumscribed, and even less so when it is in the hands of the great capitalist sectors of our country. I believe that the struggle for democratization of the press must be an urgent task which we are going to undertake and to which we shall give first priority.

[Question] Some observers have seen the possibility of a rapprochement, although it may be some time in the future, of UNIR with Popular Action, but in no way with APRA [American Revolutionary Popular Alliance]. Why is that?

[Answer] That is totally false. The speculators, who are on a witch hunt, always make a series of hypotheses which put them up in the air. There is nothing certain. For us, Popular Action, APRA and the PPC [Popular Christian Party] are the same, insofar as they represent class interests, struggle to maintain this imperialist and grand bourgeois power and struggle to keep this form of government, which exploits the people. In that regard, we are not going to reconcile, nor are we going to sell out our class position to that of the reactionaries.

[Question] However, Dr Angel Castro Lavarello, a UNIR senator, has stated that he would have no problem agreeing with any group except APRA, because APRA is fascist. Do you also believe that?

[Answer] I do not believe Dr Castro Lavarello said that. But there are coincidences which arise in practice, no matter where they come from...and if they come from APRA, then let them come. But when I say that, I do not mean that we are joining our actions or are reconciling.

[Question] Do you believe that APRA is a fascist movement?

[Answer] APRA has some fascist forms. The presence of its hordes of "buffalo" which have also acted inside and outside the universities--I know this because I have seen it--and within and outside the teaching profession--and I know this because I am a teacher--tells me it is.

[Question] Do you believe that the left is going to present a united front in the municipal elections?

[Answer] There is an understanding and work to be done in that sense. However, I can't make any predictions about it.

[Question] But you are going to do everything possible to achieve this?

[Answer] Everything possible to bring about this unity, with independent, progressive and democratic people as defined through the struggle and through popular support.

[Question] Does this sentiment prevail throughout the leftist organizations?

[Answer] I believe that necessity forces us to unite. Otherwise we will be a minimal, insignificant expression and we will not achieve a single popular goal.

[Answer] Although everyone is calling himself a leftist, I believe that the front can be composed of the same groups that were in the ARI [Industrial Relations Association].

[Question] Has SUTEP fought only for the reinstatement of the teachers, and is it not interested in the fate of others who have been dismissed?

[Answer] SUTEP has struggled, it is struggling and it will struggle for the reinstatement of all who were dismissed, without exception, until there is not a single worker who remains the victim of the reprisals and of the arbitrariness of the owners and the military. We will fight in the parliament and in the streets until we achieve this. And Mr Belaunde's government should take this very seriously.

EDUCATION MINISTER VIEWS SUTEP, EDUCATIONAL SECTOR

Lima GENTE in Spanish 22 Aug 80 p 6

[Interview with Dr Luis Felipe Alarco Larrabure, minister of education, by C.T. on 15 August 1980, at the headquarters of Air Group No 8]

[Text] In the return to constitutional government, the first great example of democracy took place in the educational sector. Teacher amnesty and the respectful dialog with SUTEP [Single Union of Education Workers] were praised even by the fierce contingents of the left. However, nobody can be sure that it will not be SUTEP which lights the fuse of the social powder keg which awaits, trembling, the word of Minister Ulloa. Here is an approach to the subject, with an "on the run" interview with Dr Luis Felipe Alarco Larrabure, education minister, on Friday, 15 August, at the headquarters of Air Group No 8, as he returned from Arequipa.

[Answer] Very well. The main thing is the reinstatement of the teachers, and almost all of them have been reinstated. Some are still missing because they haven't showed up yet.

[Question] Have you read that in some cases the education community is rejecting the reinstated teachers?

[Answer] In some cases there actually are some problems, but we hope that things will return to normal and everything will be cleared up little by little.

[Question] Do you believe that things will return to normal, taking into account the 50,000-sol increase demanded by the teachers?

[Answer] The teachers know that we cannot at this time give them a 50,000-sol increase.

[Answer] The 50,000 soles is reasonable; the fact is that we do not have that kind of money. The increase we can give them is to be set by Minister Ulloa; it will depend on finances. We hope for the best.

[Question] Have the SUTEP leaders been good negotiators? Has it been easy to talk to them?

[Answer] In my dialog with them they were quite proper. The talks have already progressed to the committee level.

[Question] You announced that the present General Education Law would be studied with a view to its modification. What substantial changes would be made in that law?

[Answer] That must be studied carefully by the experts. We always like to hear the opinion of the specialists first.

[Question] However, you have already advanced some criteria, such as returning to the former primary and secondary system.

[Answer] I said insofar as possible, but that the teaching profession would be consulted first. Going back to the primary and secondary is going to depend on our evaluation of the reports we receive from the teachers, and I believe that the important thing is not what it is called, but the very content of education itself.

[Question] Dr Alarco, when you speak of consulting the teaching profession, are you referring to SUTEP?

[Answer] I am referring to the teaching profession in general. Possibly we will make a written survey so that the various educational centers may express their opinions about formulas we will propose to them. Now, SUTEP is an organization of workers in education, but it is not necessarily the only one; other organizations may well be formed, in accordance with the Constitution.

[Question] Your desire to consult the teaching profession appears very democratic to me, but you have personal criteria. Could you tell me what is the chief defect in the Education Law promulgated by the military?

[Answer] The first is trying to introduce a certain political idea, trying to brainwash the teacher. This perhaps has been the primary reason the teaching profession rejected educational reform. To accept this brainwashing meant to be basically in agreement with a dictatorship, and the teaching profession has demonstrated its democratic spirit by rejecting that dictatorship in no uncertain terms.

[Question] Dr Alarco, you were arrested in 1974 for the disturbances in Miraflores. You were accused, unjustly I believe, of being an agitator.

Do you have some personal sympathy for SUTEP, due, let us say, to the fact that you have both suffered from military repression?

[Answer] No. I cannot say that I have either sympathy or antipathy.

[Question] Respect, then?

[Answer] I simply admire it as an organization of teachers, although it is indisputably politicized. And it is also indisputable that its politics are not my politics.

[Question] In SUTEP's struggle for its demands, there was quite notorious participation by students. Does this not mean that students have been sharply politicized?

[Answer] Yes, there is politicization of both teachers and students. Now, at that time it was basically a question of the struggle against the dictatorship, and it is for that reason that the SUTEP protest had such profound echoes.

[Question] Does the argument about the struggle against the dictatorship justify the politicization of the students, their violent street demonstrations?

[Answer] It is difficult for me to say that. If I do not justify it, at least I understand it. Consider this: when there is a regime which harasses the teachers, arrests them and deports them, the students, particularly the older ones who know this, protest.

[Question] Mr Minister, do you believe that it is now necessary to depoliticize the students?

[Answer] The terms politics, politicize, depoliticize, have very diverse meanings. Politicization always occurs. Now, not always at the party level. For example, we believe that we must teach democracy to the students from the time they are small, or respect for the ideas of others, etc. etc. Very well, that is one form of politicization. To deny that would be hypocrisy. What we really are against is having the students taught a particular political ideology: to place them in the service of Popular Action, for example. To that I am indeed absolutely opposed.

BOLIVIA DRAWS SELA SUPPORT ON SALE OF TIN RESERVES

La Paz [illegible] DIARIO in Spanish 29 Aug 80 p 5

/Text/ SELA /Latin American Economic System/, on the occasion of the 19th Ordinary Session of the CIE /International Tin Council/ held in London 15-18 July, expressed its solidarity with Bolivia's firm and intransigent position of opposition to the announced sale of U.S. strategic tin reserves which were to be placed on the market as of 1 July.

The statement was released by SELA Permanent Secretary Fernando Barrocal to such international organizations as the OAS, UNCTAD, Nonaligned Countries, EEC and the ASEAN /Association of Southeast Asian Nations/ as well as to the Bolivian Embassy in London.

The text of the SELA statement is as follows:

On the occasion of the upcoming meeting of the CIE to be held 15-18 of this month, it is my pleasure to provide you, at the request of the Bolivian Foreign Relations Minister, with copies of Decisions 25, 42 and 78 adopted at the Fourth Ordinary Session held in April 1978, at the Fifth Ordinary Session in August 1979, and at the Sixth Ordinary Session held in May 1980, respectively, by the Latin American Council--SELA's highest ministerial-level body. The 25 nations of the region unanimously express their solidarity with Bolivia in light of the serious situation that would result from the placement of a significant portion of tin reserves on the world market. This action would result in serious economic, political and social damages.

Decision No. 25

Whereas Bolivia expressed to the Latin American Council its deep concern over the announced intention of the U.S. Government to sell its strategic tin reserves; whereas the production of that mineral constitutes the foundation of Bolivia's economy, as well as that of other developing nations, of just, equitable and remunerative prices and is the foundation for measures that prevent any kind of distortion on the world markets; whereas this action violates the principles that should govern economic relations among nations and, in particular, the proposals for the establishment of a new economic order; therefore, honoring the principle of solidarity which the Panama Convention upholds and also taking into account the precedent of Latin American solidarity contained in Decisions 10 and 85 adopted by the Latin American Council, the Council made the decision to:

Article 1--Declare unrestricted solidarity with the Republic of Bolivia in view of the announcement by the U.S. Government to sell large quantities of its strategic tin reserves.

Article 2--Express its profound concern for the negative impact this announcement has had on the Bolivian economy and on that of other developing nations.

Article 3--Express its confidence that measures of this nature, which directly affect a nation in the region, will not be implemented.

Decision No 42

The Latin American Council expresses its solidarity with Bolivia on the matter of the sales of tin reserves. Whereas the Latin American Council adopted Decision No 25; Whereas on 3 April the U.S. House of Representatives approved a bill authorizing the sale of 35,000 tons of that nation's strategic tin reserves and that bill is now under study by the U.S. Senate; whereas, as has been said on previous occasions, the possible placement of the U.S.' strategic tin reserves on the world market has created a disturbance that threatens the stability and natural development of tin prices and carries with it the danger of seriously harming the exports and national economies of the producing nations, Bolivia in particular because it is the principal producer and exporter in the region; whereas the policy adopted by the United States on this matter, aside from the damages mentioned above that it has caused, represents a position that has had an unfavorable impact on the dialog between the developed and developing nations and on efforts to establish a new international economic order; whereas one of the pillars of solidarity which inspires the action taken by SELA consists of permanent joint attention to the import-export problems of each of its member nations, the Council has decided to:

Article 1--Reiterate its profound concern over the decision of the U.S. Government to at some point place some of its strategic tin reserves on the world market and affirm that this decision will be a factor in the distortion of the tin market by affecting the normal development of tin prices which will seriously damage the Bolivian economy as well as that of other producers and exporters in the region.

Article 2--Point out that the policy of placing U.S. strategic tin reserves on the world market weakens efforts by developed nations to establish new principles and mechanisms for international economic relations through the installation of a new economic order advocated by the United Nations General Assembly.

Article 3--Recommend to the president of the Fifth Session of the Latin American Council that he write to the President of the United States and to the appropriate officials in the U.S. Senate and provide them with copies of this decision.

Decision No 78

Sale of strategic tin reserves. Whereas the Latin American Council adopted Decisions 25 and 42; whereas the letter sent by the president of the Fifth Session of the Latin American Council to the U.S. president and Senate in an effort to halt the sale of the U.S.' strategic tin reserves, in keeping with Decision No 42, did not produce any results since the U.S. Government on 2 January 1980 signed into law a bill authorizing the sale of 35,000 tons of tin from its strategic reserves; whereas once these sales go into effect, in addition to distorting the tin market, they will seriously damage the Republic of Bolivia economically, politically and socially, the Latin American Council agreed to:

Article 1--Express its unrestricted solidarity with Bolivia's position of opposition to the sale of the strategic tin reserves of the United States.

Article 2--Recommend to the Permanent Secretariat that in consultation with the government of Bolivia it draft measures in support of Bolivia's position for submission to the Seventh Council where they can be adopted by the Latin American Economic System.

SOCIAL DEMOCRATS CRITICAL OF CURRENT GOVERNORS

Sao Paulo O ESTADO DE SAO PAULO in Portuguese 24 Aug 80 p 8

[Text] Brasilia--"This is the worst crop of governors since 1966," in the view of the PDS [Social Democratic Party] parliamentarians to whom O ESTADO talked. For that reason, they are demanding a return to direct elections.

Experts at criticism, weak in command, poor administrators and unknown on the federal level--this is what the PDS parliamentarians think of the majority of the governors appointed by General Geisel in the last year of his government.

Almost all of them lack authority, which according to an influential PDS member is a result of the very nature of the indirect process: "In popular elections the candidate heads his own campaign and his leadership is made legitimate by the people. With the current method, appointment is made without demonstrating these qualities, because appointments are won in the palace antechambers through docile submission to the central authority."

The most useless governors are those who would never have been put in the palaces they now occupy by the popular vote, and this hinders community support of their programs and policies and in some cases, comes down to total rejection, of which the paradigm is the governor of Sao Paulo, Paulo Salim Maluf.

In addition to this, according to the PDS analysis, the governors of the open-approach era "were left to engage in whatever foolishness they wanted," because they are free of the strict supervision exercised over their predecessors by General Geisel.

Top of the List

At the very top of the list for unpopularity is the governor of Sao Paulo, which does not prevent PDS deputies and governors from dealing with him sympathetically in order to serve personal and political purposes. President Figueiredo welcomed him cordially in Brasilia, but he refrained from appearing with him in Sao Paulo in order to avoid the booing.

Even his Santa Catarina colleague, Jorge Bornhausen, with whom he met in Caborio, has fled from him. Bornhausen himself is an exponent of the oligarchy long in power and, therefore, very unpopular.

The governor of Paraiba, Tarcisio Burity, acted in the same way, hiding out in a hotel in Brasilia while Maluf was in Joao Pessoa to sponsor a class of engineering students.

The governor of Minas Gerais, Francelino Pereira, earned the most extensive jeers in the history of Belo Horizonte when he headed the entourage of Pope John Paul II from the Pampulha airport to the center of the city.

The governor of Rio Grande do Norte, Lavoisier Maia, is another who was recently forced to cancel a ceremonial appearance out of fear of manifestations of popular displeasure, aggravated by the recent arbitrary actions of the state police.

A Group of Bunglers

There are some governors, even of the larger states, who do not get along with the people or the Planalto Palace. Due to incompetence or bad luck, they are ineffective in political and administrative undertakings.

The governor of Rio Grande do Sul, Amaral de Souza, firmly established in the military sectors to which he owes his appointment, does not enjoy equal sympathy in the Planalto Palace. His failure to deal with the soybean problem was obvious to the central authorities, and the PDS leader in the chamber, Nelson Marchezan, the loser in the campaign for the Piratini Palace, had to take command of the situation by telephone. In the PDS he faces the groups headed by Marchezan and the minister of social security, Jair Soares, who are eager to succeed him, as well as the high regard in which his predecessor, Sinval Guazzelli, was held.

Francelino Pereira, of Minas Gerais, another case of rejection both by the people and the palace, finds himself in the same position. The choice of five deputies for his body of aides made politicians influential but did not contribute to the unity of his administration, which is splintered into various fiefs. Each secretary does what he wants, while the governor travels. "He travels in order to avoid decisions," says a party colleague of his who comes from the old PSD [Social Democratic Party].

Furthermore, in addition to the exploitation of Minas Gerais' parochialism, because he is a native of Piaui, Francelino suffered a blow with the appointment of former PSD member Ibrahim Abi-Ackel to the Ministry of Justice. He was mentioned as a likely successor to Francelino by some and as a possible successor to President Figueiredo by others, mainly those who do not want to see Vice President Aureliano Chaves remain in the Planalto Palace after 1984. He was humiliated in the Minas Gerais PDS organization and continues to be the victim of a boycott by the central authorities. "When it comes to public works, Francelino has to cook the meat in its own fat," the saying goes, with regard to the shortage of federal funds. Francelino has not been in the Planalto Palace in 60 days and has only been to Brasilia once. For what purpose? To receive an award from the Superior Labor Court.

Maluf is in disfavor at the Planalto Palace after having won some points by swelling the PDS ranks at the cost of opposition defections. The members of the PDS explain his unpopularity in part by the fact that he was chosen at a convention so hotly disputed--thanks to the money which determined the outcome--by a party which won only 35 percent of the votes in 1978, and added to that the discredit resulting from the Lutfalla case. His party colleagues complain that he did not react as he should have to the accusations made about his honesty, which unnecessarily alienated the student sector in the private schools and university area, because of the reduction of funds allocated to higher education and the clinical hospital, and the fact that he does not allow any of his subordinates to shine. They are afraid that because of this the PDS will not even have candidates to run for governor and the Senate in 1982, and that they will be contaminated by the unpopularity surrounding the governor, such as to suffer more serious setbacks than in 1982.

Another complaint of the PDS is that Maluf does not focus his attention on his administration and on Sao Paulo, because he is obsessed with one dominant idea--winning votes in the Congress in order to run for president of the republic.

Other governors whose administrations are regarded as calamitous are Lucidio Portella, since the death of his brother, Petronio Portella; Ari Valadao, of Goias; Alacid Nunes, of Para, mainly because of the boycott of the government leader, Jarbas Passarinho; Lavoisier Maia, of Rio Grande do Norte; and Tarcisio Burity, of Paraiba. Almost all of these lack any federal influence.

Lavoisier Maia recently committed a monumental blunder in Natal which caused President Figueiredo to leave the palace without a word to most of those present, irritated because the governor made no mention in his speech of the 5 billion cruzeiros the federal government had just allocated.

Guilherme Palmeira, of Alagoas, can hardly even be judged because of the influence exerted upon him by Divaldo Suruagy, his predecessor and guide, which has prevented him from defining his own administration.

What has surprised the most influential PSD members on the federal level, however, is the shipwreck of Jose Lindoso, of Amazonas, and Eurico Rezende, of Espirito Santo. On returning to the provincial level, they have not won the prestige they managed to enjoy with the Planalto Palace thanks to their activities in the Senate.

Well-Liked Governors

Ney Braga, of Parana, Antonio Carlos Magalhaes, of Bahia, Virgilio Tavora, of Ceara--who could probably be elected governor by a direct vote, and Marco Antonio Maciel, of Pernambuco, are quite successful in their states and are well accepted on the federal level.

They are noted for their excellent administrative results, the reasonable popularity they enjoy, at a time of crisis, and their ready access to the federal authorities. Maciel is particularly noticeable because of his skill in handling administration and politics in a state like Pernambuco which is a problem for the government and the revolution, if only because of the dramatic concentration there of opposition leaders such as Miguel Arraes, Jarbas Vasconcelos, Marcos Freire, Oswaldo Lima Filho, Gregorio Bezerra, and Francisco Juliao, among others, which "gives Pernambuco the greatest concentration of suspended officials per square meter of any state."

The success of the governors of Parana, Bahia, Ceara and Pernambuco is credited to the fact that they are experienced political leaders and endowed with the strength to command and easy access to the Planalto Palace and the technobureaucracy. Their presence at the head of governments does not have a very violent impact and their administrative management is such as to benefit from the requirements for obtaining resources to implement their government programs.

Among themselves, these are these hardly flattering judgments made by the PDS senators and deputies of the governors appointed by General Geisel, with little hope that they will be in a position to contribute to the slates in the coming electoral campaign.

They are persuaded that President Figueiredo really opted for popular elections of the state governors not only to carry out his promise to make a democracy of the country but also to free himself from the political burden of the appointments and the failures which have frequently resulted therefrom. The people can still make better choices.

No Comment From Planalto Palace

Some of the aides closest to President Figueiredo in the Planalto Palace have declined to make an assessment of the activities of the governors, on the justification that "this is an unproductive type of exercise." In other words, it serves no purpose from their point of view, and by extension that of the federal executive branch, to point out this or that governor as "good" or "excellent" and another as "bad" or "worse," because this does not produce results.

The governors, although they were practically appointed by the Planalto Palace, because the palace appointments were endorsed by the state electoral colleges, with the sole exceptions of the renegade Paulo Maluf in Sao Paulo, and Rio de Janeiro, a state under the control, at least nominally, of the opposition, cannot be dismissed ad nutum, as can the ministers of state and other assistants of the president of the republic.

If the president of the republic is not satisfied with the actions of a minister of state or any other assistant, he can replace him at any time. A request for his resignation or some less elegant form of summarily dispensing with his services, and immediately the problem is resolved. The president cannot do the same with the governors. They were "elected" to serve a 4-year term. Thus, whether the president of the republic is satisfied with their actions or not, he can do nothing but tolerate them until January 1983, i.e. until the installation of the next governors.

This is the reason cited by the presidential aides for refusing to assess the administration of each governor for the press. Within itself, obviously, the Planalto Palace knows perfectly well how each of them is doing, at least those in the PDS, particularly with a view to knowing how a good or bad state administration may affect the 1982 elections. And it can also be presumed that the Planalto Palace is not pleased. The re-establishment of the system of direct election of the governors proposed by President Figueiredo is not merely a political choice. It is much more a condemnation of a system of choice which has failed to impress, because all of the crops of "picked" governors have proven, in the opinions gathered even from the highest circles in the executive branch, qualitatively inferior to the elected ones.

For the press, however, the assistants of the president of the republic refuse to talk. They will not analyze the governors one by one, much less point out the worst. Apart from the lack of practical purposes which they claim for this type of exercise, they also say that an assessment is difficult, because each governor would have to be viewed within his own state context. It would be necessary to know what problems he faces and what resources are available to him to deal with them, and what use he is making of them.

There are however some governors the Planalto Palace prefers. Two of them are the governor of Bahia, Antonio Carlos Magalhaes, and the governor of Pernambuco, Marco Antonio Maciel. It is no surprise, then, that these two are among the few that some of the presidential aides will, reluctantly, mention as the best, merely by way of example. Two others mentioned were Jorge Konder Borhausen, of Santa Catarina, and, perhaps in provocative irony, Paulo Maluf of Sao Paulo.

DOMESTIC WAR MATERIEL INDUSTRY SURVEYED

Sao Paulo O ESTADO DE SAO PAULO in Portuguese 10 Aug 80 p 8

[Text] Sao Jose dos Campos--Delegations from various countries are arriving daily at the international airport of the Aerospace Technology Center (CTA) in Sao Jose dos Campos and are touring the institutes and bodies supported by the federal government and the war industries located around it. These visits have now become routine, but have not yet awakened the population, estimated at 300,000, to the importance of the city in the war materiel and equipment manufacturing sector.

Almost all of the industry located in the municipality plays a direct or indirect role as enterprises engaged in the manufacture of products "made in Brazil," an activity which contributes massively to the fantastic volume of electrical energy consumed in the municipality. The total comes to 775 million kilowatts per hour--more than 16 of the federal states and surpassed only by 4 Brazilian capital cities--Sao Paulo, Rio de Janeiro, Belo Horizonte and Recife.

In 1950, however, the year in which the commissioning of the Dutra highway and the building of the CTA occurred, the city was merely a calm residential center with 26,000 inhabitants. In these last years, however, Sao Jose has become 12 times larger thanks to the advance of the industrial development which has put the municipality in fourth place in ICM [tax on movement of merchandise] collections in the state.

The population has not yet become aware of the importance of the aerospace complex and the war industries located in the municipality, because the dozens of delegations which visit the city every month--an average of two or three a week--proceed after landing at the airport (a military area) and being welcomed by the CTA officials to the destination previously established by the Itamaraty Palace.

The delegations which remain in the city for a few days, if made up of military officers, are accommodated in a hotel in the aerospace complex itself. If they are civilians, they stay at the Novotel or Hotel Eldorado, within the urban confines. However, the members are cautious and unlikely to risk a stroll in the city.

Sixth-Largest Producer

For these and other reasons, few citizens of Sao Jose know that Brazil currently ranks sixth in the world in production of military equipment and that at least 70 percent of this complex is located in their city. The Brazilian war materiel industry has grown the fastest of any in the West, about 15 percent per year, involving approximately $5 billion.

The fame of our domestic equipment has crossed national boundaries, mainly since 1979 when such vehicles as the Cascavel, Sucuri, Urutu and Jararaca, manufactured by ENGESA [Specialized Engineers, Inc] defeated a column of Soviet-made armored equipment operated by Egyptian troops in Libya. Currently the country is producing and exporting light guns in general, armored vehicles on wheels, missiles, bridge-laying vehicles, machine guns, movable ramps for the launching of rockets, planes, napalm bombs, grenades, corvettes, medium-sized vessels, trucks, pistols, torpedoes, ammunition, special mines, reconnaissance equipment and telecommunications systems.

Ten years ago, the most optimistic estimates could not have anticipated the surprising growth of Brazil in the conventional weaponry sector, in which it is now almost self-sufficient. At that time, the country had factories producing only revolvers and gunpowder and reconditioning used ammunition, and was basically dependent on the United States for the supply of all its armaments needs.

From a consumer of World War II war materiel scrap iron, Brazil became one of the most demanding purchasers on the international market, to which it has recourse only for the purchase of sophisticated equipment such as supersonic pursuit planes, advanced radar complexes or computers. The Brazilian war materiel sector today produces missiles and jet planes, having joined the exclusive club of weapons manufacturers to which fewer than 20 countries throughout the world, on an advanced level of industrialization and technology, belong.

In fact, Brazil's armaments industry is now supplying equipment to 32 countries on 4 continents, and expects to bill $1 billion in exports. These dollars will be spent for the products of the 300 industrial enterprises providing our war materiel production. The supply of uniforms, shoes and other accessories is included in this category.

These products are pentrating various countries, mainly in Africa, Latin America and the Middle East, more vigorously with every passing day, justifying estimates of the total value of exports in this sector for this year at nearly $1 billion.

The production of domestic military equipment involves the activities of 350 enterprises affiliated with the sector, providing about 100,000 jobs, directly and indirectly. All of these enterprises are a part of the private sector, with the exception of seven munitions factories which the army operates on its own account. Three large enterprises in Sao Jose dos Campos produce the most important equipment used by the armed forces in various countries. They are ENGESA, EMBRAER [Brazilian Aeronautics Company] and Avibras.

Although more than half of what the armaments industry produces is exported, producing a positive trade balance, Brazil is still purchasing 40 percent of its needs. For this reason the government has given priority to research and development in the war materiel industry of the country. The increase in this sector is a part of the basic plan calling for massive investments during the 1980s, mainly in research and technology.

GALVEAS FORESEES INTERNATIONAL CRISIS IN 1981

Sao Paulo O ESTADO DE SAO PAULO in Portuguese 17 Aug 80 p 45

[Interview with Finance Minister Ernane Galveas in Brasilia by Rosa Dalcin: "Galveas Foresees International Crisis in 1981"; date of interview not given]

[Text] Brasilia--Without a momentous solution, a revolutionary solution from the financial point of view, to help less-developed countries solve their balance-of-payments problems, the world may enter 1981 in the throes of one of the most dramatic crises in mankind's history.

That is the prediction of Finance Minister Ernane Galveas, who says the UN Special Assembly about the new international economic order "is one more effort to study the worsening situation in economic and social relations, trying once more to motivate governments of the more developed countries to promote a system of international income distribution favoring the least advantaged."

In an exclusive interview given to reporter Rosa Dalcin of the O ESTADO DE SAO PAULO Brasilia bureau, the finance minister said he was "very skeptical" about the outcome of meetings such as this one planned by the United Nations for New York, asserting that so far, at least, "they are very academic discussions, good intentions that remain buried among the formal declarations of the documents signed on such occasions."

[Question] How did the idea of establishing a new economic order come about and what has been its impact thus far?

[Answer] As a matter of fact, establishment of a new economic order on an equitable basis was already implied in 1971 by the words of Arnold Toynbee, who, in speaking about the material progress of nations concluded that "there was also a trend toward greater social justice in income distribution, although at the same time a minority in the rich nations as well as a majority in the poor nations were becoming poorer."

The idea strengthened during the years that were marked by a reduction in world demand resulting from the increase in petroleum prices. The volume of current international transactions declined 5 percent in 1975, a rate that was offset the following year. Generally, there was a marked drop compared to the 1962-72 period, when the average rate of foreign-trade expansion was 9 percent. In all of this it is important to emphasize that the non-petroleum-producing industrialized countries were less affected than the less-developed ones, because the former still had a 7 percent increase in foreign trade.

Faced with adverse conditions, many developing countries tried to maintain their high rates of economic expansion by resorting to foreign debt. Although in 1974 debt of non-petroleum-producing developed [sic] countries totaled $155 billion, the figure expanded considerably to $225 billion in 1976 and $330 billion in 1979. Two-thirds of this came from the assets of commercial banks.

The result of this situation was worsening financial relations for borrowing countries. Meanwhile, the OPEC countries began to have problems in absorbing their surpluses and adjusting their internal structures. As a consequence, there was a resurgence among export-dependent countries of protectionist measures in international trade and because of reduced economic activity in recent years unemployment increased.

The table below illustrates the changes taking place in various economies:

Changes in Gross National Product, Exports and Balance of Payments for Non-Petroleum-Producing Developing Countries

Percentage Compared to Previous Year

Year	Real GNP	All Less-developed Countries	Exports (Volume)	Balance of Payments(*)
1978	5.3	3.3	9.8	-37.5
1979	5.2	2.4	8.1	=45.5
1980	5.6	2.6	5.4	-68.0

Source: UNCTAD
(*) Goods, services and transfers--in billions of dollars

Add to this state of affairs the need to grow larger quantities of foodstuffs to cope with the specter of famine that threatens to develop.

Another United Nations meeting about the subject is scheduled for the period between 21 August and 6 September.

As a natural consequence of such a state of economic disorder several meetings were held, among them the North-South Conference in 1977, for discussion of measures to be taken to prevent disruption of the international trade system.

[Question] What subjects are likely to be discussed at this meeting?

[Answer] The subjects to be discussed, according to a proposal of the European Economic Community, should cover:

1. Food: Estimates of production, estimates of demand, ways of implementing programs for nutrition and expansion of agricultural production in less-developed countries; creation of reserve food supplies; aid in meeting food needs in poor countries; access to commodities markets for developing countries.

2. The second important theme is energy. There will be projections about supply and consumption of energy, its prices and consequences for economic growth. Also, methods and technology used for production and conservation of conventional energy, development of new research fields and planning of relevant programs and projects. There will be discussion of the possibilities for restricting use and rational employment of energy sources; the possibility of aid to exploring and developing resources in needy countries, as well as the possibility of utilizing new and alternative sources.

3. Finally, there will be discussion of problems connected with payment balances, in which will be examined the trend of export receipts and import costs, the possibilities for adjustment in current-account balances in order to minimize surpluses and deficits. Emphasis will be given to ways of promoting higher income from exports for developing countries.

There should be study of problems connected with financing balance-of-payments deficits through recycling and financial transfer to developing countries. There will be discussion of development financing; the resources and operational modes of international financial institutions, as well as official development assistance for the least-developed countries. There will be analysis of ways to develop nonconcessionary flows of direct investments, with financing and access to capital markets.

[Question] What is the Brandt Report about, and what is the Brazilian position on the subject?

[Answer] First, the recommendations for a new world monetary order made by the Brandt Report should be stressed. Among them is a proposal to reform the international monetary system, a position Brazil has held, since it results in more extensive use of SDRs [special drawing rights] for international reserve currency and for bringing about more stability in exchange rates.

Brazil also favors a more careful study of the consequences of creating and operating a substitution account, which may create uncertainty about international liquidity, with a negative effect on availabilities in the international financial system for financing deficits in the current accounts of non-OPEC member countries. Assumptions about investing this account in securities other than those of the U.S. federal government (U.S. Treasury Bonds) should be evaluated in greater depth. Meanwhile, as prospects for 1981 are considered difficult, the international financial bodies will have to continue examining more closely their more active participation in the international process of recycling petrodollars. Just to give you an idea, those funds, which in 1980 should be about $120 billion, represent twice the current-account balances of OPEC countries when the 1973-74 international crisis broke out. An absolute reduction of the international banking system's participation in this process was not expected, but a greater participation in relative terms by international financial organizations in this system is contemplated, within more flexible conditions adapted to the realities of today's world.

In substance, this reality implies structural adjustments in the economies of such countries. At that rate, the stipulated terms for using the funds of those institutions, especially regarding changes in fiscal and monetary policy intended to affect aggregate demand, should be reviewed. The problems faced by such economies today generally reflect a need for structural readjustment of the productive system which, to a large extent, depends upon a single product, petroleum, which has such specific characteristics that it can even be used to form an international cartel.

Such economies, hence, are not having balance-of-payments problems because of excess demand. What has indeed occurred is a large increase of petroleum prices in a relatively short time, not a substantial increase in the quantity demanded. At that rate, the structure of aggregate supply must be changed to fit the new circumstances. Hence, the financing needs of non-petroleum-producing countries, within the new world order, must be viewed by international financial organizations in a nontraditional way, other than control of aggregate demand. In the international context, Brazil has made progress in this respect, having adopted policies to diversify its energy sources, including use of others that are renewable.

O ESTADO [DE SAO PAULO]: How do you view these problems in terms of restructuring the international economy?

Galveas: When UNCTAD (United Nations Conference on Trade and Development) met for the first time in 1964 in Geneva, the Prebisch Report gave dramatic proof that 34 percent of the world's population produces 90 percent of world output, whereas the so-called Third World, which includes over two-thirds of the population, has only 12 percent of Gross World Product. Beyond the dramatic import of these figures, the situation appears even more serious since the gap between the rich countries and the poor countries, the industrialized nations and the less-developed nations, or between the countries of the North and those of the South, continues to increase.

Differences in terms of income per capita, in terms of improvement in economic and social conditions, are continuing to favor those living to the north of the Equator as compared to the countries of the Third World. To summarize, we could say that one-third of the world's population lives in a state of poverty. At present, over 1.2 billion persons of a total of a little over 4 billion inhabitants of the planet live in extreme poverty.

From one-third to one-half of the population of Latin America, Africa and Asia--over 2.5 billion inhabitants--go hungry, are malnourished or live below minimum subsistence levels. That is why there has been an effort to mobilize the strength and the will of the large industrialized countries for a movement of income transfer favoring the less fortunate.

The meetings of UNCTAD, the initiatives contained in the "Pearson Report," in which the Brazilian Roberto Campos participated, and now this initiative by Willy Brandt, all are headed in the same direction, with the same idea and purpose of analyzing these universal imbalances, this shocking disparity between rich countries and poor and of finding solutions for it.

O ESTADO: What expectations does Brazil have for this new assembly? Does the government expect any concrete result?

Galveas: This assembly is one more effort to pursue this evaluation which has been made over the last 30 years and analyze the worsening situation of economic and social relations, trying once again to motivate the governments of the more developed countries to promote a system of international income distribution more favorable to the poor.

Brazil has always participated in these meetings with a very positive purpose: first, to adhere to the thesis that something significant, something more serious, must be done to reduce the suffering of the Third World, before the social problems of such countries become a problem of uncontrollable dimensions; second, in the sense that Brazil itself has tried, in the international context, to offer its contribution to reduce the poverty existing in so much of the world.

But we are very skeptical about the results of these declarations and meetings. What we have seen thus far is that they are very academic discussions, good intentions that remain stranded on the documents that are signed on such occasions and that from the practical point of view have done very little.

At the beginning of the 1960 decade, the United Nations tried to establish a firm commitment with the large industrialized countries for them to accept the challenges of transferring to the poorer areas at least 0.7 percent of their Gross National Product. This was approved on more than one occasion at UN plenary sessions. We have seen, however, that these commitments were met by only a few countries, and more often because of political motivations and traditional relationships such as, for example, those of the European metropolises with their former African colonies, than as the result of a universal movement to which all nations were committed.

In a more bold and daring initiative, it was even attempted to raise this commitment for sharing 0.7 percent of GNP to 1 percent, and that is the direction of the Willy Brandt report. We contend that a movement of this magnitude can have the high purpose of motivating the leaders of large industrialized countries. These reports should really be able to convince many governments that have not yet been moved or that are not yet aware that something momentous must be done to relieve the suffering of two-thirds of the world's population.

But we do not really believe that such initiatives can produce short-run results. Why? Because what we see in the short run is that all countries are preoccupied with the drop in economic activity, with the process of recession, with the renewal of inflation and the increase in unemployment. Nearly all countries are now in difficulty because of the series of petroleum price shocks. These countries are trying to solve their national problems and for that very reason are devoting what I would call an irrelevant part of their resources to world problems. I think today it would be too much to expect the United States, the European countries or even the Scandinavian countries to change their attitude of the recent past and become committed to a highly significant program of income transfer to less-favored nations.

O ESTADO: Despite all these problems that you mention and the insignificant results obtained thus far, do you think it is worthwhile to continue holding meetings and assemblies to discuss the proposition of a new international economic order?

Galveas: I think we should persist in this idea. We must call the greatest possible attention to these international inequalities. We must expose in all their brutality the problems faced today by the countries with less resources. We must do this because we feel that from the political point of view we cannot continue in a direction that will result in the needless turning to the left of a large part of the world. We seek a world political transformation that could be much less severe if there really prevailed a feeling of fraternity from the point of view of a better distribution of income.

If we look at the recent past, we shall see that the great disparity of wealth that had existed and that had been called attention to at the beginning of the 1960 decade became much worse after 1974 because of the petroleum crisis. Higher petroleum prices affected nearly all countries: rich and poor, industrialized and less developed.

The industrialized countries, with much more resources and higher income, could adapt more rapidly. They not only reduced the level of their petroleum imports but also increased their exports to the Middle East countries, offsetting the deficit in their payment balances. This did not prevent the whole world from entering a period of depression in 1975, but we shall see that in 1976 nearly all industrialized countries had already recovered from the 1975 recession. But this did not occur in the less-developed countries. Rather, to the extent that the rich industrialized countries emerged from the economic crisis, the economic crisis of the less developed countries worsened. These countries continued importing the same quantities of oil at higher prices. They were not in a position to substantially increase their exports and the balance-of-payments deficits that resulted led them to make massive loans in the international market. Very soon the less-developed countries found themselves facing not just one problem but two: that of petroleum and that of foreign indebtedness and the interest payments that resulted.

The big problem of most less-developed countries today, including Brazil, is having to pay exorbitant prices for imports and also being committed to a heavy foreign debt and the interest payments it requires.

There is no significant movement on the part of the large industrialized countries or even in international markets to relieve or minimize this distress from the financial point of view or in regard to the balance of payments. On the contrary, this problem was left entirely to the judgment and wishes of the private international commercial banks since 1974, when they took the problem of recycling funds into their hands. Governments of the large industrialized countries, the World Bank, the International Monetary Fund did very little to provide a solution for the problem. The result is that the private international commercial banks have practically exhausted their capabilities for recycling petrodollars.

When we reached 1979 there was another doubling of petroleum prices and we entered into another crisis which I now consider more serious than the crisis of 1974-75. The crisis of 1979-80 occurred at a time when virtually the entire international banking community had exhausted its possibilities of recycling petrodollars.

For this very reason, a report such as this one of Willy Brandt's becomes especially important to the governments of the industrialized countries, to the IMF and to the World Bank from the viewpoint of motivating them toward a much more significant movement than any of those that have yet been made.

If there is not a significant solution, a revolutionary solution from the financial point of view, to assist the less-developed countries and help them solve their balance-of-payments problems, the world may enter the year 1981 in the throes of one of the most dramatic crises in the history of mankind.

JULY TRADE DEFICIT AMOUNTS TO $197 MILLION

Sao Paulo O ESTADO DE SAO PAULO in Portuguese 21 Aug 80 p 29

[Text] Brasilia--The Brazilian trade deficit last month was $197 million--less than in June ($206 million)--raising to $2.2 billion the deficit for the January-through-July period, according to data from the Bank of Brazil Foreign Trade Department (CACEX) reported yesterday by the Finance Ministry. In July of last year the trade account had a deficit of $227 million and in the first 7 months of 1979 had a deficit of $942 million.

From January through July this year Brazil imported $13 billion worth of goods, whereas exports in the same period were $10.8 billion. In the first 7 months last year, Brazilian imports were $9.1 billion, compared to exports of $8.2 billion. Last month foreign sales were $1.6 billion and purchases were $1.8 billion. CACEX Director Benedito Moreira said that this month Brazilian exports are at a quicker pace than in July.

According to the CACEX data, imports increased 42.6 percent from January through July and exports increased only 31.9 percent, in comparison to the same period last year.

Petroleum

Of the $13 billion of imports, $5.5 billion, or 42.1 percent, represented petroleum purchases, which in July were only $723 million compared to $910 million in April, the month when the nation spent the most for imports. In June purchases had already been reduced to $799 million.

Coffee exports were $1.4 billion in the January-through-July period, including $225 million last month alone.

Trade Balance (millions of dollars)

Period	Imports	Exports	Difference
July 1980	1,850	1,653	- 197
July 1979	1,649	1,422	- 227
January-July 1980	13,070	10,846	-2,224

INDUSTRIAL PRODUCTION RISES 7.1 PERCENT IN FIRST 6 MONTHS OF 1980

Rio de Janeiro O GLOBO in Portuguese 20 Aug 80 p 21

[Text] Brasilia--The nation's industrial production increased 7.1 percent in the first 6 months of 1980 compared to the same period last year. The manufacturing sector grew 6.6 percent and minerals extraction increased 22 percent. Crude petroleum production increased 15.6 percent in the first 6 months of this year, for its highest growth rate in 5 years.

These business indicators from IBGE [Brazilian Institute of Geography and Statistics] were announced yesterday by the Planning Ministry, which pointed out the samll recovery--of 0.7 percent--by the manufacturing sector, which had posted consecutive declines in the January-through-April and January-through-May periods but recovered in June, closing out the period with a 6.6 percent increase. According to the Planning Ministry, the recovery was due essentially to two industrial sectors: food products and transportation equipment.

Food products went from 99.83 percent in January=through-May to 102.58 percent in January-through-June. Transportation equipment increased from 96.90 percent to 98.27 percent in the same periods. These two categories are responsible for 83 percent of the 0.7 percent improvement for the sector. Within the respective sectors, the products responsible for this performance were crystal sugar (from 27 percent less in January-through-May to 8 percent less in January-through-June) and pickup trucks and utility vehicles smaller than 100 horsepower, which increased from minus 10.7 percent to minus 4.8 percent in the two periods.

According to the Planning Ministry announcement, the categories that contributed the most to the 6.6 percent increase were metallurgy, with an increase of 13 percent; machinery, 15.4 percent; chemicals, 6.2 percent; textiles, 5.6 percent. Together, they were responsible for 63 percent of manufacturing industry growth.

Of the four industrial segments, the notice continues, only nondurable consumer goods decreased in relation to the January-through-May period: minus 0.4 percent. Increases of at least 1 percent were recorded in the other categories in the same comparison. Intermediate goods continued to have the best performance (up 7.6 percent), also having the largest share in composition of aggregate growth of the manufacturing sector: 59 percent.

The cumulative indicator for the extractive sector in the first 6 months showed a 22 percent increase, associated mainly with production increases in iron ore (37.7 percent) and crude petroleum (15.6 percent).

EMPLOYMENT RISES IN 8 OF 10 MAJOR AREAS IN JUNE

Sao Paulo FOLHA DE SAO PAULO in Portuguese 26 Aug 80 p 13

[Text] Brasilia--Aggregate employment increased in 8 of the 10 major Brazilian metropolitan regions in June as compared to May. The increase was 0.18 percent in Sao Paulo; 0.91 percent in Belo Horizonte; 0.06 percent in Belem; 0.49 percent in Fortaleza; 0.49 percent in Salvador; 0.08 percent in Recife; 0.81 percent in Porto Alegre; and 0.34 percent in Brasilia. Only Rio de Janeiro and Curitiba reported declines, of 0.12 percent and 0.29 percent, respectively.

This information, released yesterday by the Labor Ministry, is from the survey made by SINE (National Employment System) in 3,844 companies with a total of 2,775,000 employees located in the nation's 10 major metropolitan regions. The survey includes companies with over 50 employees in the sectors of industry, civil construction, commerce and services.

In Sao Paulo, industry increased employment 0.17 percent; commerce, 0.35 percent; and services, 0.25 percent. Civil construction reduced employment by 0.39 percent. In Rio de Janeiro, the nation's second largest labor market, industry had 0.43 percent less jobs and services had 0.22 percent less, while civil construction employment grew 0.52 percent and commerce, 0.69 percent.

Taking June 1979 as a base, Salvador had the greatest increase in employment, with 7.10 percent, followed by Belo Horizonte, with 5.39 percent; Porto Alegre, 4.88 percent; Fortaleza, 3.84 percent; Recife, 3.54 percent; and Sao Paulo, with 1 percent. Four metropolitan regions had a reduction in employment during the same period: Curitiba, down 1.3 percent; Belem, down 1.2 percent; Brasilia, 1.01 percent; and Rio de Janeiro, 0.12 percent.

Turnover

Labor turnover also fell in 8 of the 10 metropolitan regions during June as compared to May. In Sao Paulo it fell from 3.2 in May to 3.1 in June; in Rio de Janeiro, from 3.8 to 3.5, and in Belo Horizonte, from 3.6 to 3.3, a trend occurring in all the other state capitals except Belem, where turnover increased from 5.2 to 5.5, and in Curitiba, which increased from 3.9 to 4.0.

The lowest sectoral labor turnover rates were in services and the highest in civil construction, which always pushes up the averages. The highest labor turnover rate was in civil construction in Fortaleza, with a 13.9 percent turnover.

INCENTIVE MEASURES FOR EXPORT TRADE APPROVED

Brasilia CORREIO BRAZILIENSE in Portuguese 28 Aug 80 p 7

[Text] The maintenance of the rate of 15 percent for the tax on financial operations (IOF) for imports for an indefinite period as well as a reduction in the export tax for various types of leather, and also authorizations for the Central Bank to collect the difference between the rates of income and the payment of foreign financing for importers of Brazilian products were the main measures in the foreign trade sector approved during the meeting of the National Monetary Council yesterday.

In explaining these decisions, Minister of Finance Ernane Galveas stressed the authorization for the Central Bank to equalize interest rates on foreign financing for importers of Brazilian products, recalling that this measure should provide increased opportunities for the placement of Brazilian exports on new markets, for example in Africa and Latin America.

Financing

To justify the maintenance of the 15-percent IOF rate on exchange operations, Ernane Galveas explained that the demand for imports continues to be high, and therefore the government sees no reason to reduce the rate to 10 percent, as was earlier planned, based on a view of the tax as a factor in discouraging purchases abroad. He noted that a reduction in the IOF for foreign exchange will now depend on the future development of imports.

In relation to the authorization for the Central Bank to equalize interest rates in cases involving foreign financing for the import of Brazilian products, Minister Ernane Galveas explained that the domestic banking agencies abroad, or foreign banks using their own resources, can finance imports of Brazilian products at rates corresponding to those applied domestically for the financing of exports. Currently, these rates are between eight and nine percent.

In addition to this, the National Monetary Council decided to allow accredited banks to take foreign currency resources and deposit them with the Central Bank, using a cruzeiro counterpart for financing operations for export productions, or for the purchase of foreign exchange for exports financed on the basis of Resolution No 509.

Reduction

Another measure approved at the meeting yesterday was the reduction of the export tax from 36 to 18 percent on salt-seasoned cowhide. The tax on "wet blue" hide was reduced from 30 to 15 percent, that on tanned hide from 18 to 5 percent, and that on semi-finished hide from 23 to 5 percent.

The National Monetary Council also decided to alter the calculations for using financing for export products, to the advantage of leather manufacturing enterprises which henceforth will not have to deduct the drawback portion to obtain the financing for which Resolution No 602 provides. With this measure, these enterprises will be entitled to a greater range of financing for products destined for export.

Banks

Foreign banking agencies which have been authorized to operate on our national territory will henceforth be obliged to show an initial capital minimum of approximately 1 billion cruzeiros (420,000 times the greater reference value). A decision to this effect was approved yesterday during a meeting of the National Monetary Council, which sought to establish for this country the same criteria adopted by almost the whole of the international community.

Reducing the Trade Balance

Financing everything exported--this was the prevailing concept in yesterday's decisions by the National Monetary Council. It represents a truly determined intention to recover the ground lost when the trade deficit balance is not only high (2.2 billion U.S. dollars up until July) but has shown an upward trend. The council decided yesterday that the Central Bank will collect the cost differential for the financing of exports with resources contracted abroad. It also decided to finance 100 percent of the exports of manufactured products effected through the drawback system. In other words, the total of supplies imported for domestic processing and committed to the foreign market will no longer be discounted from the financing.

This represents, therefore, a substantial transfusion of effort. But it is still not enough. At least three points will merit a review by the government as urgent as this one now, in connection with the definition of unlimited resources for exports. The first of them has to do with a modern and dynamic marketing structure. This is the model adopted by the Japanese trading companies, which are even being imitated by the North Americans. International trade channels require trained personnel, high in quantity and quality. They also demand the linking of state policies with business policies.

The second point has to do with the removal of bureaucratic barriers identified as superfluous. The third point pertains to the deterioration in trade relations which has harmed Brazil. As we are basically exporters of raw materials, the government policies as to when, where and how to sell have been questioned, specifically, to give just some examples, in the cases of coffee, cacao and sugar.

The urgent need for the adoption of these measures is easily explained. Unless the country begins to produce a surplus in its trade balance, it will not be possible to begin to correct the balance of payments. This account is simple too: what is left over when purchases are subtracted from sales will contribute to reducing dependence on resources contracted abroad and needed to support domestic growth in the country. As the trend is toward a continued increase in value for imports (note the case of oil) and as there is heavy interest to be paid, either the country must begin to export more than it imports or the "bottomless pit" will cease to be a painful possibility and will become a concrete threat. It is not without reason that the entire government recognizes that a continued lack of equilibrium in the balance of payments, without the beginning of a change, is much more serious than high inflation.

PETROBRAS INVESTMENTS, PLANS, GOALS REVIEWED

[Text] Brasilia--The PETROBRAS [Brazilian Petroleum Corporation] exploration department will make investments between 1981 and 1985 totaling $4.5 billion U.S. Taking the budget program at average cost for this year into account, and using a rate of attraction of 15 percent per year, this will give the enterprise a net profit of $500 million to $2 billion. This estimate is valid, hypothesizing a real increase in the average price, CIF, for imported oil of 2 or 4 percent per year, and domestic discoveries within the periods established in the 5-year plan drafted by Minister of Mines and Energy Cesar Cals.

These estimates are included in a document sent to Brasilia by the PETROBRAS board of directors and approved at a meeting last 24 July. The document sets forth the exploratory guidelines which will make it possible to discover the recoverable volume of crude oil needed for the production of 500,000 barrels per day by 1985. However, this goal may be increased by 30,000 barrels per day, it was announced at a recent luncheon with Minister Cesar Cals by Carlos Walter and Jose Marques Neto, exploration and production directors, respectively, at the state enterprise.

The Plans

The estimates approved, which are divided into three parts, include a survey of the exploratory efforts pursued in the country up to the month of December of last year. They define the goal and the guidelines for the 5-year period from 1981 through 1985, as well as quantifying the physical programs and budgets for achieving what the government seeks.

According to the document, oil exploration in Brazil led to the discovery, up until the end of 1979, of 372.3 million cubic meters of oil, 62.4 billion cubic meters of gas, and 6.2 million cubic meters of liquid natural gas. In terms of equivalent oil volume, the result comes to a total of 2.744 trillion barrels.

Up until last December, 452 wells were drilled on the continental shelf and 1,737 on land, with a rate of success for oil alone of 18 percent. The discoveries on the continental shelf average 257,000 cubic meters of the product and 44 million cubic meters of gas each. Each meter drilled produced 83 cubic meters of oil. For the land basins, the figures were 147,000 cubic meters per well for oil, 24 million cubic meters for gas and 81 cubic meters per meter drilled.

Computing the cost of these wells, the surveying of 267,000 kilometers of maritime seismic lines and 112,000 kilometers on the continent, as well as the other exploration costs, the investments totaled 216 billion cruzeiros, at average prices for this year, up to December of 1979. The document notes that this volume accounts for an average of 30 percent of the investments of the state enterprise between 1954 and 1979.

Future Goals

On the basis of the reserves in existence up to the end of last year and production estimates, without new discoveries, it would be necessary to add to these figures 120,000 barrels per day by 1985 "so that the governmental goal of 500,000 barrels per day can be achieved." The exploration department has calculated, according to the document approved, the volume of recoverable oil which must be discovered in order to maintain for 10 years the production desired not only by the office of the president of the republic, but by Minister Cesar Cals as well.

The PETROBRAS 5-year program calls for the drilling of 1,781 wells in 1981-1985, 806 on the continental shelf and 975 on land, "supported by an explanatory effort to which will be added 330,000 kilometers of new maritime seismic lines and 50,000 on land." As a result, PETROBRAS hopes to add approximately 207 million cubic meters of recoverable oil, as well as "a significant volume of gas."

INDONESIA STUDIES PURCHASE OF ALCOHOL PRODUCTION TECHNOLOGY

Rio de Janeiro O GLOBO in Portuguese 7 Aug 80 p 26

[Text] An Indonesian mission headed by the minister of state for research and technology, Prof Dr Engineer B. J. Habibie, expressed interest yesterday during a visit paid to PETROBRAS [Brazilian Petroleum Corporation] in the purchase of Brazilian technology in the alcohol sector, as well as other alternative energy sources such as coal. Although it is a member of OPEC and produces 1.5 million barrels of oil per day, Indonesia wants to save oil in order to place a larger volume on the international market.

The mission, made up of 15 members, visited the Research and Development Center (CENPES) at PETROBRAS in the morning and talked with the president of the enterprise, Shigeaki Ueki, in the afternoon. During the meeting, Ueki talked about the goals of the PROALCOOL [National Alcohol Program], while engineer Raul de Moraes, an alcohol expert, explained the activities of PETROBRAS in the various processes of mixing with gas and obtaining alcohol from cassava.

Sweet Potatoes

Indonesia is a heavy producer of sweet potatoes, for which the yield per hectare is five times that for sugarcane. If this technology is purchased, the processes used in Brazil would have to be adapted, since the raw materials are different.

However, the mission will not sign any formal agreement in Brazil, utilizing this visit merely for the purpose of talks. The Indonesians will visit Sao Paulo today and will then go to Brasilia, where they will meet with Minister of Mines and Energy Cesar Cals and Minister of Foreign Affairs Saraiva Guerreiro.

STEEL PRODUCTION SHOWS 8.4 PERCENT INCREASE IN JULY

Sao Paulo O ESTADO DE SAO PAULO in Portuguese 10 Aug 80 p 53

[Text] Rio de Janeiro--Brazilian steel production reached 1,307,900 tons last July, showing an increase of 8.4 percent over the same month the preceding year, the Brazilian Iron and Steel Institute (IBS) has announced.

Eight hundred sixty-one thousand five hundred tons of ingots were produced, along with 433,600 tons of continuous products and 12,800 tons of steel for casting.

The IBS also announced that the production of laminated products in July was up 8.5 percent over the production in July of last year. Laminated plates totaled 607,700 tons and non-plate laminated shapes 478,700 tons.

Production of pig iron for July totaled 878,500 tons as compared to 849,800 during the same month last year. These figures pertain only to the production of the integrated iron and steel plants, excluding that of independent pig iron producers. Average daily production of pig iron was 28,300 tons, that of steel 42,200 tons, and that of laminated steel 35,000 tons.

The IBS also made it clear that the regional distribution of steel production in July was as follows: Minas Gerais, 486,100 tons; Sao Paulo, 420,800 tons; Rio de Janeiro, 292,100 tons; and other states, 108,900 tons.

CALS SEEKS CZECHOSLOVAK TECHNOLOGY FOR MINING COAL

Brasilia CORREIO BRAZILIENSE in Portuguese 26 Aug 80 p 7

[Text] Mines and Energy Minister Cesar Cals will go to Czechoslovakia on 17 September and remain there a week, heading a delegation of leading government officials and private industrialists for the purpose of selling more iron ore, soybeans, coffee, castor oil and other products in exchange for technology for mining Brazilian coal as well as a possible installation of cement factories in Brazil. Diplomatic sources revealed yesterday that the agenda has not yet been completed, but will probably be by the end of this week.

The subject was discussed yesterday in a closed meeting at the SEPLAN [Planning Secretariat] attended by ministers Cesar Cals, Delfim Netto, Camilo Pena and Ernani Galveas and the secretary general of the Finance Ministry, Eduardo de Carvalho. The Ministry of Mines and Energy will announce more details shortly, "when there are more concrete facts." In the state-enterprise area, the committee will have representatives of the Rio Doce Valley Company, the Brazilian Electric Power Enterprise Support Company, INTERBRAS [PETROBRAS [Brazilian Petroleum Corporation] International Trade, Inc], Itamarati [Foreign Affairs Ministry] (Industry and Commerce Office) and ELETROBRAS [Brazilian Electric Power Companies, Inc]. There will be other meetings for "a final consensus on a broad range of matters still pending."

MIGUEL KAST DISCUSSES ODEPLAN ECONOMIC PROGRAM

Santiago EL MERCURIO in Spanish 7 Sep 80 pp A-1, A-12

[Interview with Miguel Kast, minister-director of the National Planning Office (ODEPLAN); date not given]

[Text] Economic indicators clearly show that before this decade comes to a close, Chile should gain entry to the club that seemed so far out of reach: the club of developed countries. This is the meaning of the sacrifices that citizens have borne in recent years in order to put an economic and social policy designed for that purpose into practice. This is also the significance which government experts see in the constitutional framework which is the subject of the plebiscite on Thursday and in the years of transition leading to the time when the constitution will go into effect.

Nevertheless, the issue has apparently been outside the pre-election debate of recent days, perhaps because those who adopt an attitude of opposition have preferred to divert it to political-ideological terms more likely to serve their interests. But the citizens are concerned and the real question that every person will ask when it comes time to vote on the plebiscite is: How will my own life change for the better in the coming years?

EL MERCURIO therefore went to Minister Miguel Kast, director of ODEPLAN, the government organization in charge of drafting and designing the economic and social plans which the ministries subsequently put into practice. Kast, 32, the holder of a doctorate in economics from the United States and one of the senior members of the regime, is a man who is not afraid to say clearly that the sectors with the greatest resources should have to pay high taxes, that the "antimonopoly" vigilance should be stepped up and that the task of helping those who live in extreme poverty to improve their lot is so urgent that it cannot be put off beyond the transitional phase.

But these proposals have gone further and already form part of an Economic-Social Program for 1981-1989, a program which, in order to go into effect, needs the approval of the new constitution and which, for that very reason, will not be made public until after 12 September.

Development as a Means

[Question] Mr Kast, what does being part of a developed country mean for the average citizen? How is one to know whether the development of which the figures speak will knock on one's own door?

[Answer] It is clear that if the current rates of economic growth are maintained -- three times the rates of the past -- Chile should be a developed country within the decade. But based on the government's economic-social program, which is founded on the Western Christian conception of life, it is not development in itself that is pursued, but rather, development is a means of achieving the higher values of man. Consequently, it is as important to achieve development as it is to ensure that each and every one may enjoy it.

[Question] Unemployment rates, currently running over 12 percent, may mean that such a prospect seems quite unreal to those affected by the problem.

[Answer] The first objective of the economic and social plan for this decade precisely consists in increasing employment and job stability. The government has set as an unpostponable task the creation of 600,000 new jobs over the first 5 years and another 400,000 over the second 4 years.

[Question] Along with unemployment, it is the problem of the lack of housing which in many cases hurts family stability, viewed as one of the pillars on which the model of society reflected in the plebiscite is based.

[Answer] We are very aware of this. One of our goals in the coming years is to build 900,000 new housing units and to tear down those which are not healthy dwelling places.

[Question] That is an ambitious goal. What makes you so sure that you will be able to meet it?

[Answer] The direct subsidies received from the government will be larger and larger, for while it is true that in the current system, no group will be specifically harmed and that no other group can receive special benefits, the sector of extreme poverty is excepted from this principle and receives priority from the government. But the construction boom will also be the result of other factors, such as the increase in income of the population, the existence of long-range credits at a moderate rate of interest to be offered by the capital market and the creation of an effective rental market.

Improving Standard of Living

[Question] Does the fact that one has a house and steady job then mean that a person is already part of a developed country?

[Answer] This and much more. If the new constitution is approved, the requirement for putting the economic-social program for this decade into practice, it will mean that the government commits itself to achieving a standard of health for the population that is comparable to that now found in developed countries, to establishing an educational system granting true equality of opportunities, to increasing the purchasing power of pensions until the minimum pension reaches 5,000 pesos a month at today's rates, and to attaining an important and unheard-of improvement in the standard of living of the Chilean people.

[Question] What goal could be proposed for the end of this decade in terms of improving the standard of living of all Chileans?

[Answer] It is a precise goal set up in the economic-social program. One out of every seven Chileans will have a car. One out of every five will have a television and other modern domestic appliances. One out of every seven will have a telephone. We are also contemplating making it possible for the vast majority to save and allow a major increase in spending for entertainment and family recreation.

Institutional Framework for Progress

[Question] Why does this economic-social program require the approval of a new constitution in order to go into practice?

[Answer] It is a fundamental premise that in order to change the country from being of the proletariat, which Chile was, into a country of owners, one must have an institutional framework such as the one proposed, one that recognizes and ensures citizens of the right to health protection, the right to education, the right to assemble, the right to work, the right to form unions, the right to create and the right to property. In sum, the right to live in a country in which the government serves man and not the reverse is the great transformation we are proposing. We must also realize that it is fundamental to have clear rules of play in order to commit ourselves to lasting economic development.

Economic Measures

[Question] In your opinion, what economic measures will have to be put into practice in order to achieve that which you call the transformation of proletarian Chileans into owners?

[Answer] The first thing is to keep inflation at a low level, which will be achieved by maintaining a balanced budget and by not allowing the government to spend more than it takes in. Next, we must reduce taxes, always abiding by the budget.

[Answer] No, not if one reduces taxes such as those placed on work, increasing deductions for benefits, and if one intensifies measures aimed at tax evasion, using the most advanced means.

Other important economic objectives for the coming years include having an economy open to international trade which, on the one hand, will give the Chilean consumer access, at reasonable prices, to consumer goods found in other parts of the world, and second, offer foreign markets for our exports. We must give savings incentives until we reach rates on the order of 18 percent of the geographic product, integrate the domestic capital market into world money markets in order to reduce interest rates and make them uniform and promote long-range investments. We must adopt measures in order to facilitate access to the stock market for the great majority and work out the transfer of shares in certain public services to users, workers or taxpayers.

Free Competition

[Answer] Naturally, this is a policy that directly benefits consumers. That is why the government will only set prices in monopolistic sectors not subject to competition.

[Question] And how will you ensure that that competition will actually benefit the consumer?

[Answer] Plans include stepping up the action of the Free Competition Audit Board and during the next 10 years, there will be a systematic sectoral review of obstacles to competition, whether they be free entry, arbitrary regulations or concentration of industrial management.

[Question] Despite these regulations on free enterprise, there are small business sectors which have difficulty in developing because competing alongside big business is not easy and it is in the obtention of loans where they do not always receive equal treatment.

[Answer] I can say that the government is concerned with developing small business, that a guarantee fund will be set up so that loans will be granted. There will be incentives for technical assistance to these sectors.

Social Security

[Question] The people are anxiously awaiting what has been called "the modernization of Social Security," which the minister has said will consist of granting individual freedoms in the use of Social Security funds, in addition to providing the system with greater efficiency. Within an economic-social program lasting 9 years, this matter seems of vital importance. In your opinion, what should be the bases on which the new Social Security system will be erected?

[Answer] There will be five bases for this new system. We will move from a system of distribution to a mixed system of distribution and capitalization in which every person included will have a book with the amount of his contributions and interest paid. The state will guarantee all contributors a minimum pension. The tax on work causing the high current benefit deductions will be reduced. We will extend coverage to independent workers and strengthen the individual freedom of persons, who will be able to choose from among the different Social Security entities or even remain within the current system if they so wish.

Equal Educational Opportunities

[Question] With respect to education, you speak of improving the system by ensuring equal opportunities. Is it enough to transfer educational establishments to municipalities or intermediate organizations in the community?

[Answer] The main thing is that the system is being decentralized, but along with this, the government will provide more resources for the sector and proportionately speaking, more money will be given to areas, zones and families with low incomes. Decentralization in the sector will be accompanied by an improvement in the quality of education and in the level of remuneration of teachers.

[Question] Just as there will be special emphasis placed on benefits going to sectors of extreme poverty, will there be special funds allocated for the new generations?

[Answer] The entire program is aimed at providing a future of well-being for the coming generations. But one must add, for example, that the family allocation will be increased and that all children attending rural schools who did not previously receive the benefit because their parents were not included in a Social Security system will now receive it. We will increase resources granted for children in irregular situations and put an end once and for all, in the course of these 9 years, to the curse of children begging.

[Question] What will the government's family policy be during this decade?

[Answer] The government will not sponsor a reduction in the size of the Chilean family. The decision concerning the number of children will be a free and informed decision made by every couple.

ALTERNATE ENERGY SOURCES SURVEYED

Santiago EL MERCURIO in Spanish 31 Aug 80 p D-10

[Article by Roberto von Bennewitz D.]

[Excerpt] Hydraulic Potential

Our broad territory is crisscrossed by powerful rivers with a considerable slope. They all offer enormous potential.

Because of the low cost of oil, Chile previously felt no urgency in developing this splendid source of energy. We now use much less than one-tenth of the electricity provided by our waterways.

When there has been an energy shortage, it has been easier and cheaper to set up a diesel engine than to build a complicated hydroelectric powerplant. That is why governments have not been generous with ENDESA [National Electric Power, Inc.] and have not provided the money needed to design and build projects to take advantage of the power of our waterways.

Chile is rich in hydraulic power. The southernmost region of the country is the area that receives the most rain. It has torrential rivers with an important grade. The largest are the Baker and Pascua rivers. They have their origins in large lakes that will make it possible to regulate flow by several hydroelectric plants built in series. In this way, some 3 million kilowatts of power, or 24 million kilowatt-hours, can be generated, equal to nearly twice the power put out by our existing hydroelectric plants. In other words, it is the same amount of power we would obtain by burning 45 billion liters of oil.

Production

ENDESA engineer Enrique Arias figured the cost of energy produced by those plants. Including direct costs and service on the capital, he concluded that the per-kilowatt cost at the plant would be under one cent ($.008).

It is true that these generous rivers are far from the current energy-consuming centers of the country. The powerplants would be 900 kilometers from Puerto Montt, the point of arrival of ENDESA's existing lines of transmission. Furthermore, electric lines cost a great deal to build when it is a question of large amounts of power over long distances. With a summary evaluation of the Pascua and Baker powerplants, using a line to Puerto Montt, the cost is over $3 billion. It is a very high amount but not as high when one takes into consideration the value of the energy produced. If we could sell it for $.023 per kilowatt-hour, we would have a unit profit of $.015 and from the 24 billion kilowatt-hours which the plants would produce, we could obtain annual earnings of $360 million. The capital would receive interest of 12 percent annually, which indicates that immediate construction is advisable.

For this study, I took the most distant energy possibility and have shown that even that source would be advantageous. But the country has other equally generous sources closer to consumers. Only 300 kilometers from Puerto Montt, we have the Cisnes, Palena and Yelcho rivers, which could generate as much power as Pascua and Baker. Even closer is the Puelo River, with its systems of tributaries and lakes, offering another 1 million kilowatts.

This long line of electric transmission starting from the Pascua River would deliver 7 million kilowatts to Puerto Montt. In order to appreciate the full significance of this, it is enough to say that adding together the power of all its electric, hydraulic, steam, diesel and other plants, Chile has only 3 million kilowatts today.

Petrohue River: Energy vs Beauty

From Puerto Montt, the first and most important source of energy we find is the Petrohue River. Because of the very favorable conditions which the system presents, it should be exploited as soon as possible. Unfortunately, this would mean losing one of the most spectacular spots of natural beauty that Chile possesses.

The Petrohue River has its source in the Todos los Santos Lake, which is also called Esmeralda because of the beautiful color of its water. It lies at 180 meters above sea level. Running into the Reloncavi Estuary, the river could move turbines with a power of 600,000 kilowatts. Thanks to the large capacity of the lake, a capacity that could be increased by raising the height of the natural dam that formed it, we could have a powerplant that would, without losing a drop, make use of all the water poured into the lake by the copious rainfall in the region. We would have an annual production of 1 billion kilowatt-hours, which at a price of $.015 would represent an annual profit of $75 million.

But in order to achieve this sum, we would have to sacrifice the beauty of the Petrohue rapids. How many people contemplate that marvel every year? Perhaps 100,000, 200,000.... If the number were 200,000 tourists, the country would cease receiving $75 million a year for their visit. Every visitor would cost us about $375, equal to 14,000 pesos in our money.

This is not reasonable. Chile needs that money for its progress and it will need it even more in the future, when our copper is gone, when we cannot sell a single barrel of oil.

Let us go further north, where we shall find other splendid sources of energy.

Urgent Task

Ranco Lake, with its outlet, the Bueno River, can give us about 300,000 kilowatts. It follows the system of the Valdivia River, with its chain of lakes that would permit us to set up generators providing over a million kilowatts of power. The Araucania, with its Tolten and Imperial rivers, offers another half million.

Then one has the generous Biobio Basin, which already supplies us with power and in which we are building catchment projects. This system of torrential rivers and a sharp slope will, in the not-distant future, provide us with an installed power of 4 million kilowatts.

Continuing our visit to the north, we come to the Maule, Mataquito, Rapel, Maipo and Aconcagua rivers. Several of these rivers are already supplying us with power, but we can ask a great deal more of them. According to estimates of ENDESA engineers, we could set up turbines on the falls that would provide a combined power of some 5 million kilowatts.

Northern Chile is dry and does not offer important amounts of hydroelectric power.

As we have seen, our country is rich in waterways. All those enumerated could be used relatively easily and their construction is profitable today. They will be indispensable when we no longer have oil.

We can ask our hydraulic power sources to supply nearly 20 million kilowatts from their generators.

The planning and construction of these powerplants must be undertaken now, not tomorrow. A hydroelectric system takes at least 10 years to develop and in 10 years, who can guarantee that we will be able to continue buying foreign oil?

Let us not expose ourselves to the risk of one day seeing our cities plunged into darkness and our industry almost paralyzed.

In order to develop our energy system, we need an enormous sum of money. Fortunately, there are backers willing to loan large sums to profitable ventures. We have an example at hand: ENDESA recently obtained large loans without government backing. Sufficient security is provided by the use of the money and ENDESA's prestige.

There will always be bankers willing to help a country that wants to survive without oil.

Coal Reserves; Hope of Uranium

We have several coal mines, some of which have large reserves.

Those with the greatest heating power, the ones in the Arauco area, have become much more costly to work and quality is declining. Some mines have had to be closed. The Magellan coal mines have large amounts of fuel, but it has low heating power and the mines are far from centers of consumption.

In addition, coal is a nonrenewable resource and we will not always be able to rely on it.

The world placed a great deal of hope in atomic energy, uranium fission. Many powerplants have been built in different countries and they are all in operation.

In Chile, a study has been made of atomic power and it is believed that we should build two plants, each one producing 600,000 kilowatts by the 1990's.

These plants have their disadvantages. A number of accidents have shown their dangers and the people are reacting with opposition to construction. There is the difficulty of doing away with radioactive waste. Finally, there is not much uranium on the planet and one day it will be gone.

If we work out inexhaustible and clean hydroelectric power, we shall not feel the need to study atomic energy plants.

Geothermy: Another Alternative

Another source of power that would help us replace oil is geothermy. It is a well-known fact that the Earth is very hot inside and that this heat can be used to generate energy useful to man, as is already being done in many countries.

In certain areas, generally volcanic areas, there are subterranean lakes at great depths under the surface: 500, 1,000 or more meters down. Because of this depth, water is heated to high temperatures, over 200°, causing it to evaporate unless prevented from doing so by being enclosed. In certain places, the imprisoned water finds a way out and rises to the surface as a thermal spring or geyser.

In the north, we see geysers at El Tatio in Antofagasta and at Puculdiza in Tarapaca. Both springs have been studied by CORFO [Production Development Corporation] and at the first, construction has begun of a powerplant that will produce 30,000 kilowatts.

In one year, this geothermic powerplant will be able to generate enough power to do away with the diesel engines that are now consuming $8 million worth of imported oil annually.

The cost of the plant will be very similar to that of a hydroelectric plant, about $1,000 per kilowatt, or a total of $30 million, including the cost of lines of transmission to places of consumption. Every kilowatt-hour produced will cost less than half what energy produced by diesel now costs. It is estimated that the plant will return the capital invested in it in 4 years.

Throughout the country, there are many hot springs, some with geysers, indicating the possibility of finding sources of geothermic energy.

A study for a powerplant using heat from the land is long and costly. One has to drill down about 100 meters. If usable steam is found, valves are installed to allow it to escape and for years, the behavior of the spring is controlled.

If we want to find a substitute for oil, we shall have to speed up these studies, giving CORFO the money it needs. But it must be done right now if we do not want to find ourselves without energy for our growing consumption.

Solar Energy

Nature provides us with other forms of usable energy: tides, the force of waves, and so on. Finally, there is one type of energy that can be used which Chile has in abundance: the heat from the direct rays of the sun.

We have immense deserts in the north where one has clear skies and a sun that heats all year long. Solar irradiation in those deserts is among the most intense in the world.

In order to take advantage of the heat from solar rays to produce electric power, one has to set up hundreds of large, flat mirrors. The mirrors must be oriented in such a way that the solar rays they reflect are concentrated on a large boiler placed on a tower. Water in the boiler reaches a high temperature, from 200°to 400°, and steam under great pressure is thus produced to be used by turbines and electric generators.

As the sun moves in the sky, the mirrors have mechanisms that are activated electronically causing the luminous rays to concentrate on the boiler at all times.

In a 15-hectare area, one can install mirrors with a total surface of 50,000 square meters. With the great solar irradiation of the Chilean deserts, some 10,000 kilowatts can be generated. Northern Chile has over a million hectares that could be used.

The solar powerplants that are operating in different countries turned out to be expensive because they are small and experimental. They are nearly ten times as expensive as an equivalent hydroelectric plant.

American factories are working on the construction of solar powerplants that would be sold ready to be installed. They would produce 10,000 kilowatts per unit and could be set up fairly rapidly.

However, the sun shines only a few hours a day and at night, powerplants using its heat would be inactive. Industry requires energy 24 hours a day. We still have no efficient means of storing electricity in large quantities for later use. We have accumulators or lead batteries used by automobiles, but they are notoriously imperfect. They are heavy, use corrosive liquids and produce gases that can explode. One cannot use such batteries to store solar energy.

Solar Plants and Storage Lakes

We can store energy in another manner, that of taking water from a lower tank to another one located higher. This can be done at the powerplant that we shall build in Petrohue, making use of the difference in level between the waters of Todos los Santos Lake and the Reloncavi Estuary, which is at sea level. The turbines for this powerplant should be reversible -- in other words, act as water pumps. When the solar plants operate, once there is a surplus of electric power, it would be sent to Petrohue and the pumps would pump the water from the estuary into the lake. At night, the turbines would operate normally and deliver the accumulated energy to the system.

All our powerplants on two lakes, as is the case of the plant that would take advantage of the difference in altitude between the lakes in Valdivia Province and which provide an installed power of 1 million kilowatts, could be planned for three times the amount of power. During the 8 hours of operation of the solar plants in the northern deserts, water would be accumulated in the upper lakes of the system and at night, the operation would be reversed, allowing us to recover the electric power and using turbines as such.

Then there are the plants in the Biobio system, which could accumulate enormous quantities of solar energy. The one that currently offers the greatest interest because it is now being built and because it is closer to the center of electric consumption is the one in the Colbun Machicura system. If this system is made reversible, during the hours the sun shines, its energy could drain off the artificial lake of Machicura, sending its waters to Colbun Lake. This would be a great storage system that would not be lacking in water even during the driest year, while supplying a continuous 4 million kilowatts.

With the combined system of solar plants and storage lakes, we could achieve an output nearly equal to that of all our electric generating systems. The country's system of rivers is very variable and during times of heavy rains, the dam spillways allow excess water to run off, water that means power. With storage lakes, this loss would be prevented.

In addition, we might say that the facility we have for raising water would improve our irrigation systems.

Electric transmission lines are expensive. It is frightening to calculate the diameter of an electric line that would carry several million kilowatts, even using the highest voltages now common. Such a line would be built in Chile, linking the southern plants, the sunny deserts of the north and our large electric consumption in the center of the country. We will have to spend billions of dollars, but the advantages are much greater.

By transferring energy back and forth from the north to the south, we shall become independent of oil and not be victims of the energy crisis, whose threatening spectre is already on the horizon.

But it is necessary to begin studies and undertake construction today, not tomorrow!

MINES MINISTER ANNOUNCES 1981 OIL PRODUCTION INCREASE

Santiago LA NACION in Spanish 2 Sep 80 p 13-A [Text] Our country will produce 2.4 million cubic meters of oil next year, thereby exceeding the maximum annual figure achieved by ENAP [National Petroleum Enterprise] in 36 years.

This announcement was made yesterday by RAdm Carlos Quinones, minister of mines, at the official opening of a gasoline plant in the Punta Arenas region. Quinones added that by the end of this year, production will amount to 1.2 million cubic meters.

The Topping de Gregorio gasoline plant, located in the 12th Region, officially started operations yesterday. It will produce 28,000 cubic meters of kerosene, 66,000 cubic meters of diesel fuel and 30,000 cubic meters of fuel oil annually, thereby putting an end to the serious fuel supply problem in the region. Up to this time, those products had to be hauled from refineries in the central part of the country to the southern region. The cost of transport amounted to $2.3 million annually.

Quinones said that next year's plans include the startup of four oil platforms. It is estimated that production will reach 2.4 million cubic meters, thereby surpassing the maximum annual level reached during ENAP's 36 years of operations.

The minister added that at the end of 1978, oil production on land was dropping at a rate of 12 percent annually, reaching figures of only 928,000 cubic meters. However, "thanks to the vision and determined support of the president of the republic, who backed production and provided ENAP with the economic means to work oil in the Strait of Magellan, offshore oil began to be produced on 8 January 1979. From that time on, platforms have been added at different maritime sites, which put an end to the decline last year, when 1.2 million cubic meters were produced. By the end of this year, we shall reach the 1.9-million-cubic-meter-level."

Plans for 1981 include the startup of four more platforms and it is estimated that production will total 2.4 million cubic meters of oil. "With the new De Gregorio gasoline plant, one more phase of the programs is completed and a logical aspiration of the 12th Region is fulfilled, that of having its own supply of products for its industry and means of transport."

Designed by the Randall Corporation, the plant came to Punta Arenas in mid February of this year. Thanks to the skill of ENAP workers and their contractors, the plant went into operation only 6 months after it was set up.

The minister said that if the needs of the zone should make it necessary to produce one product more than another, it can be done, given the plant's operating flexibility. The investment amounted to $6 million.

The minister of mines emphasized in his speech that there has been "a constant execution of ENAP development programs in the 12th Region, which has been a gigantic undertaking. It is of enormous significance for Chile, at a crucial time in mankind's history when fossil fuels grow more and more scarce and high prices check the economic growth of regions."

The Offshore Project "is of great significance and carries a message of confidence in the people of Chile and their government," Quinones said.

The minister added: "I believe that it is in the oil projects where we can see most clearly that this government is not demagogic, not made up of politicians with inflated talk, promises and passion. It is a government of achievement, order and tranquillity. The work has been planned in long-range terms, without flattering appetites or satisfying passing interests. This propitious climate is what has allowed the people to work with enthusiasm and discipline, bringing about this noteworthy reemergence of the country where hopes pinned on the future are being realized."

Attending the opening ceremony were the administrator of ENAP in Punta Arenas, Leon Sougarret, the general manager of operations and the minister's advisers, along with other officials.

BRIEFS

JAPANESE INVESTMENTS UP—Japanese business leader Bunichiro Tanabe announced yesterday that "the Chilean economy is growing at a surprisingly high rate, aided by the wise policy of economic openness," and predicted a strong increase in commercial trade and Japanese investments in Chile." Tanabe is the president of the delegation of 80 Japanese businessmen and executives who tomorrow will begin the second round of talks with their Chilean colleagues within the framework of the Chile-Japan Business Committee. In addition, he heads the board of directors of the gigantic Mitsubishi Corporation, an enterprise which last year recorded sales totaling $44 billion. Minutes after arriving at the Arturo Merino Benitez Airport, the foreign executive talked with newsmen and told them that this is the most important and most representative economic mission that has come to Chile from Japan. "At the present time, commercial trade amounts to $800 million (1979 figure) between both countries, and I believe that it will continue to rise sharply. I also believe that investments will increase in the future," he said. At the airport, Tanabe was received by the president of the Manufacturing Development Company, Hernan Daroch, the Japanese ambassador to Chile, Genichi Akatani, and Chile's commercial attache to Japan, Gutavo Ponce. Tanabe said that it should be remembered that Chile's territory is twice that of Japan, with a population representing one-tenth of the Asian country. Chile also has valuable raw materials and abundant sources of energy, which Japan lacks almost completely. "That is why we believe that there are broad possibilities of developing complementary trade in which we would process the raw materials you produce." Tanabe was accompanied by representatives of 50 Japanese enterprises of the highest level in their country and the world. As a whole, the firms represented have a level of sales of $284 billion and provide jobs for over 450,000 workers. [Text] [Santiago EL MERCURIO in Spanish 7 Sep 80 p C-1] 11,464

ENERGY INDEPENDENCE BY 1987--Miguel Kast, minister-director of ODEPLAN [National Planning Office], said yesterday that by 1986 or 1987, Chile may achieve energy independence, based on investment and research programs already underway. Kast made his statement at the round table held yesterday afternoon at the Diego Portales Building. The meeting was held for foreign newsmen in the country covering the plebiscite. Speaking at the same meeting was Maria Teresa Infante, whose topic was educational development, and Dr Fernando Monckeberg, who spoke on infant nutrition. In addition, the officials answered various questions put to them by journalists. Kast described the path that Chile has followed in the past 7 years for the purpose of helping the country achieve economic and social development. After speaking about the situation inherited from the Marxist regime, the minister said that Chile had 22 percent of its population living in extreme poverty -- that is, one out of every five citizens had a standard of living below the minimum. He then went on to describe measures adopted by this government in order to meet the emergency, based on the social market economy. The minister said that in the future, it is hoped that the country will be free of inflation because of all the safeguards of a legal nature taken in financial legislation. "Chile will be tremendously diversified and less vulnerable to economic fluctuations that afflict the world," he said, because we shall cease being a single-product country. We even believe that with the investment and research programs already underway, it is not frivolous to hope that by 1986-1987, Chile will have energy independence, both with regard to programs taking the place of consumable expenditures and increased production. We should be a country in which one out of seven of our citizens can have access to a car and telephone and where the entire housing program will be near solution by the end of the decade. Regarding employment, we believe that with all the incentive measures, within 3 years we shall be quite far below our historic unemployment level, with increased purchasing power of wages and salaries." The minister said that the three objectives are gradually being achieved because the initial instability was overcome, greater economic growth has been achieved and income redistribution programs have been substantially improved, to the point that social spending per capita in the past 7 years has risen 60 percent. NEW ATAC EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE FOR 1979-1982 TERM

[Text] Ernesto Cardet, chairman of the committee for supervision of the association's general election, held on 5 October of this year, introduced the new ATAC Executive Committee, elected for the 1979-1982 term, during the closing ceremony of the 42d Conference.

According to the ballot count, the Executive Committee is composed of the following comrades:

	% Votes
1. Oscar Almazan del Olmo, president.	74
2. Dulce Maria Martinez, vice president for international relations.	71
3. Ricardo Campo Zabala, vice president for agricultural affairs.	66
4. Emilio Diaz Garcia, vice president for industrial affairs.	64
5. Eduardo David Posada, vice president for public relations.	62
6. Magaly Rodriguez Martinez, vice president for byproducts.	59
7. Ricardo Perez Lima, vice president for coordination of ATAC events.	58
8. Jorge Abreu Cil, treasurer.	56
9. Ricardo Santisteban, executive secretary.	51
10. Luis Toja Suarez, vice president for agro-industrial affairs.	51

In addition to Cardet, the election supervision committee consisted of Ricardo Santisteban Diaz, Orlando F. Pina and Ruben Paz Perez.

In accordance with the bylaws, the new Executive Committee met from 1430 to 1530 hours on 12 October 1979 and elected Comrade Oscar Almazan del Olmo president of the association. The remaining posts were distributed within the Executive Committee at its first working session.

TELEVISION SERIALS AS POLITICAL TOOLS DISCUSSED

Havana LA GACETA DE CUBA in Spanish Jul 80 pp 4-6

[Interview with radio and television writer Abelardo Vidal Rivas, by Aquiles Heel]

[Text] Abelardo Vidal Rivas, coauthor, with Nilda Rodriguez, of the script for the series "It Has Had to Be in Silence," speaks to LA GACETA DE CUBA's readers about various issues involved in his job as a radio and television writer. As people know, he and she, along with director Jesus Cabrera, were given one of the "Caracol" awards at the first UNEAC [National Union of Cuban Writers and Artists] awards ceremony for works in the mass media.

Born in Baracoa in the present province of Guantanamo on 25 November 1939, he personally initiated the radio serial "Section 40" in 1967. In 1976, he received a degree in art history from the University of Havana. One year before that, he began to work as an official at the Ministry of Interior. In 1979, he joined the team that created the first 12 episodes of "It Has Had to Be in Silence" in honor of the 20th anniversary of the formation of the state security organs. Later he would be the author of the story-line and the script for the second series of "Julito the Fisherman."

The interview proper begins. Abelardo Vidal speaks readily and articulately. He answers each question immediately, as if he has always had the answer carefully prepared, although before our conversation he did not know what questions would be asked.

[Question] To what extent can the radio serial "Section 40" be considered the forerunner of "It Has Had to Be in Silence"?

[Answer] You know that with respect to the subject of political action, dealt with at times in the police or what is called the espionage genre after the triumph of the Revolution, "Section 40" and "Mobile 8"--the latter written by others--were the beginning of a new way of approaching this genre. I wrote the first radio series of "Section 40," and I alternated for a long time with Gerardo Fernandez in doing the scripts.

He went on: "From the outset, Gerardo and I took a different approach from that of the television version of 'Section 40.' The principal characteristics of the stories we wrote were intended to show an officer and an agent of the security organs who were as like real men as possible, with their own psychological makeup, capable of making mistakes, but also of having successes. In short: to come as closely as possible to the reality of things."

That is not all, though: "In both 'It Has Had to Be . . .' and in 'Julito' we've followed that line, those same principles that, during the years when I wrote 'Section 40' for radio, enabled me to experiment, to put them to the test of acceptance by the listening audience. 'Section 40,' with its strengths and weaknesses, provided us with a means of seeking a new way of dealing with these themes without disassociating them from social life, from the our people's history."

He concluded his answer in this way: "Thus, speaking for myself, I'd go so far as to say that among the forerunners for 'It Has Had to Be' is the radio version of 'Section 40.' For example, I can tell you that when I wrote 'Operation Transfer,' which is the story of Alberto Delgado, which then inspired Cuban film-makers to produce 'The Man from Maisinicu,' the character of this security agent, unquestionably a hero, was colored with such traits as an excessive impulsiveness, a sense of bravery that was at times imprudent, and a tendency to overstate his opinions; but in the end he always completed the missions assigned to him."

[Question] Are there similarities, with respect to structure or dramaturgy, with Semyonov's "17 Moments One Spring"?

[Answer] I don't think there are structurally. I am sure that Semyonov's series is there in the way of dealing with certain situations and in the treatment of some characters in "It Has Had to Be." Moreover, I would say that a writer of this genre would be lying or immodest if he failed to acknowledge the influence of "17 Moments" when dealing with this theme. It isn't there in structural matters, but is in content.

He went on: "The enormously human treatment of the character of Stirlitz, that man tangled in a whole web of conflicts that are not resolved in the slam-bang style of the heroes of capitalist espionage literature; that man who endures uprooting from his homeland, separation from his family; who is troubled by the problems of the comrades with whom he works. That approach, I think, cannot be overlooked by any of us who write about people who engage in such activities."

A pause. Abelardo launched into a flashback.

"We're a somewhat nomadic family. I caught polio when I was 8 months old, and that led us into a nomadic existence. We traveled from Baracoa to Victoria de las Tunas to Miami, and around 1950 we moved to Santa Clara. We were there until 1956. Before that, in 1952, I had entered the institute. And there is when I began to take part in student activities aimed at opposition to the tyranny. Also, as an ajefista [AJF member] member I saw a Thompson for the first time, held by Osvaldo Herrera, now a martyr of the Revolution, who was older than we, but they taught us to tear down and reassemble a weapon there."

[Question] Have you considered reversing the process; that is making a written narrative of the TV series?

[Answer] Yes; I plan to do that. I even think that "It Has Had to Be," which has been written with comrade Nilda Rodriguez, is a series with enough material for several books. For, since it covered a very long period of time, some 20 years of the history of the security organs, in 12 chapters, there are situations that deserve more extensive development. In that way there would be more tension and suspense, and they would benefit from the very description of events as well as from deeper character development.

He went on: "Now, undertaking the task of writing a novel isn't easy. For in something written for TV or film, if you want, a large percentage of the final result is shared with the director, the cast and the technical crew. In literature, the writer himself assumes all those functions and has to deal with them and with the esthetic values required. It isn't easy. And it takes time."

[Question] In the course of your work as a radio and TV writer in general, what significance do you think "It Has Had to Be" has?

[Answer] In the first place, because I am a revolutionary, it meant a great deal to me that they chose me to be a part of the collective charged with producing the series honoring the fighters belonging to the state security organs on their 20th anniversary. At the same time, it was a challenge to try to portray the essence of the lives and work of these men and women in proper depth.

He continued: "It was my first series for TV as a writer. I had written stories, but never a continued show. The fact that it was a program with such a large viewing audience enabled me to share my point of view, expressed artistically, with a large segment of the population. This is especially true of young people, for I was able to establish a dialog with those who, because of their age, were unable to experience moments in our history when the class struggle manifested itself very violently. For a creator, those opportunities for access to the mass of the people, entailing no concessions to superficiality or simplemindedness, are really extremely important. It's speaking directly to thousands of people. Portraying the emotions felt by the characters in this piece of fiction. I should say as a writer that we always had the advice of top officials at the MININT [Ministry of Interior], a fact that undoubtedly contributed to the accuracy of the message produced."

The account of his background resumed:

"Then, because of family financial difficulties, I returned to Baracoa in '55 or '56, and there I met the first communists I'd known. I read Stalin's 'Dialectical and Historical Materialism' and a few pages of the history of the CPSU, and we founded the first cell of the 26th of July Movement. From there I went back to Santa Clara, and then we went to Havana in 1957. During those years I belonged to different 26th of July cells, until, when the Revolution prevailed in 1959, I joined University Socialist Youth."

[Question] The process of writing a series with another person: What are the advantages, and what might the drawbacks be? Can the viewer detect the imprints of the different typewriters?

[Answer] It was written by two people because of lack of time. Nilda and I and our comrades on the state security organs' 20th anniversary committee were aware that it was an emergency solution and not the best, for, unquestionably, when reality passes through a writer it emerges colored by his own personal experiences, which can only be unique. You can follow the same creative process, but the styles are always different. You can see this when characters are made to speak. When David speaks as written by me, it's not the same as when he does it as written by Nilda. The same is true in other regards. Of course, aware that this problem would exist, we've tried to compensate for it by working closely together and by discussing the scripts. But, despite that, I don't think all problems have been solved completely.

[Question] In your specific case, it's interesting that you didn't begin as a writer, dramatist or poet, and then you devoted yourself to writing for these mass media. Could you say more about this unusual circumstance and discuss it at some length?

[Answer] I think that in this 20th century the means of creating a work of art are much more numerous than in the past because the mass media available in this century have unquestionably made great contributions. The role of television must be noted in particular. Although the opportunities to create art through television are nearly nonexistent or rare in a country where the social institutions are capitalist, in a socialist country they are media that are at the service of the working class' ideology, and they serve the people in general. A worker in these media has the obligation of recognizing the need to create art, to create good literature, by means of radio and television. That doesn't mean that I've achieved it, but rather that I do feel the obligation. Then, it happened that before starting to write a poem or a story for a magazine or a newspaper, when I felt the need to express myself it was through a radio script.

He noted, though: "I arrived at the ICR [Cuban Institute of Radio] planning to become a radio broadcasting official. I don't know whether it has been good or bad that it didn't turn out that way. First, I worked as a producer, where I was infected with the virus of needing to express myself artistically. Then I became a director, and when the radio version of 'Section 40' was begun, and I started out directing it, a chance occurrence forced me to deal with the writing of the first series. Before that, all I'd done was write articles on political subjects for local newspapers. The only background I had was an old legacy from a grandfather who was a poet, journalist and teacher in Holguin: Nicasio Vidal Pita. There was no other indication that told me my primary work would be as a writer."

He concluded the flashback:

"I was in the foreign service, at the Cuban Embassy in Colombia, until relations with our government were broken; and then I worked at the MINCEX [Ministry of Foreign Trade] until, in 1965, I was sent to study at the Provincial Party School, from where I went to work at the ICR, specifically at what was CMQ Radio. At the ICR I've been a producer, a director and radio writer. I also worked with Julio Batista on the experimental news program at Radio Rebelde [Rebel Radio]. Then I became involved in work on the subject of political action when the radio version of 'Section 40' was created at Radio Rebelde; it was also broadcast by Radio Progreso [Progress Radio]. In 1975, I moved to the Ministry of Interior, and I now work there as an official. At present I'm a candidate for party membership. I joined the Saiz Brothers Brigade with the first group of comrades from radio broadcasting. Now I'm chairman of the recently created Film, Radio and TV Section in Havana. I joined the UNEAC in 1977. I received a degree in art history in 1976. In the MININT's 6th of June Awards Program I shared the story prize for my narrative 'Picture.' And now, recently, they've given me a prize for my book of stories entitled 'I Can,' in the ANIV awards program."

[Question] When writing, for example, the script for "Julito the Fisherman," to what extent were you able to use your own experiences in the underground struggle for material in the flashbacks?

[Answer] In both "Julito" and "It Has Had to Be" some incidents came up from the period I experienced before the Revolution prevailed. I took part in some and wished I had taken part in others. I can tell you that, yes, that part of my life has come out in this series. I should state that in the case of "Julito" the story of underground activity told corresponds nearly 100 percent with the life of one of the agents whose career I researched for it.

He concluded: "There's a part of the story of the character Julito, his relationship with Elena, a comrade in the underground who later would become his wife. I recall that I also knew an 'Elena,' a brave girl, also divorced like her, whom nearly all the comrades in the cell tried to get involved with sooner or later. (And there was a good reason for it; she was very pretty.) And I also had to promise her that I wouldn't go after her until the struggle against the tyranny was over. It would be a long story to tell, but there is, in fact, an autobiographical fact that I included in this character."

NATIONAL MICROWAVE, TELEVISION SYSTEM DESCRIBED

Havana GRANMA in Spanish 30 Aug 80 p 2

[Article by Jesus Mena]

[Text] At a time when two of our fellow countryment are completing their training in Star City in the Soviet Union for the Soviet-Cuban space flight planned as part of the Intercosmos Program, it is timely to speak about the development in certain areas of the communications media of our country, such as radiobroadcasting and international telecommunications services built during this 5-year period.

Before this joint space flight occurs with the participation of a son of the first socialist country in America -- a fact that will speak eloquently about the solid bonds of friendship and cooperation existing between the nations of Cuba and the Soviet Union -- it is fitting to recall that from the time of the triumph of the Revolution, our country has made serious efforts to expand and modernize its communications media, whose achievements were strengthened during the 1976-1980 period and for which we received the unselfish aid of our Soviet brothers.

Within this context, television occupies a prominent role, given the important place it has in culture, information and entertainment for our people.

In this field, in contrast to what happened previous to 1 January 1959, when television was used in keeping with certain commercial interests, serving those areas with the greatest purchasing power, such as the cities of Havana, Matanzas, Santa Clara, Ciego de Avila, Camaguey, Holguin and Santiago de Cuba, the Revolution decided to establish two national programs or channels (the current Channel 6 and Tele-Rebelde) and expand the service to the greatest amount of territory possible, using the equipment that existed at the time.

It was thus possible to extend the service to other cities and regions in the country, such as Pinar del Rio, San Cristobal, the Isle of Youth, Guantanamo, Baracoa, Moa and Nicaro, although some of these places had only one channel.

Already early in the 1970's, the situation had changed substantially in comparison with 1959 and without major investments. However, the resources available were aimed at meeting needs in areas still not covered or poorly served and at meeting the limited possibilities and obsolescence of the equipment making up the system as a whole.

In order to resolve existing difficulties resulting from the sending of the signal originating from studios in Havana to each of the transmitters set up in the country, from Pinar del Rio to Baracoa — which at that time constituted the major problem and the reason why in over half of the territory enjoying the service, the quality of transmissions was poor or simply intolerable — one of the directives of the First Congress of the party oriented work in four basic directions:

Planning, purchasing and installing a new main artery for the National Microwave Relay System, which would support national telecommunications services from Pinar del Rio to Santiago de Cuba, replacing the inadequate and obsolete means in use to date; extending television service to new areas and improving it in others, all on both channels; replacing equipment which, because of a lack of parts on the international market or as a result of deterioration, could not guarantee the quality of service; and the introduction of the technology needed to transmit in colors on Channel 6.

By mid 1977, the plan designed was basically completed, including the establishment of the National Microwave System costing nearly 7 million pesos and having a large capacity and high quality. Through microwaves, the system connects the main national centers from which, by means of secondary stations, information is distributed that corresponds to national telecommunications services (telephone, Telex, telegrams, radio, television and others), through local systems.

Basically, this main artery has sufficient capacity to meet the country's current needs and those of the immediate future, equivalent to 960 telephone channels, 2 video channels and 8 for programs accompanying video and those broadcast by national radio. The signals are two-way, from Pinar del Rio to Guantanamo.

The National Microwave System, with French technology, is made up of 27 stations or buildings with equipment, towers and antennas properly distributed over some 1,000 kilometers, stations set up as a chain connecting with adjacent stations. From the functional standpoint, quality is on a part with the best in the world and operations are guaranteed 99.99 percent of the time.

In practical terms, this means that both telephone calls and television signals or signals from any of the services transmitted from one corner of the country to another, will have optimum quality except for fractions of a second at the worst possible time.

For the television service in particular, this new artery has meant incomparable changes, but even where the interior of the country had facilities providing service previously, the signal given out by transmitters (video and audio) was inadequate, if not useless.

At the present time, the new chain makes it possible to obtain the same high degree of fidelity and clarity from one corner of the country to the other on both national channels and at the same time, the same facilities for two more programs in the opposite direction.

In order to take television to the Isle of Youth, a shunt was devised permitting the same high degree of quality on both channels.

Expansion of Television Service

The plan set up and completed during this 5-year period meant helping nearly half of all users in the country, enabling them to enjoy clear images and avoid the frequent and bothersome interruptions previously experienced.

With the installation of the new National Microwave System, the plan was also successful from the standpoint of quality and the addition of new areas covered.

While in 1975, between 85 and 90 percent of the country's population lived in areas where television service was received and for which purpose the system had 29 transmitters, in order to arrive at some 95 percent, it was necessary to increase the number to 55. In other words, the number of transmitters was nearly doubled because at this point, the areas not yet served are those with a low population density or small, isolated zones. But even in such zones, it was possible to extend the service except in certain instances.

The total number of transmitters purchased during the 5-year period was 33, of which 5 were used to replace an equal number that had been used for over 25 years. They were of American technology and for years, no spare parts had been available. The parts and components of these five were reserved to replace another 8 of the same technology still in use.

Other transmitters were used to complete both channels on the Isle of Youth, Guantanamo and Baracoa; at the Havana Libre Hotel, to improve reception in important areas of Plaza de la Revolucion; in Sandino, Cajalbana, Salon, Guines (only Channel 6), Cienfuegos, Trinidad, Sancti Spiritus, Nuevitas, Las Tunas, Bartolome Maso, Pilon, Chivirico and Yaguajay, the latter in the completion phase. At all these sites, it was necessary to build the buildings and antenna towers required.

Areas which in 1975 had absolutely no television service or which were inadequately served included Guane, Sandino, La Fe, Las Martinas, La Bajada, Mantua, Santa Lucia, La Esperanza, La Palma, La Coloma and Bahia Honda, in Pinar del Rio; Guines (only Channel 6); Sancti Spiritus; Cienfuegos, Nuevitas, Tunas, Jobabo, Calixto, Manati and Puerto Padre, Las Tunas, Niquero, Media Luna, Campechuela, Yara, Bartolome Maso, Pilon and part of Manzanillo, in Granma; and Chivirico, Ocujal del Turquino and La Plata, in Santiago de Cuba. They now have both channels with optimum urban quality.

Another important task completed in this 5-year period, one which constitutes a success for our communications systems and workers in the sector, was that of providing all Channel 6 facilities with the proper equipment for transmission in colors. The channel now has such facilities from one end of the country to the other.

ENTERPRISE AUTONOMY, PLANNED ECONOMY DISCUSSED

Havana JUVENTUD REBELDE in Spanish 12, 13, 14, 15 Aug 80

[Article by Felino Quesada, director of training of the SDPE [Economic Management and Planning System], JUCEPLAN [Central Planning Board], taken from CUESTIONES DE LA ECONOMIA PLANIFICADA]

[Text] The economic management and planning system (SDPE) is now entering its fourth year and it may be said that the principal mechanisms involved are now practically established. This year, 96 percent of all enterprises are operating using economic planning.

In years past, it has been necessary to carry out tasks which without any doubt demanded great efforts in order to achieve the level of success we have had in setting up the system, considering difficulties caused by the lack of trained technical personnel to handle such tasks, if we say quite rightly that it is still very early to harvest the fruits of the establishment of the system and if we objectively observe that this system is being set up with a historical background of economic management methods that are totally different from those now followed and summed up in the Central Report to the congress of our party, which states:

Our economic management has not been as efficient as it might have been. Economic management methods that have been applied were not the best possible ones. On the whole, administrative cadres do not have the necessary economic awareness, the necessary concern over matters having to do with costs and generally speaking, production efficiency.[1]

Despite these facts, we can now observe certain positive advances made by our cadres. In some enterprises, there is more concern over costs and economic management because they are not assigned resources they have not requested, resources that would fill their warehouses with inventories which would later fatten the list of idle products. Nevertheless, these results are still inadequate.

As stated in the resolution of the Eighth Plenary Session of the Central Committee:

These results are less satisfactory when examined from the standpoint of quality due to the problems that necessarily arise with any far-reaching change and in this accelerated case, in economic management given the existence of different levels of technical development, both material as well as human, in economic entities, as well as different degrees of our cadres' ability to assimilate, all of which requires a sustained effort in order to eliminate fundamental deficiencies revealed. /In this sense, it is of enormous importance for workers and economic management cadres to understand with ever greater clarity the fact that the mechanisms of the system are the ideal instruments for the correct management of the economy and that the application of their fundamental principles is unavoidable in the building of socialism./[2, 3]

This article deals with one of these inescapable principles in the practical application of economic planning, even though there are different opinions on the matter.

One of the basic principles of economic planning is that enterprises must /cover expenditures from their income/ and at the same time, /obtain a margin of profit./

At the present time, compliance with this principle is affected by existing prices, which in many cases are not representative of the average cost of work expended in a branch of the economy to produce an article. Such important types of production such as those of the sugar industry are not profitable under the current circumstances. Work is now underway on a price reform to resolve the basic questions that now arise in measuring the efficiency of our economy and consequently, in complying with this principle of economic planning.

Nevertheless, this does not mean that the limitations imposed on us by prices determine the impossibility of measuring efficiency. If this is so, why, if there are two enterprises that produce the same articles, can one have a higher cost per weight of production than the other? Both may be impossible to finance, but if, with the same production and prices, it is harder to meet the cost of one than the other, it is obvious that one is more inefficient than the other.

Let us take as an example the case of two enterprises with a similar production capacity, modern technology, producing the same product. Neither is costworthy. The cost per weight of production of one of them is 1.45 and that of the other is 1.36, according to actual 1978 figures. This example is given because it presents no differences of a technological character and the problem can be confined to management of the enterprise.

Many of our enterprise directors do not carry these analyses further, for they do not measure the results of their enterprises based on economic indicators, but only by compliance with the production plan, emphasizing the technical efficiency of the enterprise to such a point that they "see" matters relating to costs, productivity, profit, and so on, as being the province of the deputy economic director or that of the area he heads, not /the main activity of the enterprise, its raison d'etre /.

It is equally true that even the higher levels of the enterprises share the responsibility in this sense because they require more for production than for compliance with the plan as a whole. Our press even reflects completion of the plan based on compliance with a single category: production, rather than viewing the plan as a set of harmoniously integrated categories.

[Text] Production is the basis of our very life, our economy, and higher organizations should ensure compliance with the production plan. However, it is not enough to require such compliance; rather, it is also necessary to oversee efficiency.

Maximum economic efficiency makes it possible for the same resources to be converted into more products, and such efficiency is measured by indicators such as productivity, costs, profits, profitability, and so on.

Another obvious reflection of this phenomenon at present is that in order to propose to reach higher levels of production or services, we always think of asking for more resources. Rarely is there concern for achieving greater efficiency, saving on raw materials, fuel, and so on, analyzing the question from a different angle, for it is not a matter of achieving more objectives on the basis of more resources. Rather, we must go further in the different variants in order to decide how to achieve more objectives, to what extent the needs of our economy and of our people can be met, based on the availability of a given amount of resources.

A typical case is the slow development we now have in the production of consumer goods from scraps or waste from production by national enterprises. There is not sufficient appreciation of the importance of these productions in raising the consumption of our people and in improving figures on the enterprise's economic efficiency, for inasmuch as the waste or scrap was already considered in the cost of the main production, only additional costs in wages would be needed to produce items signifying additional income for the enterprise. In other words, greater production can be achieved with the same resources and consequently, efficiency is also better.

Improving enterprise efficiency means analyzing one of the problems having the greatest influence on our management and on the establishment of the SDPE: the enterprise's autonomy.

At the present time, most of the higher organizations of the enterprises exercise excessive control over the enterprises, control going beyond the current needs of the present phase of establishment of the SDPE and even violating legal provisions.

Article 3 of Decree 42, which establishes regulations for national enterprises, stipulates that:

The enterprise carries out its activities based on a plan and on the basis of economic planning. In general, it is to cover expenditures by income, while guaranteeing a margin of profit.

The enterprise enjoys economic, operational and functional autonomy under the orientation and direct administrative supervision of an organization of the Central Government Administration or a local organ of the People's Government.[1]

In defining the basic features of the socialist enterprise, the resolution of the congress which approved the economic management and planning system states the following: "...Relative independence that makes it possible to be differentiated from the remaining nuclei of the economy and that is that concretely expressed in a specific economic-operational autonomy in management."[2]

Consequently, it is worthwhile to stop to analyze what is meant by autonomy of enterprises, why it is necessary in the economy in order to achieve efficient management and what happens when this principle of the economic management and planning system is violated.

Enterprise autonomy does not mean that the enterprise acts in its own behalf and independently of socialist interests. It exists within the framework of the plan approved for the enterprise by the higher organizations, which it is obliged to carry out.

Its independence is manifested in the sphere of economic management, in the sphere of the administration of resources made available to it by the government and within the framework of the plan, for the purpose of achieving greater production objectives with a minimum of resources.

Recognizing this economic-operational independence of the enterprise, along with the planned and centralized direction exercised over the enterprise by the government, is the concrete manifestation of democratic centralism in economic activity, which creates great possibilities for the demonstration of initiative and interest of workers collectives in the most rational and overall utilization of resources for the purpose of expanding and improving production.

Economic planning represents a system of relations between society, its productive links and every individual producer -- that is, between the state, the workers collectives and every individual worker. This system of relations tries to coordinate the different interests existing in socialist society. The overall social interest of everyone, expressed by the socialist state, representing the entire working class, should coincide with the individual material interest of every worker. Once this agreement of interests is achieved, everything that is in the general social interest benefits and satisfies the individual material interest, and everything that stimulates the individual material interest benefits and satisfies the social interest.

Agreement of interests is achieved within the framework of the socialist enterprise, where one has a manifestation of the individual material inter- of every worker as the collective interest and where the is a convergence of the general social interest, expressed in the obligations which the state outlines for the collective through the indicators in the National Economic Plan.

This makes it possible to have a differentiation between the function of planning and that of the administration of resources. The main participant in planning is the state, as the representative of society as a whole, while the main protagonist in administration is the enterprise, as the representative of the particular interests of the workers collective that belong to it.

These are the reasons determining why the enterprise requires economic autonomy in the administration of resources made available to it in the form and ways it will use them to carry out the plan entrusted to it efficiently.

Otherwise, democratic centralism, the basic principle of the management of the socialist economy, with bureaucratic centralism, confusing the work of guidance and orientation with that of administration and management.

When, from a ministry, decisions are made that are the faculties and province of the enterprise and when those decisions are imposed on the enterprise, not only are the principles of the system and existing legislation being violated, inasmuch as no matter how reasonable and well-thought-out an administrative decision made by a ministry may be, it can never take the place of the collective brain of the enterprise workers in search of the best solution for successful completion of the plan. In addition, economic efficiency is also damaged.

[Text] Questions like these are frequently heard at meetings with enterprise officials:

When are we going to have actual enterprises? When will we have autonomy in the enterprises? When will we be able to make decisions in our enterprise? Enterprise officials could repeat many such questions concerning these problems.

The questions deserve thought and analysis by all those involved in the management of our economy, but especially by the very officials of the enterprises.

It is not enough for enterprise autonomy to be legally established. It must be demanded and complied with.

Who is in a better position to insist on these rights, to demand compliance with what has been stipulated, than enterprise officials?

Let us provide a real example with complete objectivity. The National Bank of Cuba recently drafted a report published under the title "Problems in Establishing the Economic Management and Planning System Detected Through Bank Credit." The report is a case of an obvious expression of a violation of enterprise autonomy and the failure on the part of enterprise officials to insist on their own rights.

The provincial delegation of the ministry over the enterprise of which we are speaking did not have sufficient budgetary resources to pay wages of the delegation for the first half of June and therefore took out cash in the enterprise's name. The amount of the withdrawal was 80,000 pesos. The enterprise is subject to economic planning and at the time of the operation, had loans due amounting to 847,200 pesos.

Could the delegation have committed this violation if enterprise officials had opposed it? Obviously not, because enterprise officials had every right to deny such an order and furthermore, had the duty to deny it, inasmuch as the withdrawal not only constituted a violation of economic-financial discipline, but in addition, harmed its own interests because the action increased its debt by entailing more credits plus the payment of bank interests. In other words, its economic management was affected.

Other cases involving violations of enterprise officials and failure of officials to insist on rights have been seen at plenary meetings for inspection of the economic management and planning system, when enterprise officials have stated that they did not declare idle resources or did not sign economic contracts because their higher organization had ordered them not to do so.

None of these orders has any legal validity because they violate what has been stipulated by organizations higher up in the hierarchy, but in addition, they run counter to the interests of the enterprises and society. If the enterprise does not declare idle inventory, if such inventory is not placed on sale, if such inventory is not placed on the market, it will have to be financed by credit. It will have to pay interests, which hurts its contribution to the budget and in the future, the material incentives supplied to workers. What is even worse, large amounts of resources remain static when their immobility harms the interests of society out of respect for an order and direction violating its rights.

If the enterprise does not sign contracts for the sale of production, it may produce products that no one needs, accumulate inventories of finished products for which there is no market, making it necessary to resort to borrowing, for if production is not marketed, the enterprise's own financial resources will be exhausted and loaned resources will have to be used. If contracts are not signed with suppliers, it will not have a guaranteed supply or any right to file claims when such supplies are not received.

Let us look at another example of how enterprise autonomy is violated and how officials come to be guilty of a lack of discipline, with the resultant failure on the part of enterprise officials to demand respect for their own rights.

At the national meeting for inspection of the economic management and planning system, it was reported that 65.9 percent of all budgeted enterprises and units in our country provide systematic information not envisioned in the National Statistical Information System (SIEN) or in the Complementary Statistical Information System (SIEC).

The State Statistics Committee recently made an audit of 403 budgeted enterprises and units for the purpose of make a further analysis of this aspect in order to describe the existing situation and back the adoption of measures for its elimination. The audit obtained very interesting data.

The average number of unofficial forms issued by every budgeted enterprise or unit is 22. These forms that are not officially approved represent 136.8 percent of forms approved by the SIEC, while only 75.9 percent of the forms approved by the SIEC are used.

[Text] We have pointed out only a few details to illustrate this situation but one might also ask: What is the real use of so much demand for information which has a social cost in wages and material expenditures? What is worse, given the small technical work force available, can an enterprise overwhelmed by such a volume of information really go deeply into an analysis of its management?

Our opinion is that it is materially impossible to do so and yet, these analyses are of great usefulness and importance to the enterprise's economy so that it may detect its mistakes and errors and adopt measures to improve economic management.

Comrade Humberto Perez, vice president of the Council of Ministers, referred to these violations in his address before the closing session of the national plenary meeting for inspection of the economic management and planning system: "Naturally, many cases are violations committed by (the enterprises) (NB) [sic] because of orders from the higher organization or next immediate political organization."[1]

Agreeing with this accurate appraisal, we believe that there is also a failure on the part of enterprise officials to insist on their own rights.

The enterprise is completely justified in not providing statistical information not contained in any of the official systems. Consequently, no one can require that the information be offered because not to give it is in compliance with established discipline. At any rate, anyone requesting or demanding such information is the person in violation of economic-financial discipline.

This right of the enterprise is established in Article 45 of the General Regulations governing state enterprises, which states: "The enterprise guarantees the presentation of forms established by the National Statistical Information System and the Complementary Statistical Information System for supervision of execution of its technical-economic plan, as well as established financial reports, and guarantees the authenticity and veracity of information based on existing methods and in compliance with established deadlines."[2]

This means that the enterprise is required to guarantee this and only this information to those referred to in the article in question.

In order to be fair in our appraisals, we must not fail to say that the lack of autonomy is often manifested from the very time when the plan is executed because it includes indicators and directions damaging to enterprise autonomy. Such indicators should be autonomous in nature since this is part of the enterprise's management in complying with its obligations to the state. When these indicators are "lowered" upon orders, enterprise efficiency is being predetermined. What should be decided further down is being decided higher up and what is worse, the enterprise cannot answer for these inefficient results because it did not make the decision.

In general, this statement is valid in speaking of enterprise autonomy in order to require that the enterprise comply with its obligations. In order to require that it fulfill them efficiently, the independence that planning demands must be provided. Enterprises must be given the powers conferred on them in our legislation.

In order to require that a duty be done, one must recognize the rights and powers provided in order to do so. Enterprise autonomy is its right; efficient compliance with the plan is its duty.

Let us require compliance with the duty and grant the right, providing a guarantee that every individual, every level involved in the chain of economic management may satisfactorily meet his or its obligations.

Economic planning requires and demands that the enterprise have autonomy and independence in order to carry out its management. As long as enterprises do not have such autonomy, we cannot guarantee that economic planning will be established and operate in the economic life of our country.

HAVANA WAREHOUSES ABOUT TO OVERFLOW WITH MERCHANDISE

Havana BOHEMIA in Spanish 22 Aug 80 pp 46-49

[Article by Gregorio Hernandez]

[Text] The possibility that the port of Havana may be inundated with merchandise overflowing from transit warehouses, with the consequent adverse effect on the rate at which ships arriving at the port are unloaded, and the results that could come about in terms of demurrages and payments in foreign reserves, has caused great concern. This concern has been translated into effective measures to reverse the situation.

What is the cause of this no longer potential danger? It is the fact that the unloading of the ships in the capital port must be done simultaneously with the removal of merchandise from the warehouses. The most obvious sign of this problem is the inventories on hand, which amount to more than 165,000 tons (the permissible amount is 80,000 tons). Thus, the port now holds more than twice the amount of goods permitted by its capacity for storage. As we write these words, 23 ships are unloading in port while 13 are anchored in the bay, which makes a total of 36 in the Havana bay. One thing is certain: in its technical-economic plan for this time of the year, the port has overshot its target by more than 100,000 tons, because more ships have arrived in port than was predicted for the first 7 months of the year.

During the months of June and July the average tonnage unloaded has ascended to 381,000 tons per month, which yields a daily average of 14,600 tons.

We might add that the port has the personnel, facilities and equipment to be able to work 24 hours a day. So what is hindering the removal of goods from the warehouses? To date everything indicates that the organizations and enterprises scheduled to receive the cargo coming from abroad have not fully joined in the effort being made by the other sectors that make up the well-known chain of port-transportation-economy in this country. However, we should point out that there have been very favorable responses to the Party's appeal in Havana, particularly on the part of those receiving the most goods from abroad.

Another factor in the saturation of merchandise is the new investment in the domestic economy that has not yet been executed, but that has led to the shipment of raw materials for the implementation of projects. These materials are stored in the port for a long time because the organizations in question have no place to store them. These--and others, of course--are the main problems affecting the effort to clean up port warehouses.

So how do we carry out this proposal?

The party leadership in the province of Havana City, along with all the other links in the chain, has drawn up a plan that is already underway. By October of this year, there should be no more than 80,000 tons of merchandise in the port's warehouses; and a little later, by December, to salute the Party's Second Congress, there should be a stable amount of not more than 60,000 tons.

In accordance with this goal, every week there are check-up meetings to determine what progress has been made in the removal of goods and the unloading of ships. If existing solutions have not been sufficient, changes are made, and commitments are made for the following week.

This reporter, for the purpose of providing a wide-ranging and objective report on the progress of the plan for decongesting the warehouses and port areas, interviewed various leaders of the sectors that make up the port-transportation-domestic economy chain, as well as truckdrivers, warehouse supervisors, etc., in order to find out how this plan is put into practice.

What the Port Says

Guillermo Aguiar, assistant director of the port, tells us about the task of removing goods from the area: "It is obvious," he tells us, "that the largest receivers of goods have responded favorably to the Party's plea, although some have still not done so, especially when it is a question of receiving goods at their warehouses during the afternoon shift.

"One factor which also plays a role is the lack of adequate trucks to haul the goods. The result is that rotation does not take place at the rate desired. Until now the rotation of the means of transportation is 1.5 trips per day, and the goal is to achieve 2.5 trips. This will enable us to meet the targets proposed for October and December.

"The problem that has not yet been solved is that the warehouses should receive goods during the afternoon shift, which would boost productivity in the port, because more than 65 percent of the cargo comes out during the morning shift.

"We would like to stress," he added, "that with the means available to the port of Havana we have achieved a high level of productivity in the unloading of ships, and satisfactory efficiency in general.

"We can also add that the Port Expediting Enterprise (EXPEDIPORT) is wisely coordinating its efforts with the domestic economy. For that purpose there are daily meetings with all the people who have to do with the removal of merchandise to discuss the problems and the immediate measures to be taken to overcome them. Experience has shown that these meetings should be held in each of the port units, with the attendance of all parties involved in this aspect of the economy.

"In addition, every day the port authorities meet with directors of enterprises that are involved in the port-transportation-domestic economy chain. We stress that the linking of transportation by port zones has allowed us to achieve a rotation of 1.8 trips, instead of the old average of 1.5.

"Getting back to the warehouses, we would like to point out that when they receive merchandise only in the morning, the objective of rotating trucks cannot be attained, much less the reduction of inventories in the port's transit warehouses. This has a serious impact on the unloading of ships, with all the adverse consequences.

"The port is also coming to grips with the problem of the direct unloading of chemicals. Their documentation must be on time and correct in order for them to be removed properly; delays in this documentation lead to losses of foreign reserves for the nation.

"If existing levels of organization are maintained at the port, and the rate of removal is increased in the domestic economy, high rates of ship unloading can also be maintained, thereby avoiding long waits in port and the consequent loss of foreign reserves due to demurrage.

"We would like to point out," he concluded, "that the port has productive reserves that can increase the rate of unloading, based on adequate coordination and organization with the external elements; the best example of this can be seen in the unloading that took place in June and July, which amounted to more than 100,000 tons of goods."

EXPEDIPORT Talks

This time we talked to Gabriel Roqueta, assistant director of the Port Expediting Enterprise, whose responsibility is the coordination of the departure of all merchandise from the perimeter of the port of Havana.

"In the case of EXPEDIPORT," he indicated, "we have made considerable improvements in the coordination of the different elements, that is, domestic economy, port and transportation. An example of this is that during the month of July 51,350 tons more than in June were removed from warehouses, for a total of 318,071. In comparison with July 1979, 152,858 more tons were handled. Here is where EXPEDIPORT comes in: it must establish the coordination with the different elements of the chain.

"Another fundamental issue is the fact that the domestic economy is unloading goods in its warehouses much faster than before, which has enabled us to achieve a 1.5 rotation figure for trucks carrying local cargo. Another factor in these achievements has been distribution, the OPE-2 (documents that the domestic agencies must submit to authorize the removal of merchandise stored at the port)."

Transportation Effort

We talked with Rafael Baro, director of the Havana Trucking Enterprise, who informed us that "the enterprise has committed itself to removing 8,000 tons of general cargo per day from the port of Havana, 1,600 tons of raw materials for fertilizers, 2,000 tons of grain and 50 tons of mineral coal for the city of Havana, as well as 800 tons for the province of Havana. This makes a total of 12,450 tons a day.

"The current plan is for 10,900 tons, to be raised later to 12,450, an increase of 1,550 tons.

"The first thing we are doing to reach this goal is improving the technical capacity of the equipment, both tractors and trailers and semitrailers. In addition, we have created a new organization in traffic operations in order to attain better utilization of the static capacity of the trucks, and better use of the resources devoted to those ends.

"In order to carry out this plan, we need a rotation of 2.5 per trip per truck, to raise the figure from the current 1.4 and 1.5 per daily trip per truck. If we achieve this, the trucks will have greater productivity, and will enable the enterprise to reduce the time when the truck is occupied in loading and unloading. The result will be reduced waiting time.

"We would also like to say that receiving has improved a great deal in the warehouses of the domestic economy, but a greater effort is required; they must open their doors even at night from Monday through Sunday.

"Parallel to the work of the Havana trucks lies the need to make a greater effort in unloading railroad cars, which are an important link in the chain."

Opinions of Truckdrivers and Warehousemen

Conrado Garcia, a driver at the Jose Maria Perez unit base of the Havana Trucking Enterprise, says, "Here I am waiting to unload 24 tons of steel bars at Warehouse 11 of the Central Metal Enterprise in Wajay, which is under the jurisdiction of the State Committee for Technical and Material Supply. Sometimes our problem is that the Central Metal Enterprise trucks have to load first to make their distributions, and since there are no more people or equipment, we have to wait for them to finish before we can be unloaded. Another factor is that my enterprise sends a lot of vehicles to unload in the same place, which causes too many delays. I remember one time when there were 18 trucks ahead of me to be unloaded. Now my rotation is one or two trips at the most. That also depends on the time spent loading in the port, and finally unloading at the warehouses."

Mauricio Castro, manager of Warehouse 2 of the Central Metal Enterprise (ECEME) in Wajay: "It has been proven that the problem of rotation lies in the lack of a normal cycle for the entry of equipment. Secondly, there is inadequate planning by the ports other than Havana, such as Mariel, Cardenas, Matanzas, Nuevitas and Santiago de Cuba. That means that any of these ports will send us indiscriminately a given amount of cargo that runs counter to the planning in the port of Havana.

"This warehouse has two work shifts, and for example, yesterday 13 August 17 trucks were unloaded, and 21 were loaded. Our capacity depends on the flow of equipment."

Lucas Calderon, drayman for Havana Trucking: "Here at Antillana de Acero it's first come first served. Sometimes we have trouble with the cranes, because it goes faster when the two unloading cranes work at once, so we have to make more trips. Sometimes we do up to three runs a day, especially when there are night shifts at the Havana port."

Ernesto Diaz, chief of the Empresa Antillana de Acero warehouse, in El Cotorro: "We give priority to the transportation from the port. If there are problems, the ones suffering the most delay are the trucks carrying nationally produced scrap iron. We have problems with the cranes, but we are always trying to overcome them. Here we unload a daily average of 1,000 tons of scrap iron, cast iron and other raw materials for the iron and steel industry. We are aware that the imported raw materials must be given special treatment."

Ricardo Prieto, driver of Unit 3 of Havana Trucking: "We are unloading at Unit 208, a food warehouse belonging to the Food Products Enterprise of the Ministry of Domestic Trade. If the truck is not unloaded rapidly, its rotation is affected. For example, we arrived today, 14 August at 0900 hours; now it is 1500 hours and we are still here. Sure, you have to understand that they have their problems too."

Paulo Perez, driver of Unit 3 of Havana Trucking: "I am hauling 25 tons of soap which I loaded at the railroad yard. From there they sent me to Unit 203 of the Ministry of Domestic Trade (MINCIN), where they informed me that the cargo was not for that warehouse. It was really for Unit 208, and there they told me there was no way I could unload today, 14 August."

Aracelio Torres, driver at the Guines Base of Havana Trucking: "Since yesterday, 13 August I have been at Unit 208 of the MINCIN Wholesale Food Enterprise. I am hauling 14 tons of bell pepper puree. Today, at 1500 hours on 14 August, they have only unloaded palletized trucks. At Unit 205 as well, Guines vehicles (three of them) took 3 days to unload. I am in about second place in the port in terms of removal of goods, but I have not been able to do that because I have been waiting here at this warehouse since 0530 this morning, 14 August. If they had unloaded us, we would be en route to Guines with 14 tons of merchandise from the port of Havana."

Final Note

At press time here at BOHEMIA, inventories in the Havana warehouses have been reduced to 131,594 tons, which shows the results that can be obtained from coordinating with the different links in the port-transportation-domestic economy chain, under the guidance of the provincial leadership of the Party in the city of Havana.

Salute to Second Party Congress

The Havana City Party, in conjunction with all the elements of the chain, has drawn up a plan for removal of goods that has already been put into practice. By October there should be no more than 80,000 tons of merchandise stored at the port of Havana. By December, when the Second Party Congress is to be held, the important event will be commemorated by maintaining an inventory of no more than 60,000 tons.

TRUCK TRANSPORT AFFECTED BY LACK OF SPARE PARTS

Havana BOHEMIA in Spanish 22 Aug 80 pp 16-18, 21-23

[Article by Gregorio Hernandez]

[Text] This report will deal with an aspect of motor transportation that is essential to the nation's economic pace. We are referring to trucking, a commercial activity which covers the entire country.

The Trucking Enterprise was founded in August 1960, and brought together a considerable number of vehicles of all kinds to be used for those purposes. The vehicles had come from various firms that had been intervened in or nationalized. This enterprise fell under the jurisdiction of the Ministry of Transportation.

There are four integral bases in this enterprise: Western, Central, Eastern and National. They are termed integral because each has its own administrative or managerial structure, plus the necessary garages and operations to solve any transportation support needs.

This enterprise has a payroll of 5,340 workers, 2,719 of whom are drivers, the basic workers.

The Trucking Enterprise's fleet includes a wide range of equipment, including straight trucks, tractor trailers, semitrailers, forklifts and other specialized vehicles. Commercially, they are known as Nissan, Fiat, Pegaso, and Kraz. There are refrigerator trucks, Taino semitrailers and others, for a total of more than 2,500 vehicles.

The Trucking Enterprise transports raw materials, processed goods, machinery, heavy equipment, prefabricated structures, spare parts, refrigerated meat, retail goods, . . .

Goods are transported from the door of the sending warehouse to the door of the receiving warehouse. The most frequent customers of this service are the State Committee for Technical and Material Supply, the Ministries of Construction, Foreign Commerce, Basic Industry, Food, and the Port Expediting Enterprise (EXPEDIPORT). These organizations account for about 85 percent of the total volume transported by the enterprise.

Considering the economic importance of this activity, we would like to stress its vital role in the uninterrupted development of the production and reproduction process of the national economy. It is responsible for moving raw materials, building materials, means of production and consumer goods to the places where they are needed.

The traffic produced by this sector represents 64.5 percent of motor transportation by the public services of the Ministry of Transportation.

The enterprise now has 36 million pesos in basic units, of which 83.7 percent are transportation units and equipment.

In 1979 there was a 5 percent increase in the cost per peso of production with relation to the two preceding years. That is, in 1977 and 1978 that cost was 0.91, and in 1979 it was 0.96.

The rise in the cost per peso of production is the result of a series of internal and external factors that will be studied in this report.

The Trucking Enterprise has always been considered by economic planners to be an experimental undertaking, falling within the application of the principles, records and bases of the Economic Management and Planning System (SDPE).

A recent study of the degree to which the system has been implemented showed some shortcomings, including the high amortization rate that accounts for about 4.5 million pesos of the enterprise's operational costs.

The Trucking Enterprise was selected in 1979 for the formation of economic stimulation funds; the funds were not formed because the necessary indicators for mercantile production (in this case, covering transported cargo and traffic produced) were not met.

In all fairness, we must point out that while 1980 got off to a bad start, by April one of the required indicators had been met: transported cargo; the rest is expected to be completed between the second and third quarters.

While on the subject of economic information, we would like to mention the existence of a vigorous vanguard movement of truckdrivers, which is based on the participation of all workers in socialist emulation.

Translated into concrete terms, this means 1,448 voluntary runs valued at 349,963 pesos, and a production of 10.9 million kilometer tons in 1979.

Given this overview of the fundamental characteristics of the enterprise and its management, we are going to explore some of the deficiencies that plague it.

One example is deficient national organization, resulting in an inadequate control of the moving fleet.

Backlogs in the trucks' departure schedule are another problem which leads to delays in the rotation of vehicles.

There are also delays in unloading, which in turn cause vehicles to arrive late at the final warehouse, with a consequent increase in the number of days required for rotation.

There has been some evidence of a lack of discipline among the platform personnel, which leads to longer vehicle rotation cycles. Another factor in this phenomenon is the lack of supervision.

There is also insufficient attention to truckdrivers in the interior of the country, because of the lack of lodgings and, in some cases, inadequate facilities in the lodgings that do exist.

Moreover, there are problems with the engagement of these services with the hotel enterprises.

The vehicles have a low rate of availability due to the lack of spare parts for components and the inefficient use of manpower in the garages.

Another factor hindering efficiency of service is the high rate of breakdowns on the road, and the unavailability of towtrucks equipped to deal with these cases. Of course there is also the fact that the vehicles are not ready for loading at the assigned time, which is the responsibility of the users.

Now that we have mentioned the internal factors, we will go on to discuss the main external causes of problems in the Trucking Enterprise.

First of all there is the delay in the time involved in loading and unloading. In 1979 this factor resulted in heavy losses in the handling of tonnage; there was an increase of 3 hours in the waiting time for loading over the standard travel time. The blame obviously lies with the organizations that use the service; they should take steps to eradicate this problem.

Another external deficiency concerns the filling out of the order for loading and unloading. The driver presents that document at the place where loading and unloading take place, and the person in charge of that area is supposed to note the time when the vehicle arrived, the waiting time, the time required for loading or unloading, and finally the date and time at which the vehicle leaves the place.

But there are warehouse officials who not only do not write down the appropriate times on that document, but sign blank documents, placing the company's seal on the papers and returning them to the drivers. Obviously, this fraudulent behavior is harmful to the country's economy.

With regard to supply problems, the State Committee for Technical and Material Supply has fulfilled only 68 percent of the plan covering the first quarter of 1980 for the Trucking Enterprise. In 1979 only 45 percent of the allotted spare parts were received.

Another serious problem of an external nature is insufficient supplies of parts for components. As a result of this shortage, 1,797 components are awaiting repair at this time.

During the course of our visits to different bases we learned that of 284 items that are essential for the repair of oil pumps, starter motors, alternators, fuel injection pumps, hydraulic pumps, pressure plates, water pumps, etc., only 44 have been received. This is only about 15 percent of the number of items needed.

A common example of this situation is the following: When a vehicle in one of the provinces suffers damage to a component such as an alternator, the driver has to come to Havana to look for the part, taking up 1 or 2 days of the run, because the towtruck which aids the vehicle on the road does not have the supplies to repair it. To this we must add the waiting time for the repair, plus the time of the return trip. The result is that the vehicle broken down in the provinces must wait several days for an alternator. It has been estimated that the lack of parts has meant the unavailability of about 20 percent of the installed capacity of the transportation sector.

Incidentally, we feel that the opinions of the workers in the field, those who are directly involved in production or the rendering of services in the Trucking Enterprise, are very valuable. For this reason we interviewed a group of them, representing the basic trades involved in this activity. Here is what they have to say:

Casimiro Rodriguez, Western Base driver: "We have a lot of problems on the road. We get to the garages and there is no fuel. Sometimes they give us 5 or 10 gallons of fuel to get from one province to the next, which sometimes interferes with the proper operation of the equipment on the road. In addition, there is the fear that the thing will break down for lack of lubricant or fuel. If the vehicle breaks down, the driver has to find someone to lend him a bit of fuel, and go on that way until the end of the run. The domestic economy results in a lot of delays in loading and unloading. Pinar del Rio is where the unloading is fastest."

Felix Perez, Western Base driver: "Here at the base one of the problems is getting tarpaulins and rope. Sometimes the trucks have to delay their departure because they have to wait for other trucks to come in so they can borrow their tarps and ropes. Along the route we have problems with tires because they can only be repaired in Havana, even if the truck is clear out in Oriente or Pinar del Rio, for example. This means that sometimes a vehicle waiting for a tire has to stay put for up to 2 or 3 days. We also have trouble with the lights; if one goes out on the road, there is no place in the interior where it can be replaced."

Esteban Fernandez, Western Base mechanic: "In 1979 we had a lot of problems in the garage because of the lack of spare parts; there was also a shortage of mechanic's tools, and insufficient organization of the work areas in the garages. Later the appropriate authorities set to the task of solving the problems we have in the garage, and they achieved positive results. The implementation of payment according to yield and the arrival this year of various spare parts for major and minor components (mainly engine parts) really helped in this area. The problem we have is not being able to get gear boxes."

Lazaro Brieva, chief of the machine shop of the Western Base: "This shop has five lathes, one milling machine, one planing machine, and one crankshaft grinder. Here we produce about 40,000 parts a year, all for Nissan equipment. Our main production right now is concentrated on transmission parts, because ever since the complete plan was received in 1976 we haven't been able to get them. The transmission parts that are manufactured and repaired in the machine shop have been turned out with an extraordinary effort, because they are extremely complex and all require special machinery for their manufacture, machinery which we do not have.

"Through innovations and initiative among the shop workers, we have managed to maintain an active fleet of 327 trucks at the base.

"In addition, we need to modernize the shop with adequate machinery in order to get what we need. We must have machines such as universal gear tooth cutters, vertical cutters, universal boring machines, induction heat treatment machines. . .

"We can add that the plan is being fulfilled in terms of volume and quantity, but not in quality. The transmissions that are repaired with the parts produced at the shop only last half as long as they should, which is 96,000 kilometers."

Andres Gonzalez, Central Base driver: "At the Expeditrans agencies, when we arrive in the afternoon we have to stay over until the next day because they are closed. For example, the one in Guaimaro is closed on Saturdays at 1100 hours and does not open until Monday. This is an express rig that works 24 hours a day, and with this situation it is out of commission much of the time. The same thing happens in Placetas, Cabaiguan, Florida. . . Also, this waiting time affects the linkage system."

Miguel Perez, Central Base driver: "The problem of delays in loading and unloading is the fault of the different enterprises, which do not have personnel for this task. This affects transportation by lengthening the rotation cycle."

Fausto Carbonell, Central Base driver: "What I am most concerned about are the fuel problems, because on the highway we are severely limited by the unavailability of fuel. The cargoes we carry are delayed a long time at the Expeditrans centers. At the end of the week, on Saturday, we have to stay put until Monday."

Placido Garcia, Central Base lathe operator: "As problems arise, we come to grips with them and solve them. We have some shortages of raw materials, such as different sized dowel pins and different qualities of metal. We also have a production plan that involves maintaining all the equipment owned by the base, which is fulfilled within the limits of our capabilities."

Isidro Segura, Central Base mechanic: "Our main difficulties are the work tools and equipment that are lacking. There is also a parts problem, and we have some equipment out of commission for that reason. The mechanic sees that a piece of equipment is working, and he is concerned because that machinery affects transportation if a truck has to stop for repairs. We cannot say that the linkage program is being tackled as it should be, because working conditions do not keep pace with quotas, partly due to the very problem of spare parts."

All the deficiencies listed and described by this journalist, for the most part, along with the opinions of the workers, were taken to the enterprise and the integral base authorities. Their responses indicate a responsible concern and a desire to solve the problems.

Some of them, which we understand to be the most important, are summed up here in the conclusion of this report:

The enterprise is trying to achieve a viable national-scale organization that will meet the needs of this activity in all regions so as to solve the problems facing the vehicles in the provinces.

Within this organization a towtruck will be stationed permanently in each region, and equipment will be repaired in local shops. The only thing left to do would be establishing a radio communications network that would link the towtrucks; we were informed that this issue is in the process of being solved.

The delays in departure will be eliminated with the implementation of the new schedule and with the organization and disciplinary measures taken against drivers who do not obey the schedule. Delays in unloading will also be taken care of with the establishment of a reception center that will expedite hauling. It will coordinate all the warehouses by phone before a truck is sent to be unloaded. In addition, each base will have a number of drivers on duty to guarantee action at the time necessary in case the driver assigned to the vehicle is absent.

In addition, under Decree Law 32, the enterprise has consulted with the union office and has drawn up a draft disciplinary code for all personnel, including workers on the platforms, in shops, and those in administrative and management services.

The lodging network requires serious investments. However, we have learned that there have been visits and coordination with the provincial enterprises in order to improve the service to the truckdrivers. It is recognized that this task will not be completely accomplished until the National Freeway is finished, a project which envisions the construction of motels for drivers in different places along the route.

The low availability of trucks is the most critical problem facing the Trucking Enterprise. In order to alleviate the situation work is being done in several directions, and one of the projects undertaken is to manufacture and repair parts at a rate of 1,200 units per month, and to repair and maintain batteries at a rate of just under 200 units a month, despite the limitation and low level of technological development in the enterprise.

It is also undeniable that the low utilization of manpower is a problem in the bases and units. We have learned that one of the aspects being studied is the raising of standards at the appropriate levels, and another factor is absolute control over work quality.

Approximately 47,000 hours of work are lost every month because of vehicles that break down on the highway. This is due to several factors: lack of spare parts for repairing the vehicles or their components, deficient work in the shops, etc.

In order to improve this state of affairs, plans are underway to practice quality control in the intermediate phases of repairs.

Having summed up the measures taken and to be taken to eliminate shortcomings in the transportation of cargo, we also wanted to know what the enterprise has in mind for future development.

In the short and medium term, they are:

--Consolidate a structure that responds to the needs and nature of the highway service in order to bring about better control over the operation of vehicles and the administration of platform personnel, as well as the analysis and improvement of the enterprise's management structure in light of the needs of the new economic planning and management system.

--Completion of the social and production projects which are required by the bases and shops to further normal development and reproduction.

--Development and improvement of the means of economic control and analysis in conjunction with the SDPE and the domestic economic calculation.

--Extensive and intensive utilization of the productive capacity of shops in maintainence, repairs and production, implementing and training second work shifts and, when conditions so require, third shifts as well.

--Achievement of an annual growth rate of 10 percent in the volume of production during the 5-year period from 1981 to 1985, in order to meet the demand for transportation of that period.

--Construction of two integral bases to guarantee the material and technical elements necessary for the utilization of the equipment that will come on line during the 5-year period.

--More intensive utilization of manpower, and its redistribution for the purpose of making the systems for linking wages and yield more objective and productive as an intensive method of increasing production and productivity.

--Standardization of the fleets by base.

--Reorganization and rationalization of the enterprise's operations, setting up new departure schedules, control mechanisms and adequate management, and introducing combined traffic and systems for hitching and unhitching.

--Development of manpower training, indispensable for meeting the needs of the enterprise's production plan.

--Supervision and guarantee of compliance with the agreements reached regarding schedules for loading and unloading vehicles.

--Study of the system for control and analysis of operational management for the purpose of eradicating existing deficiencies.

--Implement, through adequate selection of indicators, a system of emulation at the bases and units, involving all workers in the development of the enterprise's tasks, with a view to fulfilling the technical-economic plan and increasing general efficiency.

This is as far as we have gotten in our work, in which we have tried to remain objective.

We promise to return to the field of trucking within a reasonable period of time to observe the progress of the projects and to see to what extent the deficiencies have been overcome, in the interest, naturally, of national needs.

STANDARDIZATION OF SUGAR INDUSTRY EXPLAINED

Havana ATAC in Spanish Jan-Feb 80 pp 32-37

[Article by Magaly Betancourt, head of Directorate of Standardization, Metrology and Quality Control]

[Text] There is no sphere of human activity that is not related to standardization because it affects the interests of persons of all ages and professions, enabling them to work and live.

From the very dawn of mankind, different forms of writing have been preserved but each one is internally standardized by all the nations and persons who use them. At the same time, there is a slow but constant process aimed at the unification and replacement of the different alphabets, which allows persons of different nationalities to seek advice.

Archeologists and scientists in different areas have helped to discover many of the secrets of ancient civilizations, including those having to do with crops.

For many years, scientists were unable to learn anything about the special conditions surrounding the emergence and disappearance of cities in Central America that were abandoned by their inhabitants. In those places, there existed standards for living conditions, the construction of new cities, the cultivation of corn and other plants and for the movement of the population to other sites, where everything would begin all over again following a norm. It is even thought that the standards may have been written down.

Historians commonly point to the construction of the pyramids in ancient Egypt as an example of engineering activity in the field of standardization. The stones used in the construction of the pyramids had regularly determined dimensions; otherwise, it would have been impossible to guarantee the regular geometric form of the pyramids and their long preservation. Consequently, the use of anything other than what had been established was prohibited.

And yet, despite this background, it was not until the beginning of the Industrial Revolution (last half of the 19th century) that standardization became an irreplaceable tool so that modern industry could be organized and development. In other words, it became a technique.

What is standardization?

It is the activity which established and sets up rules for the purpose of organizing a specific activity for the benefit and with the participation of all those involved, in particular in order to contribute to an improvement in the management of the national economy.

Standardization is based on proven results of science and technology and is one of the foundations of current development, meaning that it will have to be maintained at all times, in harmony with progress. Its main objectives are the following:

To improve the quality of production and services and ensure their proper level; to contribute to the growing needs of the population, helping achieve a proper adjustment of those needs and the real possibilities of the economy; to help accelerate technical scientific progress, increase the efficiency of social production and work productivity, including technical and management work; and to help create the conditions required in order to develop the exploitation of products responding to the requirements of the international market.

In our country, the socialization of the resources of production has made it possible to raise standardization to the level of government, which offers possibilities of implementing the most advanced scientific and technical solutions by legal means.

The most important feature of this activity is the active role which it plays in the management of the national economy, which is expressed in the planned activity of organizations, enterprises and organizations in the establishment and setting up of standards and other obligatory documents aimed at accelerating technical progress, increasing the productivity of social work and improving the quality of production and services.

What is a standard?

A standard is a fundamental standardizing technical document resulting from standardization work and approved for a competent activity.

Based on its level of approval and the range of its application, the following categories of standards are established:

Category	Abbrev.
Cuban Standard (State Standard of Cuba)	NC
Branch Standard	NR
Enterprise Standard	NE

Standardization in Cuba

The first attempts at this activity in our country go back to the year 1937 in the Cuban Engineering Company, but it is a fact that with the triumph of the Revolution in 1959, standardization practically did not exist. Standardization began to make its effects felt mainly in those private industries whose organization and technology had been established by foreign interests and a majority of which were subsidiaries of American companies.

Since the triumph of the Revolution, the first work of the NMCC was organized with the Ministry of Industry before being transferred later to the Institute of Standardization, Metrology and Quality Control, which became responsible for the centralized handling of these activities.

By virtue of Law 1323, the State Standardization Committee (CEN) was set up as the organ in charge of directing, executing and supervising the application of state and government policy on standardization, metrology and quality control, and the State Construction Committee (CEC) was given powers over national management of standardization in branches having to do with construction projects, assembly and the building materials industry.

The National System of Standardization, Metrology and Quality Control (SNNMCC) began to be work out based on what had been established in the Programmatic Platform of the Communist Party of Cuba and made up of the specific elements of standardization, metrology and quality control, as well as general elements common to the three activities, such as planning, inspection and the technical and professional training and advancement of cadres.

Application in Sugar Industry

This activity had its predecessor in the Standardization and Metrology Group of the former ONLAC [expansion unknown], although it should be emphasized that the origins of standardization work go back to the time of the Ministry of Industry (1961) when systematic contacts were established with the Directorate of Standards and Metrology which was included in that now defunct organization.

This group devoted its efforts to disseminating the activity systematically and periodically to certain fundamental dependencies of the organization (Directorate of Technology, Maintenance, Product Delivery, Projects and Mechanical Production Enterprise). The tasks performed by these dependencies were all put under the Standardization Plan of the Ministry of the Sugar Industry.

With the establishment of Law 1323 in 1976, which set the general structure of the central state administration, the Directorate of Normalization, Metrology and Quality Control was created. It has a Normalization Department whose responsibility it is to direct, advise and oversee the drafting, revision and establishment of standardizing technical documents (standards or standardizing instructions) in the organization and its enterprises, since because these jobs are specialized, they have to be carried out by technicians most closely related to the activity or product to be standardized.

Key:

1. Cuban standard
2. Approved, published and distributed by the CEN or the CEC
3. Obligatory for organizations and enterprises
4. Branch standard
5. Approved, published and distributed by the head organization of the branch, subbranch or activity corresponding to the product being standardized
6. Obligatory for the organization and its enterprises
7. Enterprise standard
8. Approved, published and distributed by the enterprise
9. Obligatory for the enterprise

Traditionally, the different activities performed in the sugar industry were regulated by means of technical documents, instructions, circulars, and so on, drafted by the specialized dependencies of that organization and given orientation for completion in each one of our enterprises. That is why, starting with the establishment of the Standardization Department, the trend has been to turn these documents into state, branch or enterprise standards and priority has been given to specification standards of the basic products of the industry so as to establish the economic management and planning system. The following objectives have been achieved:

Drafting and establishment of branch specification standards for raw and refined sugar; drafting of branch norms for: Cryptococcus yeast, Saccharomycetes yeast, alcohols A, B, C and D, final syrup, wax from cane froth; drafting of enterprise norms for: dextran, caramel color, Cerv sugar, bagasse, cane froth and final syrup.

At the same time, standardization, either partial or total, has taken place at the enterprise level in certain production processes, and standards now exist in the following areas:

Cane juice, heating, operations; rum, process; composite imbibition, operation; cane juice, evaporation, operations; cane juice, clarification, operations; JMC centrifugal pumps, process; JVA centrifugal pumps, process; strainers with large cylindrical head, process; strainers with small cylindrical head, process.

There has also been participation in the drafting of the following Interbranch Standards Systems:

National System of Standardization, Metrology and Quality Control; Single Project Documentation System; National System of Anticorrosion Protection Standards; Interexchangeability Standards System; Metrology Insurance Standards System.

In November 1977, the Technical Advisory Committee on Standardization was set up and now advises the organization on this activity. It has the participation of 15 fundamental dependencies of the organization.

Prospects?

Establishing within the organization and its enterprises the National System of Standardization, Metrology and Quality Control, as well as International Standards Systems that go into effect; the drafting and establishment of the following State Specifications Standards: raw and refined sugar, bagasse containers and final syrup for export; drafting and carrying out the overall sugar standardization program, which will guarantee the stabilization and subsequent improvement in quality of products (raw and refined sugar).

This can only be obtained as a result of joint efforts and complex measures in the organizational, technical and economic spheres, since it is now necessary to take into account the following:

Standardization of raw materials and other materials; standardization of equipment; standardization of the productive process; standardization of the finished products; drafting and establishment of state standards; buildings to generate low- and medium-pressure steam and temperature, the sugar industry, the treatment of waste, project; the drafting and establishment of equipment and component parts specifications standards in mechanical production enterprises; and establishing branch standard systems in the following activities: quality control standard systems, processing standards systems, transport standards system, maintenance standards system, and work safety and hygiene standards system.

ACTIVITIES OF SUGARCANE COLLECTION, PROCESSING CENTER EXPLAINED

Havana ATAC in Spanish Jan-Feb 80 pp 38-41

[Article by Salomon Llanes]

[Text] Now that we are at the crucial stage of the 1980 sugarcane harvest, it seems appropriate to speak of the importance to this key agro-industrial activity of an element now characteristic of our cane fields, the collection center.

This type of installation, conceived by the prominent Cuban expert Roberto Henderson, first operated experimentally during the 1964 harvest in cane-growing areas near the Osvaldo Sanchez sugar mill in Guines, Havana Province.

Since then, use of these cane-cleaning stations has progressively spread, practically from year to year. For example, whereas in 1970 the country already had 180 collection centers, by the following year the number had risen to 390. During the last sugarcane harvest, 481 of these units were in operation, and 511 are expected to be used in this one, 30 additional installations being placed in service.

What Is a Collection Center?

The collection center is a necessity arising from the increasing shortage of cane-cutters which is a natural result of the contrast between the strenuous job of a cane-cutter and the many new job opportunities the Revolution has brought to our farms. Its basic function is the dry-cleaning of the cane, which stems from the original idea that this installation would in large measure alleviate the need for manpower.

However, the center has become a sort of all-purpose installation that can function equally well for manual or mechanized cutting, or simply as a crane (known informally as a "chucho").

It consists of a receiving hopper with a movable bottom that delivers the cane to a conveyor at one end of which is a tower with two shafts. These have paired blades that cut up the stalks, reducing them to pieces approximately 40 centimeters in length.

The pieces fall onto a conveyor and, while being carried along, are exposed to a strong air current produced by blowers, This eliminates much of the straw and debris. After undergoing another cleaning process, the pieces reach another conveyor, and another blower continues to eliminate the straw and debris still in the cane.

Finally, by means of a third conveyor, the cane is loaded into the railroad cars and then transfered to the sugar mill's dumper.

Advantages

These cleaning installations have several advantages embracing various aspects of harvesting activity. Concerning them, Rodolfo Thomson, chief of the MINAZ [Ministry of the Sugar Industry] Department of Handling Installations, has said:

"The advantages of the collection centers embrace the entire agro-industrial system of the sugar-producing process. In the first place, they allow reduction of the number of cutters needed to harvest a given amount of cane, for their productivity increases when they don't have to cut the cane into two or three pieces, or winnow it.

"Because of its processing capacity, the collection center is capable of assuming the jobs of two, three and four cranes. Thus, it can be said that it makes possible consolidation of cane loading activity, which results in a manpower saving and often in greater rationality in the use of shipment by rail.

"Moreover, owing to their feature of cutting the cane into small pieces approximately 40 cm long, they make possible better loading of the railroad cars, reducing the number needed.

"It should be pointed out that the work of the collection centers has a very favorable effect on recovery at the mill, for they eliminate between 50 and 65 percent of the debris that accompanies the cane (leaves, straw, ends, loose dirt, etc.).

"They also make it easier to fulfill the mills' daily processing quotas by reducing the number of unwanted stoppages due to lack of cane or obstructions in the dumper. This, in turn, means better use of the cane transport system, reduction of maintenance, increased cane discharge and a saving in manpower."

Prospects

Fifteen years after its creation, the collection center continues to be a valuable aid to our sugarcane harvests for it is considered a reliable element in the cane harvest, a supporting cog for the agricultural and industrial work.

Eloquent testimony to that is the fact that the new mills built will have collection centers in cane-growing regions served by rail.

At present, 40 percent of the cane processed in our mills has been previously processed by a collection center. During the 1977-1978 cane harvest, over 2.343 billion arrobas of cane were processed by these cleaning stations. These data indicate the extent of their role in our harvests.

1977-78	2343.9	40.1

Six men per shift work at each collection center. During a shift they can process 700 tons (60,000 arrobas) of cane. Nationally, a total of 4,812 people work at these installations.

It should be pointed out that by making possible the consolidation of loading points and a reduced need for loading equipment, the collection centers have, since their inception, allowed the more efficient allocation of over 2,000 workers, who have moved on to other important tasks.

During the next 5 years, the MINAZ intends to establish from 100 to 120 new collection centers because of the advantages these units bring to the carrying out of the sugarcane harvest.

Although its structure and operating principles are still those designed by Henderson, the equipment has undergone some changes and technical improvements aimed at greater efficiency. They include changes in the hoisting system, the position of the blades, and in the blowers.

As for emulation, the collection centers have been a part of it since 1972, and the criteria assessed are fulfillment of processing tasks, loading of railroad cars, and fulfillment of the requirements concerning time lost. At present, the necessary steps are being taken for their incorporation into the "millionaire" movement.

FOUR NEW SUGAR MILLS UNDER CONSTRUCTION

Havana ATAC in Spanish Sep-Dec 79 pp 62-72

[Article by Roberto Perez Vega, assistant director of IPROYAZ [Sugar Industry Planning Institute] and Raul Cortinas, assistant director of EMI [Industrial Installations Enterprise : "Design and Construction of the new Sugarmills in Cuba"]

[Text] Four new sugarmills with a nominal grinding capacity of 7,000 metric tons of sugarcane per day are now under construction in the provinces of Pinar del Rio, Cienguegos, Camaguey and Granma. Those of Pinar del Rio and Camaguey Provinces should begin their first harvest in the coming season (1979-1980).

It is important and necessary to point out that these mills are designed with the concept of a sugarmill complex because they not only enfold the plans and constructions of agroindustrial installations but also the plans and construction of the new towns for the agricultural and industrial workers with the facilities of their social, commercial and welfare installations. At the same time, near each of these new installations a middle-level school is being built in which agricultural and industrial specialties will be studied. Each will have a capacity of 500 students.

Although each of these new sugarmill complexes has its own characteristics because of its location, agricultural zone, links with other sugarcane areas, roads and shipping ports, the general concept of the industrial plan is common to all.

Agricultural Plan (Pinar del Rio)

The agricultural area under consideration measures 1,346 caballerias net, which represent 935 caballerias of cane to be cut. They represent a milling potential of something more than 76 million arrobas of cane per harvest, with an average yield of 81,741 arrobas per caballeria in a harvest cycle of five cuttings in 7 years.

The area suitable for mechanization is 98 percent of the total.

The territory has a semimodern irrigation system consisting of a trunk canal running from the Bacunayagua to the San Cristobal Rivers; it also has a number of wells with pumping installations for the extraction of subterranean water, floodwater retaining pools and dams with a system of watergates on the San Cristobal, Santa Cruz and Taco-Taco Rivers.

The primary canals leading off from the trunk canal are built in parallel with a distance of one kilometer between canals and an approximate length of 50 kilometers; flow is 1.5 cubic meters per second.

There are also three dams which will provide the water needed to irrigate some 1,300 (1,272) caballerias (La Paila, Manuelita and San Julian).

Sugarcane supply to the sugarmill from the seven sugarcane districts is organized so that five of them will provide sugarcane via railroads while two of the districts will provide direct hauling by dumptrucks to the tipple.

The new mill will have a road network of 257 kilometers of roads of which 57 kilometers will be main asphalted roads, 48 kilometers will be improved roads and 156 kilometers will be secondary roads.

The railway network will have an overall length of 52 kilometers of standard 56.5 inch (1.44 meters) gage, of which 39.5 meters are new railway, including the 10 kilometers of railway in the mill yard and 12.5 kilometers of rebuilt railway.

Completely electrically operated sugarcane collection centers are scheduled to be installed in each of the five sugarcane districts using railroads.

The entire railway network, as well as the capitals of each of the sugarcane districts, will have a telephone communications net linking them with the mill.

This entire agricultural installation will be supported by a network of machine shops (4), storage facilities for fertilizers, pesticides and so forth, and social-administrative facilities (offices, dining rooms and housing).

Industrial Plan

The block of buildings for the industrial process consists of seven main steel-frame buildings in line for the unloading and preparation of the sugarcane, the grinding plant, the steam generating plant and the bagasse storage building. At a 90-degree angle to this block of buildings, and beginning with the grinding plant, there is a second block in which are found the sugarcane juice purification plant and the plants for the preparation of the lime, soda and acid mixture. Next is the main building for evaporation, crystallization and centrifugation. Parallel to this building is another, which is completely independent, where the electric power generating equipment and the station for pumping water for injection into the condensers are installed.

All these buildings are linked by various access means, allowing complete communications, with architectural design suited to technological requirements but providing an overall solution for the whole.

Auxiliary and service installations for the industry consist of the following:

Locomotive and Car Shop

It is located in a 18 by 42 meter steel-frame building, which has a six-meter wide corridor along its entire length in which are the various technical laboratory instruments for checking diesel and air systems, the technical offices and bathrooms. There is a completely electric 10-metric ton traveling crane located in the main building. There are also two 56.5-inch gage tracks with pits and the machine tools required.

For servicing this area, there is a system for receiving, handling and storing light fuel to be used in diesel-electric locomotives. It can store a 25-day supply and has railway and truck access.

Petroleum Receiving System

It is located conveniently for receiving petroleum from railway tank cars. It has an unloading reservoir and a 1,000-metric ton storage tank. It has a completely electric pumping system for receiving and transferring petroleum. The plans for the electrical installation of the area include the safety measures and conditions it requires.

Storage System for Final Molasses

This has a 5,000-metric ton storage tank with a pheumacator [as published] measuring system, ladders, ventilation and inspection systems. The area has a system for delivery of the product with access by trucks or by railway tank cars. The area is protected by a containment wall as a safety measure. The pumping units for transferring molasses are located in a small reinforced concrete structure.

Material Storage

A 15 by 54-meter steel-frame structure has been built with the necessary shelving for storage of the various materials and parts. There is also an open-air area for the storage of materials which can be stored outside.

The material storage area is completed with a storage building for flammable products, greases and lubricants, with a completely mechanized system for the latter two products.

This storage building is built on the same plans as the materials storage building. These areas, as can be seen, are arranged in such a manner that they allow access to them directly from the main installations of the plant.

Machine and Electrical Shops

These are installed in a metal-frame building measuring 18 by 60 meters, with a corridor measuring 6 meters wide and 36 meters long along its side in which are located the technical offices, tool cribs, toilets, and so forth.

The main building is served by a completely electric 10-metric ton traveling crane.

The machine shop has a large number of machine tools such as lathes, drill presses, planers , cutters, milling machines and so forth, which provide the capability of being able to build the most sophisticated spare parts. Moreover, there is a boiler repair and metal working area, as well as machinery such as mechanical vises, metal brakes and others.

The shop for repairing electrical equipment has drying ovens, drills, test benches and so forth.

Social-Administrative Building

This is a building of prefabricated concrete consisting of two sections linked by a passageway on the 0-0 level and access to the production and tipple areas at the +1.50 meter level.

In the first section is the service area, which consists of one floor with an area of some 500 square meters in which are included the kitchen, dining room, pay wickets and dispensary.

In the second section, which consists of three levels, are the administration, laboratory, computer center, technical offices and the telecommunications area. The instrument shop is located at the end of the area also.

Ventilation for these areas is provided by air conditioning units.

Access from the +3.50 meter level is provided through a passageway to the main production building so as to be able to go directly from the control room to the production areas.

Water Cooling System

There are two water coolers. The first measures 38 by 144 meters and consists of spraying towers with a cooling capacity of 30,000 GPM for the condensation of the juice steam from the evaporators and vacuum pans. The condensers are located at such a height that they allow the rejection of water to the cooler to be done by gravity, using pumping units only to propel water to the condensers.

The second unit, built on the same plans as the first, measures 20 by 75 meters, with its pan divided into three sections for the cooling of the circulating water in the turbo-generators, grinding plant equipment and the circulating water in the crystallizers. In these three cases the injection water as well as the discharge water is circulated by electrically operated pumping units.

Bulk Sugar Storage

This consists of a sheet steel building which forms a rectangle measuring 46 by 180 meters without any interior pillars. Up to a height of three meters the walls are made of prefabricated concrete supported by steel pillars. Its storage capacity is 45,000 metric tons of sugar. The storage facility is fed from the sugar scales in the boiler building by means of a rubber conveyor belt with a capacity of 50 metric tons per hour. This conveyor belt unloads on to another of similar capacity which feeds a tripper for the distribution of sugar inside the warehouse. The latter is located in the center of the building at a height of about 10 meters.

The extraction of sugar is done by means of two conveyor belts with individual capacities of 120 metric tons per hour, which feed two tanks on trailer trucks with a capacity of 40 metric tons each. The feeding of sugar to the extraction conveyor belts is accomplished by means of movable conveyor belts and self-propelled loading equipment.

The entire installation is operated from a motor control center with remote and local controls, which allows the integral operation of the entire system.

The installation also has a scale for weighing trailer trucks, which has a capacity of up to 150 metric tons. This allows control of the amount of sugar extracted.

The entire installation is linked to the bulk sugar terminal recently built at the port of Mariel.

Artificial lighting is obtained from mercury vapor lamps, which are explosion proof, and daylight is made use of by means of suitably placed translucent panels.

Receiving the Cane

The characteristics and location of the sugarcane area establish that the supply of sugarcane hauled by railway will be 62 percent and the supply of sugar hauled directly to tipples at 38 percent, it being foreseen that the latter will make up to 50 percent of the daily grinding.

The railway yard has 10 kilometers of railroad all together. The incoming load section has four lanes with a capacity for 12 percent [as published] loaded cars (1,800 metric tons). The empty car section consists of lanes which allow the parking of 96 empty cars.

The railway service facilities are expected to provide service to the petroleum receiving station, the grinding plant building, the machine shop, the final molasses and diesel fuel stations and of course, access to the locomotive shops.

For the operations of the railway yard, as well as for the rest of the railroad, a suitably located control building is being built. It will be equipped with the communications equipment needed for its operations.

All the infrastructure of the railway consists of reinforced concrete ties made by the organization itself.

To control the weighing of sugarcane cars there is a scale with a capacity of up to 150 metric tons on the tracks entering the tipple, the latter having a capacity for 12 cars. The movement of the cars onto the tipple is done by a double drum winch with a traction capacity of some five metric tons and a lineal speed of up to 200 meters per minute.

The design configuration of the yard allows the operation of trains with a maximum of 30 units.

The supply of cane by trucks with hydraulic dump bodies is done directly to the feed belt. There is also a scale for weighing these trucks.

External Networks

All the installation has a number of asphalted roads which adequately connect all the industrial, shop and auxiliary areas. There is also an external lighting system for the entire installation using outdoor mercury vapor lamps with a 220 volt system. There is also a suitably located network of pressurized water for fire fighting.

There is also a system of canals for the disposal of industrial effluents and sewage. These canals run to an oxidation pond, where after treatment, the wastes are used in the agricultural irrigation system.

Water Supply and Treatment

The supply of water to the industry comes from subterranean strata. Their capacity has been estimated at 3,600 gallons per minute and they are practically located within the industrial area.

For the reception and storage of water it has been decided to install a station consisting of a storage tank with a 1,000-metric ton capacity and a pumping station for transferring water. In this station are located the pumping units for the pressurized water network for fire fighting. It has been determined that one of these pumping units will be run by an internal combustion engine.

Drinking water is distributed by gravity to the various consumers from an elevated, mushroom type tank made of reinforced concrete and with a capacity of 200 cubic meters.

A plan for the chemical treatment of water has been built for supplying the make-up water for the steam plant. It uses the cold soda-lime or ionic exchange process and has a capacity of 80 cubic meters per hour. There are three storage tanks for the storage of the different types of water in this area, each of them with a 1,000 metric ton storage capacity. The area has the necessary facilities for the storage and disposal of chemical products as well as a small laboratory for the analysis and monitoring of the plant's operation.

The controls of all the units are centrally located in a motor control center.

The Industry

The plant was designed for a grinding rate of 7,000 metric tons of cane per day with an average content of 14 percent polarization and fiber of up to 16 percent. Imbibition will be accomplished hot at a 200 percent rate on the fiber content.

The sugarmill complex is prepared for the production of two types of sugar:

A. Export quality crude sugar with controlled polarization of between 97.5 and 98.5 degrees of polarization.

B. High polarization sugar for supplying refineries with a minimum polarization of 99 degrees.

The operational characteristics of the plan are given by the following parameters:

Reduced extraction by the grinding plant: 96 percent.
Maximum moisture of the bagasse: Maximum of 50 percent.
Losses of final molasses, percentage of cane: 1.05 (average).
Losses in juice, percentage of cane: .07 (average).
Undetermined losses in cane: .11 (maximum).

Daily production of the plant is as follows:

Sugar production: from 880 to 980 metric tons daily.
Final molasses: 245 to 300 metric tons daily.
Bagasse: 2,000 to 2,150 metric tons daily.
Scum: 280 to 350 metric tons daily.

It is important to point out that the energy produced by the plant in operation will allow the supplying of some 2,000 Kw to the national power network during the harvest period in a continuous form, using surplus bagasse as fuel, after all the requirements of the plant are covered. The sugarmill complex has been designed to operate at 100 percent of its installed capacity during harvest seasons of up to 150 days as a maximum, it being considered that there will be lost time of seven percent maximum because of stoppages and interruptions of an industrial nature.

The plan for capacities, with their variants in balances of materials and energy, has been computed by the model GEMACS 3-1 developed by our organization, using "Fortran VV-H" language and run on an Iris-50 machine of the Ministry of the Sugar Industry.

Other models of this machine are being used, as well as others of the CID 201B type of Cuban design and production for the computation and design of the pipelines and steel structures.

Movement and Preparation of Sugarcane

The conveyor belts are arranged in lines, the first one measuring 26 meters in length for receiving the cane transported by trucks. The second one, which measures 75 meters in length, unloads the cane from the railroad cars. There are two tilting platforms installed for lateral unloading with a capacity of 60 metric tons. They have a maximum tilt of 30 degrees. These platforms are operated by a hydraulic system.

These two conveyor belts are made of metal slats propelled by variable speed electric geared motors. They feed the feeding conveyor, which is propelled by a hydraulic motor with a broad range of speeds, allowing the proper supply to reach the grinding plant.

The equipment for the preparation of sugarcane consists of a double set of rotary blades with saw-toothed cutters, driven by 400 KW electric motors which operate at 6.3 kilovolts.

Preceding the sets of blades is a sugarcane leveler (gallego) and a mechanism for breaking up clumps. The latter is located at the discharge point of the second sugarcane conveyor belt. Both pieces of equipment are driven by electric motors. For cleaning the pits beneath the tipple there are two conveyor belts made of slats which discharge into two silos whose content is carried away by dump trucks.

All the operation and the controls of the area, not including the control of the lifting conveyor belt, are located in a central control room from which the operation of the entire area is possible.

The area is protected by a 16 by 96-meter metal frame structure, open on the sides, in which is installed a 10 metric ton capacity traveling crane at the +7 meter level. It is also nationally produced.

Grinding Plant

The entire installation is located in a building of attractive design, built of preshaped steel sheets. It covers an area of 27 by 84 meters and is supported by 14.8 meter columns. It has a traveling crane installed, which has two lifting grabs, each with a 20 metric ton capacity.

Preceding the building, on the framework of the shredder, is installed a static electromagnet of 12,000 watts capacity for the removal of metal objects before they can enter the grinding plant.

The plant consists of a shredder with three rollers 43 inches by 85 inches and six grinders with rollers of 42 by 84 inches. The shredder and grinding rollers are of steel construction and all their elements are calculated to operate with pressures of up to 800 metric tons. A differential grooving is used in the rollers of the grinders. A third roller has been installed in the shredder and a fourth roller in each grinder, both of new design and already tested. This will allow a maximum feeding.

The transportation of bagasse between units is accomplished by means of two inclined conveyors made of metal slats with an endless stainless steel chain driven by independent electric motors.

The motor drive of the shredder and the mills is independent for each unit. Each one consists of an electric motor, a high-speed gear box and a set of low-speed spur gears. The gear shafts are mounted in ball-bearings. All drive motors operate at 6.3 KV and are of the completely sealed type with a forced air cooling system. There are 500 KV of power available for the shredder and 630 KW for each of the grinders. A variation of speed of up to 20 percent is allowed. The lubrication system is of the centralized type for the low speed gear train, as well as for the shredder and grinders. It has a capacity of 144 cubic meters per minute and is completely automated.

The maceration system used is that of the compound type and the juice from the shredder and the first two grinders is sent to the factory. There are two static-type bagasse particle sieves. These are cleaned by scrapers consisting of brushes. The bagasse particles are fed once more into the first and third grinders. Both sieves and endless belts are driven electrically.

The diluted juice is sent to the factory by two pumping units with a capacity of 1,800 GPM and the juice resulting from maceration is distributed by two 850 GPM pumping units. Both pumps are of the centrifugal type.

For the cleaning of the system there is a system of preparation and dosages of bactericides.

The entire operation of the plant is handled from a new design control room which is located in such a way that the entire progress of the operation can be observed from there. This room is air conditioned. Independently, there are local controls for each group when operating conditions so require it.

The electric supply substation, where the power transformers and distribution panels are located, is located in a building attached to the main building, which has access to the plant operation areas. In this same building are the facilities for operation and maintenance personnel.

There are valves for regulating and measuring the flow of inbibition water and a belt scale for the continuous weighing of bagasse at the output of the tandem.

In the same area, a parallel lathe will be installed to be used mainly for the machining of the pivots and drums of the grinders. With the exception of the electric motors, speed reducers, reduction gears, and the shredder and grinder teeth, the rest of the equipment will be manufactured in the country.

Generation of Steam and Bagasse Building

The plant consists of four boilers with a generation of 45 to 56 metric tons of steam per hour. It operates either with bagasse or oil at a pressure of 28 kilograms per square meter and an output steam temperature of between 390 and 400 degrees centrigrade. The efficiency of these units oscillates between 82 and 88 percent, depending on the type of fuel being used.

There is a station for the thermal treatment of water and a pumping station consisting of two units driven by electric motors, which operate at 6.3 KV, and one which is driven by a steam turbine.

The installation also has a station for feeding and heating the high and low pressure petroleum, with two supply tanks of 50 cubic meters capacity each.

The operation system of the installation is pneumatic and it is equipped with a system of air compressors, filters, compressed air tanks and coolers.

The operation using bagasse and that using oil is controlled from a control room in which are located all the controls and monitors of the operation of the plant. This room is air conditioned.

Combustion gases are vented by means of a reinforced concrete chimney measuring 73 meters in height.

The extraction of ashes is accomplished by a segmented conveyor belt, the ashes being automatically taken from the boilers to a hopper with a capacity of 40 cubic meters from which the ashes are removed by dump trucks.

Power for the area is taken from a 2.0 MVA substation located in a reinforced concrete building. The high and low voltage distribution panels are also located there.

The entire installation of the steam plant is spread out in such a way that it allows optimum operation and a quick access to all areas. The installation is protected by a steel-frame building, which is independent from the rest of the installations. It measures approximately 25 by 49 meters and the boiler columns are used to support the framework of the building.

The bagasse distribution and storage system is designed in such a way that it can be retrieved for burning from the storage building mechanically.

The output conveyor of the tandem and the one which feeds the battery of boilers are of the rake type with individual capacities of up to 100 metric tons per hour. The surplus bagasse is transported to the distribution conveyor of the bagasse building by a rubber belt designed to transport 80 metric tons per hour. This in turn delivers to another mobile rubber belt of a similar capacity inside the building; the latter is the one which distributes the bagasse.

To extract bagasse from the building, there is a conveyor of the rake type with barbs, which has a mechanism for transverse and horizontal movement. This allows feeding the bagasse to another conveyor of the rake type (80 metric tons per hour) installed below the 0.0 level, which returns the bagasse once more to the conveyor distributing bagasse to the boilers.

All the installation is located inside a steel-framed building measuring 18 by 42 meters. Attached to the frame of the building is an operation passageway at the +1.0 level, from which the operation of the entire building is effected by a mobile remote control.

Production Area

Equipment for the sugar production process is distributed in two main areas. Distribution of equipment in these two areas is in keeping with concepts held on the most rational possible use of the area and the advantages which it offers for installation, subsequent operation and maintenance.

In the first building, which measures 19 by 42 meters with three main operational levels, there is the equipment for the lime milk, clarifiers, and the equipment for the extraction of juice. Following this installation is the second building, which measures 34.5 by 66 meters with seven operating levels. Here is located the rest of the sugar producing equipment.

On the first floor of the purification building is located the lime milk equipment consisting of concentrated and diluted lime tanks plus the pumping units. Following this equipment, there is the storage area for the sacks of hydrated lime.

On this same level are installed the filter cake mixing tanks with their pumping units and the pumps for the liquefaction of the clarifiers.

At a level of approximately +10.0 meters are installed the rotary vacuum juice filters with 57 square meters of filtering surface each, the operation level of the clarifiers; the clarified juice sieves with a filter surface of 13 square meters, the open bottom hoppers for final bagasse with a 25 cubic meter capacity, and the mixer for filter cake and final bagasse.

There is a system for the preparation of a coagulant with a capacity of one cubic meter for whenever it is necessary to apply it to the syrup.

The continuous clarifiers of Cuban design have an individual capacity of 275 cubic meters.

The cake from the filters is collected by a rubber conveyor belt with a capacity of 25 metric tons per hour. At the end of the belt is a scale which continuously weighs the filter cake. It was designed and built in the country. From here the filter cake is sent to a storage hopper from where it will be taken to the fields and used as fertilizer.

Next to this plant is the equipment for chemical purification using acid and potash.

On the first level of the boiler house are located the cane juice and syrup pumping units; vacuum pumps, compressor stations, offices and the electric substations which provide service to this entire area, and a plant which reduces steam from 28 to 1.8 kg per square meter with a capacity of 45 metric tons per hour.

At the +3.50 level, suitably distributed, are the batteries of commercial and drying centrifuges, the latter of a continuous type. Next to the batteries, and on the same level, there is the monitoring and control room for the area of the centrifuges. It is air conditioned. Commercial sugar is transported by a belt conveyor to the sugar scales which have a capacity of 75 metric tons per hour.

At the +7.62-meter level are the alkalized juice heaters (three units of 115 square meters of heating surface each), the clarified juice heaters (four units of 103 square meters of heating surface each, the crystalizers of the cooked mass eight units of 29 metric tons per hour), and the automatic scales with a 365-metric ton per hour capacity and an accurance of .1 percent. Following, on the next level, are the 70 cubic meter pans and some auxiliary equipment such as sweet water pumping units and the storage tank for lubrication syrup. Following this level, at +14.32 meters, toward the end of the building, there is the improved grain and seed storage with a 1,440 cubic foot (41 cubic meters) capacity and electrical operation. On the penultimate level of operations, at 18.58 meters, there are installed the juice evaporation and concentration equipment as well as the auxiliary equipment which permits the optimum operation of the plant.

The evaporation system consists of two preevaporators of something more than 1,000 square meters of heated surface, which operate with pressures of 1.8 kilogram per cubic meter and provide steam and juice for the operation of the vacuum pans and the juice heaters (secondary) at a pressure of .7 kilograms per square meter and two quadruple effect evaporators approximately 3,600 square meters of surface. The first pans operate at the same exhaust and extraction pressure as the second vessels. (The steam for the clarified juice heaters is taken from the general exhaust line of 1.8 kg per cubic meter). Eight vacuum pans of 50 cubic meters with a heating surface of 376 square meters have been installed. Five units are used for the commercial masses and three for those of drier sugars.

In this same level there is the magma storage vessel, the flash tank for the clarifiers, syrup dissolvers and other auxiliary equipment. In the levels immediately above there are storage tanks for syrups, syrup mixtures and water.

Barometric condensers are located at the +28 meter level. They are supported exteriorly by the building and in front by the equipment they serve.

At the 18.58 meter operational level is located the control and operations room for the entire factory. It has a high degree of automation. In it there are the necessary devices for monitoring the levels of juice by means of lighted indicators, dials, and flow gages for the entire clarification area.

A plan for the automation of the evaporator area has been made, in addition to systems for measuring juice and steam by means of a system for signalling high and low levels, open and closed positions of the main valves, as well as alarms for high and low densities of thickened syrups, vacuums, pressure and water supply.

There is a complete measuring, regulation and remote control system for the pans in the crystallization area, with distinction of the crystallization pans, those for commercial sugar and drier sugars, crystallizers, evaporators, cooked mass mixers, syrup diluters and preparation of the seed magma.

The entire automation system is designed as the minimum system capable of accomplishing all production work by means of computers.

Application of Computation to the Control of the Process

As a result of development of software applied by the MINAZ [Ministry of the Sugar Industry] and hardware by INSAC (National Automation System Institute), creation of an automated monitoring system of the production activity in the factory is insured. This will allow the use of the Cuban machine CID-201-B of 32 K and a special equipment which guarantees entry into the ECO system (Operations Monitoring Equipment), which allows monitoring the process of production in its continuous portion, that is, from the extraction station to that of evaporation. This in-line system guarantees the adoption of decisions in the productive process with the proper monitoring of the basic indicators of this activity. The P.P.A., (Packages of Application Program) of this objective are a beginning point for subsequent development, which is that relative to the integral writing of the program for Automated Production Systems for the Integral Technological Process for the Sugar Industry (SAD-PT).

Application of Computation to Other Activities

Using the same (CID-201-B) equipment, the increase and use of economic management programs (quotas, wages, paid time off, and so forth), as well as other activities, which although they are not considered as management are no less important (control of basic spare parts, status of sugar production estimates in terms of the amount of cane and so forth), becomes feasible.

All the P.P.A., those having to do with SAD-PT, as well as those related to SAD, are in a double phase. The first is that of exploitation and the second is that of development. They will be intensified in these new industrial installations and will be developed until they reach the objective of the preparation of a complete SAD, including activities related with the monitoring of the process.

Electric Plant and Pumping Station

This is located in a steel-framed building measuring 18 by 54 meters, which runs parallel to the boiler house building. The machinery room, which houses three turbogenerators of 4.0 MW each and generating at 6.3 KV, is located at the 3.50-meter level.

All distribution is accomplished at this voltage. There are nine substations for servicing the factory.

For transferring the load to the national electric system, there is a substation of 5.0 MVA which steps up voltage from 6.3 to 34.5 KV.

On the same plant operational level there is the control room from which the operation of the plant and the flow of current is monitored.

All the electrical controls of the consumers are grouped in centers of motor controls, power and lighting panels, all suitably located in each of the areas.

In the area of this building are located the condenser injection pumping units with individual capacities of 10,000 GPM.

The total area of the plant is served by an electric 10-metric-ton traveling crane.

There is an auxiliary lighting system using batteries for this area.

CIENFUEGOS FERTILIZER PLANT DEVELOPMENT NOTED

Havana BOHEMIA in Spanish 29 Aug 80 pp 32-35

[Article by Raul Palazuelos]

[Excerpt] Our readers are undoubtedly familiar with a great many myths. I also know a few which are probably not unknown to them.

One is about King Mausolus, whose tomb gave mausoleums their name. This is a historical myth from ancient times.

Another myth, but from modern history this time, has to do with the "infallible" superiority of the technology of the developed capitalist countries. Like all myths, this one is deceptive because exaggerating is the best way to propagate a myth. Along with technological sophistication goes the myth of the "American way of life," two sides of an equally fake coin.

We Cubans have resounding proof of this in the Cienfuegos nitrogenous fertilizer plant. There an English firm tried to erect a "mausoleum" of technological diversionism.

How did that happen? Telling the tale does not take long, nor is it difficult.

In order to back agricultural development plans, the Cuban Government made an agreement with a British engineering firm for the purchase of a chemical fertilizer plant that was to be the latest thing. The technology had been developed by the Belgians and it was to be reproduced by the British company.

Construction began on the industry in 1968. Five years later, the startup period began, but from the very first, problems were sensed. These problems took shape in an alarming fashion and finally led to a crisis. The plant produced little compared with the project's stated capacities. Finally, there was an outright technological collapse and work had to be shut down.

What were the problems? In short, they included: 1) the small water treatment capacity; 2) insufficient instrumentation air capacity, due to an inaccurate calculation of the plant's demand for pressurized air, making it necessary to purchase a new air compressor; 3) poor quality of materials and construction of the steam exchangers colled by sea water; 4) deficiencies in the turbine of the ammonia synthesis gas compressor (whose return the English hastily accepted); and 5) inefficiency of the lining of the urea synthesis column, making it practically unusable.

As if this were not enough, the steam system for the plant's technological departments was not stable since the plant was constantly affected by energy shortages. At no time did it have the necessary margin of electrical power.

To cite figures, nearly 1,000 reports of design and supply deficiencies were submitted to the English firm by the Cuban investors during construction and assembly of the plant, and nearly 100,000 pounds Sterling were paid by Cuba to the British for labor that was to have been done.

In 1978, the plant entered the first phase of reconstruction and rehabilitation, following long months of inactivity. Who bore the main burden for this task? Specialists from the Soviet Union.

Ready to work alongside Cuban workers, just as they had on dozens of other projects and tasks, the Soviets gave their solidary support to the Cienfuegos fertilizer plant beginning in 1978. That year, the plant resumed production. In 1979, the initial goal was 100,000 tons of nitrogenous fertilizer. The plan was then doubled and exceeded thanks to the rehabilitation of the plant by the joint efforts of Cubans and Soviets: The year 1979 concluded with 201,666 tons of ammonium nitrate, after the production of 88,483 tons of ammonia and 153,745 tons of nitric acid.

Economic indexes for that year were truly encouraging:

Value of gross production	$19,309,300
Value in fertilizer	$17,141,700
Value in polyethylene bags (10.3 million bags)	$ 1,307,400
Cost per weight of production	$ .85*
Average workers	1,343
Average wage	$ 183
Productivity per worker	$ 14,378
Profit balance	$ 592,700
Profitability	3.8%

* (Plan - 1.33)

The enterprise is capable of producing 840 tons of ammonium nitrate daily of a quality in keeping with international standards, thanks to the far-reaching rehabilitation of the plant by Cuban and Soviet workers. As shown above, it made it possible to double the number of tons produced last year. One demythifying element is obvious: The suppliers of capitalist technology were unable to make a plant designed and built by them operate efficiently or operate at all. And yet, despite the capitalist efforts to build a veritable mausoleum to technological diversionism at Cienfuegos, the internationalist support and cooperation of the socialist camp, expressed once more in the joint work of Soviets and Cubans, put an end to those plans and the plant went into operation.

But the aftereffects of the so-called "technical irresponsibility" of the British have still not vanished completely. The urea plant faced serious difficulties with the CO_2 compressor, which prevented it from going beyond 60-percent capacity. The cause? As in other parts of the world, deficiencies and inadequacies in design, the quality of materials and the very manufacturing.

At the present time, parts of the lining of the urea synthesis column are being made in the Soviet Union and it is hoped that they will be in Cuba before the end of the year. In the meantime, the country has to continue to import some urea to complete plant demand, which gradually helps raise the use of rehabilitated capacities and efficiency.

By way of example, we would point out that the 1980 production plan provides for raising plant operation to over 80 percent of the current capacity. Such a percentage implies a great effort by all plant elements, both Soviet specialists helping with the rehabilitation alongside Cuban personnel, as well as fertilizer production workers, who have set a goal of 150,000 tons of fertilizer produced by 25 August. Starting on that date, the plan followed would be one drafted by Soviet experts and would include installation of the internal lining of the urea column, maintenance and adjustment of other productive sectors, and so on.

Obviously, the monument to socialist internationalism of which the second secretary of the party, Gen Raul Castro, spoke on a visit to the Cienfuegos plant several years ago is taking on its full moral, historic and economic dimensions. Without any doubt, it will also involve a serious commitment and a challenge to other organizations in the country closely related to the fertilizer industry.

NICARAGUAN AMBASSADOR ON BORDER INCIDENT

PA201544 Tegucigalpa Radio America in Spanish 1405 GMT 19 Sep 80

[Article distributed by Inter-Central American Radio Organization]

[Text] Gen Policarpo Paz Garcia, chief of the Honduran armed forces and provisional president of Honduras, has ordered a thorough investigation of the confrontation between Somozist counterrevolutionaries and Sandinist army troops at the Honduran-Nicaraguan border over the weekend.

Jose Leon Talavera, Nicaraguan ambassador to Honduras, yesterday reported that General Paz Garcia ordered this investigation as well as the search for the group of former Somozist guardsmen who entered Nicaragua and subsequently returned to Honduras. The ambassador said the action occurred near Mata de Platano Hill in the jurisdiction of [name indistinct] (?near) Las Manos, Honduras, 30 km (?northeast) of Ocotal, Nicaragua. Talavera said that Saturday's confrontation is the most serious one that has occurred with counterrevolutionaries because between 50 and 80 Somozists clashed with 15 Sandinist army members, 2 of whom were killed and 2 of whom were wounded. He added that the counterrevolutionaries were armed with several war weapons and shotguns and that they were able to seize 18 rifles from the Nicaraguan soldiers.

The ambassador said that for the past few days he had been charging that camps of former guardsmen existed in the border region and that this charge has now been proven.

The diplomat said that the authorities of the Honduran army got in touch with their Nicaraguan counterparts the same day that the confrontation occurred. He said a commitment has been established to intensely patrol the area where the clash occurred until the groups of Somozists have been eliminated. The Nicaraguans in the area will also be transferred to other parts of the country. The ambassador said that joint operations between the armies of the two countries have yet to be carried out but that this will have to be done to exchange information and coordinate a policy to combat the counterrevolutionaries.

Talavera also said that the counterrevolutionary groups operating in Honduras have connections with other groups in Miami and Guatemala and that they are supported by reactionary sectors of Central America. He indicated that Honduras will play an important role in the control of these kinds of groups which seek to disrupt the relations between the Nicaraguan and Honduran people. He added that Nicaragua has confidence in the great cooperation of General Paz Garcia since the elimination of these groups will take some time.

JLP CANDIDATE WOUNDED--Kingston, Jamaica, 12 Sep (EFE)--A member of the opposition Jamaica Labor Party [JLP] died and another one was injured during an attack on Deputy Ruddy Lawson, a member of the ruling party, police reported here today. According to the official report released today, eight men fired at Deputy Lawson's office in Old Harbour, about 80 km from the Jamaican capital, Thursday. The attackers fled in a car, but were chased by members of the Peoples National Party, of which Prime Minister Michael Manley is a member. The attackers, nevertheless, managed to kill one man and injure another, who turned out to be Everald Warmington, a candidate for deputy for the opposition JLP. Police have identified the dead man merely as "Laidlaw," allegedly a JLP member. Warmington is the second JLP candidate wounded so far this year since the beginning of the unprecedented pre-electoral violence, amid which Jamaica will hold its elections shortly. On 7 August, Glen Webley, a former army captain, and a JLP candidate for Kingston's western zone, was fired upon and wounded in another attack. More than 300 people have been either killed or wounded in Jamaica, where the legislative assembly recently approved a law aimed at curbing violence, despite the politicians' protests that police abuse their power. 'FSLN' WITHDRAWS BILL AFFECTING EXILES' PROPERTY

[Text] The national leadership of the Sandinist National Liberation Front [FSLN] has recommended that the governing junta withdraw from the State Council a draft bill authorizing the expropriation of the property of Nicaraguans requesting asylum abroad, taking into account the fact that they are enemies of our country and our revolution. State Council President Bayardo Arce had this to say on the matter:

[Begin Arce recording] The FSLN national leadership in its weekly session discussed the draft bill and, after a careful analysis of its contents and motivations, recognized the intention of the governing junta to defend the sacred interests of our people and workers, in which the FSLN fully supports the junta.

Why do I say this? Because I have learned that one of the counterrevolutionary centers against our process is located in the United States, mainly in Miami. There, several elements with businesses in Nicaragua are channeling the profits made by our workers' sweat and hard work to the United States to finance counterrevolutionary activities from there, and in other cases, are merely taking their profits to live there in comfort. All this produces a decapitalization process most harmful to our economy.

Concerned over this situation, the governing junta tried to find a solution to the problem in some legal mechanism to counter such maneuvers, because the revolution, already institutionalized, is now trying to act within the law in all aspects. In other words, it has tried to find a formula to offset such unfair activity, which was causing the flight of the product of our workers' hard efforts through decapitalization mechanisms, most probably to finance counterrevolutionary activities.

In its search for a solution to such harmful activity, the junta found a mechanism which, after a careful analysis by the Sandinist front, was considered not to be the most appropriate because it could violate some principles that are part of the Sandinist ideals. Therefore, in view of that possibility, to maintain the unity and harmony of the Nicaraguan people, to prevent the reactionary sectors from looking for any little defect to create confusion to the detriment of the revolutionary process and to keep them from using this as another instrument for their designs, the FSLN national leadership has decided to recommend that the governing junta withdraw the draft bill from the State Council and look for other mechanisms to defend the interests of our people in the face of the maneuvers of those elements applying for asylum in the United States. CP MEMBER SEEKS ASYLUM--Father and son asked for asylum this morning at the Peruvian Embassy here. They were identified as Jesus Maria Almeida, member of the Venezuelan Communist Party, and former inmate of the San Carlos prison. He was also formerly employed by the Owens-Illinois Company. His son is a 16-year-old Jesus Alberto Almeida Ruiz. Jesus Maria Almeida worked for Owens-Illinois when William Frank Niehous was kidnapped. At that time Almeida was accused of stealing blueprints from the company's engineering department in Los Guayos near Valencia. This makes six persons who have asked for political asylum. The report has not been admitted or denied by Peruvian authorities. An official at the embassy said she was not authorized to comment on the issue. TERRITORY DISPUTED BY EL SALVADOR, HONDURAS SCENE OF HEAVY FIGHTING

[Text] According to reports, the "Los Dolores" plantation, which is legitimately and historically on Honduran soil, but which El Salvador claims as its soil, has become a battleground.

Tegucigalpa--The disputed pockets of land between Honduras and El Salvador have become the scenes of bloody battles between the Salvadoran armed forces and the clandestine groups operating in the neighboring country, according to information received yesterday in the republic's capital.

According to the reports, the "Los Dolores" plantation, which is legitimately and historically Honduran territory, but which El Salvador claims as its soil, has become a veritable battlefield.

It has even been said that the Salvadoran armed forces have made incursions in that area and have launched strong attacks in areas which are assumed to be occupied by clandestine Salvadoran groups.

Persons residing in or near that area who have traveled to Tegucigalpa have reported that the echo of rifle fire and ofother types of heavy weapons is heard ever day and at any hour in that region, a situation that keeps them quite worried and therefore causes them alarm.

Some of the inhabitants of the Dolores area have found it necessary to flee to the interior of the national territory because of the danger that the conflicting groups might confuse them for their opponents.

At night--it was learned--one can hear the sound of airplane engines. The planes presumably drop weapons and supply other types of war materiel to the clandestine groups.

The inhabitants of the area report that about one week ago some 450 Salvadorans, most of them children, were fleeing toward Honduras, when there was an unexpected encounter between national guardsmen and a leftist group, which forced them to remain in their own country, without any possibility of seeking protection on Honduran soil.

It was learned that the Honduran army "has not conducted any type of surveillance in those disputed areas for a long time, in accordance with an agreement previously reached with the Salvadorans. It is maintaining a serene attitude to prevent misinterpretations which later are sensationalized by groups that want to bring about unrest among the Honduran people," according to a report from one of the persons furnishing the unvarnished details that we are providing to our readers today.

HONDURAN TRAVELERS TO EL SALVADOR HARASSED AT BORDER AREA

San Pedro Sula LA PRENSA in Spanish 24 Jul 80 p 48

[Text] Tegucigalpa--Two Hondurans are believed to have perished last 14 July at the El Roy border area on the El Salvador side at the hands of national guardsmen from that country.

At the same time it was learned that several fellow countrymen who have traveled for various reasons to the neighboring country have also been the object of all sorts of abuses, outrages and wrongful searches by the Salvadoran National Guard.

This was reported fearfully by some persons from the western part of the country who arrived in Tegucigalpa yesterday.

They indicated that it is an open secret in Nueva Ocotepeque that last 14 July (date of the Salvadoran aggression against Honduras), two fellow countrymen were allegedly killed by Salvadoran national guardsmen. It is not known how they died, why, what their names were, nor what part of the country they came from.

Some Hondurans who recently traveled to El Salvador through the El Poy border area say that heavily armed Salvadoran soldiers commit all kinds of outrages against our fellow countrymen who enter or leave that country.

They are accused of being "collaborators of the Salvadoran leftists," and of being "couriers" and are vilified with other absurd accusations.

Hondurans have traveled to El Salvador to visit relatives or friends residing in that country. These visits are due to the conditions under which these people have been living for many months as a result of the bloody encounters between the extremists and the army.

As soon as Hondurans arrive at El Poy, on the Salvadoran side, they are ordered to raise their hands and are searched down to their socks. In some cases personal belongings are taken from them.

OAS observers stationed in the area are fully aware of these outrages, but up to now they have done absolutely nothing to bring them to a halt.

EXECUTIVE BRANCH APPROVES NEW BROADCASTING LAW

PY192215 Buenos Aires TELAM in Spanish 0945 GMT 16 Sep 80

[Text] Buenos Aires, 16 Sep (TELAM)--The new broadcasting law was approved and put into effect yesterday by the National Executive Branch. It sets down the rules which must be followed by official and private radio and television stations for their operation.

The new law establishes that most of the broadcasting stations now operated by the state will be transferred to the private sector. The state will only retain a television channel and a radio station in this capital and a radio station in each province, in addition to the national radio.

The law contains dispositions aimed at insuring that the services to be offered are in keeping with the needs of national security, the cultural level of the population, the protection of minors, the preservation of christian morality and the strengthening of national unity, and that those services should be a contribution to the common good and promote the strengthening of faith in the future of the nation, democratic coexistence, the freedom of man, respect for the institutions and laws of the republic, the integrity of the family and international friendship and cooperation.

The most important dispositions of the new law are:

Broadcasting services will be subject to the jurisdiction of the national government.

The assignment of frequencies and the guidance, promotion and control of broadcasting services belong exclusively to the authority of the national executive branch.

Broadcasting services are declared to be of public interest.

Broadcasting services will be operated by individuals or legally established organizations which hold broadcasting licenses granted in accordance with the rules and procedures of this law by the national government, the provincial governments, or by municipalities in particular cases.

The operators of broadcasting services must insure the regularity of broadcasts and the implementation of programing schedules.

The national government will promote and provide broadcasting services when they are not provided by the private sector in developing areas, especially in the border areas, with the objective of insuring maximum coverage of Argentine territory.

The provincial government and municipalities, in exceptional cases and with the authorization of the national executive branch, can provide one broadcasting service in the AM frequencies and one in the FM frequencies. Authorization will be granted only if the service is not offered by the private sector.

The content of the broadcasts will be aimed at meeting the following objectives: To contribute to the well-being of the individual by improving his way of life and his personal development or by contributing to the development of his community, to contribute to national unity and to strengthening faith and hopes in the destiny of the fatherland, to enrich culture and contribute to the education of the people, to contribute to the exercise of man's natural rights to communicate in compliance with democratic coexistence, to promote the responsible participation of all inhabitants, particularly Argentines, in achieving national goals, and to contribute to the development of international friendship and cooperation.

All broadcasts will be in Spanish. Those broadcast in other languages, with the prior authorization of the Federal Broadcasting Committee, will be either simultaneously or consecutively translated with the following exceptions: The lyrics of songs, foreign language teaching programs, Argentine International Broadcast Programs (RAE), and programs for foreign nationality groups and those using Aboriginal languages.

Foreign language films or television series will be dubbed in Spanish, preferably by Argentine professionals.

Broadcasts should disturb in no way whatsoever the privacy of persons or jeopordize their good name. All broadcasts that undermine health or the psychological stability of listeners or their moral integrity will be prohibited.

Programs qualified by the pertinent authorities as restricted for minors under 18 years of age shall not be broadcast at any time. During hours herein established as hours for a children's audience broadcasts must be for audiences of all ages.

The only restriction on freedom of information will be limited to those reestablished by the constitution and those established herein. Information must be true, objective and timely. All information must be rendered in such a way as to avoid causing public alarm or commotion. Information must not undermine national security or imply any praise of illegal activities or approve of violence in any form. News related to squalid, repulsive, horrifying deeds or events must be treated with restraint and propriety, and within the limits of strict information.

The official broadcasting station will be unable to issue political party messages.

The results of listening audience polls shall not be broadcast. The telephone must not be used for the promotion of radio programs as part of their regular programs.

The Official Government Broadcasting Service (SOR) [Servicio Oficial de Radiodifusion] will be used by a basic network made up of a maximum of: The federal capital; by the radio and television stations in each of the provinces and in the Tierra del Fuego Territory, in the Antarctic and the Islands of the South Atlantic; by a broadcasting station in such localities in the interior as shall be determined by the executive branch; by the relay stations of television stations in the federal capital whenever the national security situation so demands and only in those places where there is no activity by the private sector or there is low demographic density or little commercial interest.

The SOR will be a dependent of the communications secretariat, which is to be in charge of its organization, [words indistinct] and operation of the broadcasting stations.

The president's public information secretariat will guide and supervise those programs that are to be prepared by the communications secretariat to be aired by the SOR. The Federal Broadcasting Committee will be in charge of controlling this operation.

The licenses are untransferable and will be granted to individuals or to a commercial society legally established in the country. Both the individual or the members of the society, at the moment of presenting their application for the public bidding, must meet the following requirements and conditions: Be an Argentine citizen, either native or naturalized, in both cases with more than 10 years residence in the country and be of age; have high moral and cultural standards, and possess assets in accordance with the investment to be made and be able to demonstrate the origin of the funds, and not to be the owner of or a partner in other radio broadcasting societies; have no legal or economic ties with foreign journalistic enterprises, nor with national journalistic companies; not be a judge, legislator, public official, military officer or security personnel on active duty.

The societies must meet the following specific rules: The social objective will be exclusively to render and exploit the radio broadcasting services, and they cannot be branch offices or subsidiaries, nor can they be controlled or guided by foreign individuals or corporations; and the partners must be individuals and they cannot exceed 20 in number.

The Federal Broadcasting Committee [COMFER] will be an autarchic organization which will be under the supervision of the national executive branch. The board of directors will be made up of a president and six members designated by the national executive branch by suggestion of the organizations they represent; their term of office will be of 3 years and they will be able to be appointed for subsequent similar periods. The members of the board will represent the following organizations: The commanders in chief of the army, the navy and the air force, the Public Information Secretariat, the State Communications Secretariat and the Association of Licencees, one representing the television station licencees and one representing the radio stations. A commission made up of representatives of all the ministries of the national government and of the state intelligence secretariat will act as an advisory body.

The importation of television series, films or recorded programs whose sound system will be dubbed into Spanish in this country by Argentine professionals will be exempted from the payment of the import duties.

Within 180 days of the promulgation of this law the national executive branch will designate the members of the COMFER board. The COMFER interventor will exercise the powers which this law assigns to the president and to the board until the latter is completely established.

Within a period of 36 months, beginning with the date of the approval of the national broadcasting plan by means of the regime established by Article 39 of this law, the radio broadcasting services now rendered through the stations which are owned by the state or are administrated by it and which are not incorporated into the SOR and are not owned by provincial or municipal states, will be offered to private individuals.

The national executive branch will regulate this law within 150 days from the day of its promulgation.

Within 180 days of the promulgation of this law, the national executive branch will approve the national radio broadcasting plan, a plan which will be submitted by the Federal Radio Broadcasting Committee with the participation of the communications secretariat and the presidential public information secretariat.

Within 210 days of the promulgation of this law, the national executive branch will approve the statute and the functional organic structure of the Federal Radio Broadcasting Committee.

Argentina Televisora Color LS 82 Channel 7 S.A. will maintain its current legal statute as of the promulgation of this law, but will join the SOR and will be able to broadcast commercials in accordance with his law.

NINE MIR MEMBERS ARRESTED--Antofagasta, Chile, 24 Sep (LATIN)--The police have reported that nine members of an outlawed movement of the revolutionary left (MIR) commando have been arrested in possession of explosives, Marxist propaganda and medical equipment for a clandestine clinic. The Carabineros (militarized police) precinct of Antofagasta, located 1,367 km north of Santiago, reported that the majority of the members of the leftist cell, which includes a woman, are university students. According to the police, the group was responsible for placing explosives in power plants, thus creating balckouts in several sectors of Antofagasta. CNI TO CONTROL ASSOCIATIONS--Santiago, Chile, 23 Sep (AFP)--It has been reported here that the National Information Center (CNI), top security organization of the Chilean military government, will control as of today the activities of the associations of parents and students, and the teachers' meetings. A communique released by Gen Carlos Morales Retamal, chief of the state of emergency zone, has abolished a previous ruling which provided for the defense [tuicion] of these activities by the military institutes command. This entity has delegates in schools where they must learn about and control the meetings and activities of those organizations. The military resolution states that the CNI--an organization which substitutes for the dissolved DINA (National Intelligence Department)--aims at gathering and processing at the national level all information coming from the various fields of action which the government may require for the preparation of policies, plans and programs. SUSPECTS ROUNDED UP--Bogota--Approximately 150 persons have been arrested in the jurisdiction of Tocaima Municipality, Cundinamarca Department, during a military search for the leaders of the self-styled 19 April movement [M-19], who tried to hold a summit meeting in Melgar over the weekend. This was reported by Government Minister German Zea Hernandez, who added that government efforts to neutralize the activities of subversive groups seeking to disrupt public order will continue indefinitely. MILITARY CONTROL BOGOTA STREETS--Bogota, 24 Sep (EFE)--Military troops were deployed this morning along the main streets and avenues of the Colombian capital in view of the announcement that high school teachers would stage meetings, reliable military sources have announced. A spokesman for the Brigade of Military Institutes (BIM) told EFE by telephone that the military operation is intended to maintain order in Bogota in view of the possible teacher demonstrations. Military vigilance was intensified in the crowded commercial sectors of El Centro and Chapinero, the main ones in the city, where pedestrians and suspicious vehicles were searched. GUERRILLA GROUP STEALS PESOS--Bogota, 23 Sep (EFE)--An alleged urban guerrilla commando group raided an Antioquia commercial bank branch in northern Bogota Tuesday and stole 20,000 pesos a police spokesman told EFE. The group of guerrillas--four men and one woman--broke into the bank branch wielding machineguns and pistols and forced the employees to lie on the floor in order to loot the cash boxes and the safe. A bank employee said the attackers put the money in two sacks and fled in a station wagon which the police have not been able to find. The guerrillas told the bank clients that they belonged to a cell of the Army of National Liberation (ELN). The money they got from the attack, they said, was to be used to pay for the defense of their companions who have been subject to a verbal court-martial, which, incidentally, was declared invalid today by the military judiciary system. ARMY RAIDS HOMES--Mosquera, Colombia--The army today raided several residences in Mosquera, near Bogota. Mystery still surrounds this action. The only thing known in this regard in Bogota is that a tailor, who has been identified as 62-year-old Domingo Garcia, was captured by the troops and presumably taken to the Military Institutes Brigade. Other reports indicate that in other actions another five or six persons were arrested. Initial reports said it was an operation against drug traffickers but later it appeared that these were raids on homes belonging to 19 April Movement [M-19] guerrillas. It was said that the tailor is reportedly a member of that terrorist organization. The army is carrying out large operations in towns of Cundinamarca in search for the M-19 high command that fled when the military almost captured its members as they were holding a summit meeting in Tocaima. LABOR LEADER DENOUNCES GOVERNMENT OVER HAVANA RADIO

PA240022 Havana International Service in Spanish 0000 GMT 23 Sep 80

[Interview with Mario Granados, Costa Rican labor leader, by Nestor Nunez, station reporter, in Havana, no date given--recorded]

[Text] [Question] Which are the main problems affecting Costa Rican workers?

[Answer] The problems of Costa Rican workers are similar to those affecting other Latin American workers: Poor working conditions, low wages, high living cost, inflation and unemployment. All this means malnutrition for children, poor living conditions for mothers and tremendous sacrifices on the part of the workers' families.

[Question] Which is the attitude of the Costa Rican workers regarding the Salvadoran people struggle?

[Answer] By tradition, the Costa Rican people have been always opposed to military dictatorships and in favor of the Central American peoples struggle. However, the Costa Rican Government, which claims to be Social Christian, is neither social nor Christian, because it has the same political pattern as that of the fascist Salvadoran Christian Democratic military regime. That is why, we see the Costa Rican Government supporting the Salvadoran junta. Our labor organizations are constantly denouncing the crimes and abuses committed by the Salvadoran junta against the Salvadoran workers.

[Question] What does it mean to you as a Costa Rican labor leader to be in Cuba to attend the sixth course of the Lazaro Pena Labor Cadres School?

[Answer] For us to be able to attend this labor course is really a great opportunity. Latin American revolutionaries feel great admiration for the Cuban revolution and people. We are aware of the internationalist nature of the Cuban revolution. The truth is that we are very happy to be here attending the labor courses. We knew we were going to be received very well. Our labor organizations have been always in favor of the Cuban people. When Carazo, imperialism and the Cuban scum mounted that anti-Cuban campaign, our labor organizations staged several demonstrations of solidarity with the Cuban people and denounced the provocations of U.S. imperialism against the Cuban people. The bourgeoisie and imperialism launched an anti-Cuban campaign which the Cuban scum caused to collapse through a number of misdemeanors. For example: They tried to hijack a Lacsa aircraft to take them to Miami. The Costa Rican police had to intervene to restore order. They were also involved in a number of crimes and illegal activities. Despite the great amount of anti-Cuban propaganda, the Costa Rican people soon realized the truth behind the Cuban refugees case.

U.S. MUST SEEK TRUE SOURCE OF ANTI-AMERICANISM

PA211621 San Salvador VOZ DE LA VERDAD in Spanish 0230 GMT 20 Sep 80

[Station commentary: "We Are Going to Give the U.S. Ambassador Some Advice"]

[Text] Instead of the hardly diplomatic statements we read in the 16 September dailies, the ambassador of the big embassy should analyze the reason why many Salvadorans--of the many that do not want to emigrate to this country--are increasingly against them [anti-ellos].

In the past, this country has not distinguished itself for being against the North Americans. They did not plant their boot here, as they did in Nicaragua or the Dominican Republic, although they were prepared for it in 1932. Here, they did not interfere, either physically or indirectly, to establish or remove governments as they did in Guatemala, Chile and other countries of the world. In El Salvador, they do not own great tracts of land; we do not have a united fruit [company] and we do not have large mineral deposits or oil wells; they did not have either a canal or military bases. Their presence in El Salvador was less apparent, prepotent and offensive than in other countries of the area and the continent. And we Salvadorans were not particularly against them. This, of course, did not mean they were no present in our lives. They were and they still are, through their great enterprises, their alliances, but above all, through an army molded in their image and likeness, cradled by them, armed by them, trained by them and, in a word, manipulated by them.

But this presence, intolerable as it should be to the patriot who analyzes things well, did not cause the naive masses of the people to have an intense feeling of rejection toward them as, for example, in Nicaragua, Panama, Cuba, Mexico and so on and so forth.

Allow us, then, a piece of advice.

The attack on the big embassy should make its occupants think. They should ask themselves: Why have those popular organizations fired on them? They should ask themselves: What have they done in the past few years to make some of the people who did not hate them then to hate them now; for some of the people who respected them then to despise them to make some now; who looked upon them as friends and now consider them their hated enemies.

Of course, they will say that international communism has engineered a campaign, that subversion--that Cuba--that politicians on the left [sentence incomplete]

This is not enough to explain the way some of the Salvadoran people today feel toward all of them. In the big embassy, they have to admit that they are meddling in the lives of the Salvadorans and in the affairs of the sovereign, although small, republic of El Salvador in a way that is not right; that they show no respect for the self-determination of this suffering and castigated nation; that they want to manipulate the destinies of 5 million Salvadorans in accordance with the preconceived ideas of people who do not even understand us or love us.

As proof they do not understand the Salvadoran people, you have Ambassador White's statements to the press.

DISTORTED NEWS FROM MARXIST MEDIA DENOUNCED

PA250007 San Salvador Domestic Service in Spanish 1230 GMT 24 Sep 80

[Station commentary]

[Text] At this moment, when the democracies of the free world are engaged in a definitive ideological war to consolidate the right to liberty and peaceful coexistence, news media from countries oppressed by Marxist totalitarianism, where no one can manifest dissent, are trying to distort the true political situation in the countries they are attacking materially and through their propaganda.

Radio Noticias Del Continente, which operates from San Jose, Costa Rica, Radio Havana, Cuba, Radio Moscow and other radio stations that serve the expansionist imperialism of the Soviet Union are trying to twist the messages in the homilies of the apostolic administrator of El Salvador, Monsignor Rivera, to make our illustrious prelate appear to hold positions and views that do not correspond to the true Salvadoran situation.

All totalitarian regimes act alike and in a synchronized manner in their campaigns to discredit democratic regimes. In this case, as in all cases related to the Marxist penetration campaign, the attitude of the news media that obeys the commands of international communism represents an updating of the dogma of the propaganda ministers of the third reich who used to shout: Lie, lie, repeat your lie tirelessly and they will end up believing you.

PAZ GARCIA ADDRESSES NEW CONSTITUENT ASSEMBLY

Tegucigalpa EL CRONISTA in Spanish 21 Jul 80 pp 1, 5

[Speech by Brig Gen Policarpo Paz Garcia at the ceremony to install the Constitutent Assembly on 20 July 1980]

[Text] Honorable president and other members of the Directorate of the National Constituent Assembly; members of the Superior Council of the Armed Forces; members of the honorable Supreme Court of Justice; members of the government cabinet and representatives of decentralized agencies of the State; your excellencies and honorable members of the diplomatic corps and of foreign missions in our country; illustrious and most reverend Monseignor Hector Enrique Santos; distinguished special guests and honorable representatives of the people:

I extend to you a respectful and cordial greeting in the name of the government and of the Armed Forces of Honduras on this historical date on which you initiate our dedicated labor, in compliance with the popular mandate which was conferred upon you and in conformity with what was prescribed in the Law for Elections and Political Organizations.

From the time that the Armed Forces assumed the grave historical responsibility of conducting the national destiny we imposed upon ourselves the determination to interpret the just aspirations of the people and to forge for the nation a climate of broad public freedom and of unrestricted guarantees for the exercise of public and private activities by the citizenry; to maintain political stability based upon a permanent dialogue with all sectors of society; and to see to it that internal peace and the problems concerning the country's development should constitute the basic objectives of our endeavors. At the same time we have adopted the decision to promote indispensable changes in the economic, social and administrative structures of the State, in order to make more fair the relationships between the former and the people and to place the nation in a position to face the serious problems deriving from underdevelopment, as well as to guide it toward modernization and fulfillment of its republican life. For this it was necessary to create institutions, organizations and laws that would bring about profound positive changes and, in the cases where the public good warranted it, the modification of existing structures and systems.

It is fitting that the government of the Armed Forces should have the satisfaction of having been responsible for conquering the economic sovereignty of the State by rescuing its principal natural and inherited resources and canceling the old system of concessions, which for many decades burdened the republic's economy as well as its dignity. In achieving these objectives, we were insuring for the people the attainment of greater benefits derived from their natural resources and the exploitation of services previously belonging for the most part to foreign companies.

Deserving of special attention by the government of the Armed Forces are the basic aspects of the modernization of the country's economy and the priority emphasis which must be given to satisfying the population's basic needs, such as education, public health, employment, housing and communications. With respect to the first of these, it pleases us to have built, among other important infrastructure works, the largest highway network in the country's history and to have proceeded with the transformation, creation and modernization of ports and airports on both maritime coasts and in various places on land. With regard to the second, we have endeavored to listen to public appeals in search of a higher standard of living for all inhabitants, with special concern for the classes at the lower end of the economic spectrum, making use for this of the resources themselves and of financial and technical assistance, as well as of fraternal cooperation from friendly countries and international organizations. It is understandable that in the search for a better standard of living for our people we have come face to face with the natural limitations of our resources and with the serious and difficult problems brought upon us by the uncontrollable blows of nature and the continuous blows produced by the energy crises and their consequences: the tremendous inflation, destabilization and speculation, both externally and internally.

A product of this economic phenomenon has been the constant social unrest, manifested in different ways, but which we have tried to attenuate with no weapons other than tolerance, and understanding of the problems, dialogues negotiations, and whatever peaceful and civilized resources we have been able to find, believing that no price is too high when that is involved is maintaining social peace and answering the plea for public confidence and tranquility.

Thus it is that at no time during the Armed Forces regime has there been any need to declare a state of siege or to take any other extreme measures; quite to the contrary, the citizens' freedom has been safeguarded, as has the unrestricted respect for human rights.

With legitimate satisfaction we can proclaim that we have provided an environment with full exercise of citizens' guarantees, which our fundamental laws vouchsafe. Thus it is that the right to petition without restrictions of any type, the right to organize for legitimate and self-management purposes, and organized labor's right to collective bargaining already form part of popular gains of an irreversible nature. The people's right to express their thoughts and to state their opinions, by means of a free press, is a conquest by the people that the government has respected and enhanced, even while recognizing the dangers inherent in the abuse of any unrestricted freedom. It is likewise worthwhile to stree government's faithful compliance with the constitutional rules that guarantee freedom of worship, a freedom for which we personally fee the greatest respect and which we fully uphold. Freedom of conscience and the religious institutions which guide the faith and spiritual beliefs of the people have enjoyed and continue to enjoy our highest esteem and reverence.

Honorable constituent deputies:

We feel proud to present to you a country that is in order, enjoying a peace that has not been imposed and is extolled by its citizens and by foreigners; a country with a diversified, solid and ever expanding economy; a country pleased to maintain cordial international relations based upon a consistent policy of mutual respect and nonintervention. We present to you a republic with frontiers, thanks to the faithful constitutional compliance by our Armed Forces to safeguard territorial integrity and respect for its sovereignty.

Honorable deputies:

The Honduran people hope and the Armed Forces are confident that by honoring your patriotism and making use of the loftiest attributes of wisdom, prudence and reason, and enlightened by God's supreme power, you shall faithfully fulfill the mandate bestowed upon you of drafting a constitution for the republic that safeguards the political, social and economic gains achieved by the people and which guarantees the process of development for which we all strive and which leads the nation to truly democratic goals, within a climate of peace and freedom.

Thank you very much.

'LA PRENSA' COVERAGE OF SOMOZA'S DEATH CRITICIZED

PA181443 Managua Radio Sandino in Spanish 0300 GMT 18 Sep 80

[Unattributed commentary]

[Excerpts] The newspaper LA PRENSA today described the execution of the tyrant as an assassination. It also said that the patriots who imparted justice are terrorists. This is an outrage. We have seen the special editions of LA PRENSA and EL NUEVO DIARIO and today's edition of BARRICADA, official organ of the Sandinist National Liberation Front. After glancing through the three newspapers published in Nicaragua, today more than ever we are able to make basic and essential comparisons for our people.

The three papers gave full coverage to the execution of Anastasio Somoza Debayle. However, we find the cold blood of those who now run LA PRENSA unreal, absurd and incomprehensible. It seems they do not have blood in their veins and much less do some of its directors have the same blood of Pedro Joaquin Chamorro Cardenal, martyr of Nicaraguan freedoms.

While the Nicaraguan people clearly described the action as an execution or simply the death of the former genocidal dictator in Paraguay, LA PRENSA published the reports of the transnational news agencies which termed the action as an assassination committed by terrorists.

One only has to read and hear the many statements that we received at Radio Sandino today to know that the Nicaraguan people view Somoza's death as an execution and not an assassination. Those who, without being reactionaries, believed in LA PRENSA because of its tradition clearly know now that those who term the execution of such a criminal an assassination can never speak for the Nicaraguan people.

SANDINIST FORCES DESTROY COUNTERREVOLUTIONARY BANDS--State security forces, the army and the Sandinist peoples militias have wiped out two counterrevolutionary bands operating in Nueva Segovia and Jinotega departments. Killed in the operation in Nueva Segovia, were Pedro Joaquin Gonzalez, a counterrevolutionary leader known as Dimas; his aide known as Tinoco, and other band members. On 23 July the band killed four people in (Quilali). In Jinotega, the Sandinist forces broke up a counterrevolutionary band and arrested leader Felix Pedro Gomez Chavarria, known as (Tocoyo), who was responsible for attacking peasants and state farms in the area. TWO BUSINESSES TAKEN OVER--Two commando units, Farabundo Marti and Victorious September, composed of mass organization members, this morning took over the Nora Moviehouse and El Pirata Restaurant in Corinto, accusing the owners, Ricardo Saenz and his son Edmundo, of having close links with Somozism. The units, composed of the 19 July Youth, Workers' Literacy Militias [Milicias Obreras Alfabetizadoras--MOAS] and various other mass organizations, contend that they have documents proving the owners' relationship with the toppled regime. In turn the owners claim that they were never linked to the dictatorship. COMMENTATOR TIES LOCAL PDC TO SALVADORAN, OTHER PARTIES

PA232304 Panama City Circuito RPC in Spanish 2130 GMT 22 Sep 80

[Report from the Revolutionary Democratic Party's "On the Road to Victory" program]

[Excerpt] [Unidentified speaker] I was listening to this station on my way here and I noticed that there were approximately seven political messages aired before this program by the Christian Democratic Party [PDC] and I have heard that after this program they plan to air seven more. Therefore, I have reached the conclusion that if they have that many advertisements on this station they must be getting a lot of petroleum [revenue] from Venezuela and money from the FRG in order to have this transnational [referring to the PDC] operate in Panama.

I suppose that they are airing these ads before and after our program intentionally. We must be very pleased with this because it means they are concerned over what we say in this program which is always objective and honest.

Well, it seems to me that they are getting too much money from Venezuela, the FRG and the United States. The PDC is a transnational party. This is a proven fact. A short while ago, I was reading some reports from Mexico and other places which formally and categorically denounce this transnational.

The PDC is now trying to sink its claws into Panama. I hope this will never happen because the PDC influence in El Salvador has resulted in a blood bath. This blood bath will continue because the PDC junta members are clinging to power and are demonstrating their inability to implement democracy. Here in Panama, the PDC members speak of a true democracy and I ask: What kind of democracy has the PDC established in El Salvador?

However, we must add something else at this point. We cannot say that the PDC in El Salvador is one thing and that in Panama is another. We cannot separate the Salvadoran PDC from the Panamanian one because--and Leroy [referring to other program commentator] has stated this--local PDC leaders gave quite a welcome to the Salvadoran mayor who is an accomplice in and who supports everything happening in that country.

Therefore, the PDC of Panama is getting a lot of money to extend the PDC's claws into Panama. For this reason, it has enough funds to air seven advertisements one right after the other, before and after this program.

'COMANDANTE CHINO' ESCAPES TO PANAMANIAN EMBASSY

Escape From Military Hospital

Caracas EL NACIONAL in Spanish 10 Sep 80 Sec D p 18

[Text] Yesterday, a former guerrilla leader made a sensational escape from the Armed Forces Central Hospital, located at the end of Jose Angel Lamas Avenue, between the Artigas urban development and the El Guarataro district.

After 1600 hours, reliable police, military and state security agency sources confirmed the guerrilla fighter's escape. They revealed that it had taken place a few minutes after he had been transferred, under heavy military guard, from the La Pica National Jail in the state of Monagas to the Military Hospital.

It was reported that the escapee was Carlos Baez, alias "Comandante Chino," who had been incarcerated in the La Pica National Jail at the order of the military courts, charged with committing crimes punishable by the Code of Military Justice.

The former guerrilla leader was moved to Caracas for medical treatment in the Armed Forces Central Hospital. Baez took advantage of the carelessness of those reponsible for guarding him to escape from the building.

Carlos Baez was wearing dark brown pants and a plaid sport shirt, and his hair was long, when he escaped.

According to the first investigations of the case, when the former guerrilla leader reached Jose Angel Lamas Avenue, he boarded a bus filled with passengers. The bus took the route toward Petare, and was intercepted by military and police forces at Libertador Avenue. However, they did not find the fugitive among the passengers.

Immediately after the escape was discovered, an extensive police and military operation began, particularly in the Artigas, San Martin, El Guarataro and El Paraiso areas.

As of 1900 hours in the evening, there were no clues leading to the fugitive.

National Guards Arrested

Caracas EL NACIONAL in Spanish 11 Sep 80 Sec D p 24

[Text] Yesterday, state security agencies reported that the military convict who escaped from the Armed Forces Central Hospital, Carlos Perez, alias "Comandante Chino," belonged to the so-called Antonio Jose de Sucre Guerrilla Front, and to the Red Flag group.

Carlos Perez, aged 33, was also tried by the common courts, when arrested on several occasions by the Judicial Police in probes of robberies and drug trafficking, and the law on vagrants and hoodlums was applied to him as well.

The former guerrilla was confined in the La Pica National Jail, in the state of Monagas, at the order of a military court in the eastern part of the country. When a National Guard contingent transferred him in a vehicle to the Armed Forces Central Hospital, last Tuesday afternoon, the convict escaped from inside the treatment center building.

The search for the fugitive continued yesterday throughout the metropolitan area. Participating therein were forces from the National Guard, and security agents from the DISIP [Directorate of Intelligence and Prevention Services] and DIM [Military Intelligence Directorate].

The former guerrilla escaped wearing dark brown pants and a plaid sport shirt. Perez has long hair, a thick mustache and a beard.

According to his criminal record, in 1973 he participated in the eastern area guerrilla movement as one of the commanders of the Antonio Jose de Sucre Front and in the Red Banner group. In 1973, he was captured in the Sabana Grande area, as an alleged participant in a guerrilla ambush in the state of Monagas, where several members of the National Guard were killed. During 1962 and 1973, he was arrested several times by the PTJ [Judicial Technical Police] for robbery and drug trafficking. The law on vagrants and hoodlums was applied to him. He was under the orders of the first military court of the first instance in the eastern part of the country.

It was learned yesterday that the national guards who were responsible for moving the former guerrilla fighter to the Armed Forces Central Hospital have been arrested and subjected to questioning by the military authorities.

Asylum in Panamanian Embassy

Caracas EL NACIONAL in Spanish 12 Sep 80 Sec D p 24

[Text] Carlos Perez Baez, known as "Comandante Chino," who has sought asylum in the Panamanian Embassy since Tuesday, had spent 6 months in the San Martin Military Hospital receiving treatment for old, serious ailments.

The former guerrilla arrived at the diplomatic headquarters of the Republic of Panama at 1830 hours, where the door was opened by one of the two persons still there: the son of Ambassador Pedro Pereira, who was accompanied by his mother and ready to return home.

This is the second instance of asylum in 1 week. On Wednesday, 3 September, Margarita Oviedo Urrutia, her young son Carlos Oviedo Urrutia and Julio Cesar Guzman, both adults having been charged by the government with being guerrillas belonging to the Red Flag group, sought asylum in the Mexican Embassy. These three individuals quickly received asylum status and, within 3 days, left the country with safe-conducts provided by the Venezuelan Foreign Ministry.

The ambassador of the Republic of Panama, Dr Pedro Pereira, explained that Perez Baez sought asylum and protection because he considered himself the victim of political persecution, being currently brought to trial for military rebellion.

At dawn, the Panamanian Embassy was guarded by Metropolitan and DISIP police, summoned by the embassy to give proper protection to the diplomatic headquarters.

The Metropolitan Police officer was on guard at the small entrance to the embassy, preventing access to the diplomatic headquarters with his arm. Before allowing us to pass, he warned that we could not talk to the individual given asylum, but only to the ambassador.

"Comandante Chino" could be seen on the left side of the entrance to the residence, through a blue railing. He was seated on an easy chair. His face showed signs of fatigue, and he seemed to be ill. He hobbled over to the railing, wearing one shoe and no socks. The other bare foot was inflamed. We exchanged a few words while the police officer led us inside the entrance.

We Are Studying the Case

Ambassador Pedro Pereira recounted what had happened after the fugitive entered the diplomatic headquarters.

"When the boy heard the knocking, he opened the door without asking who it was and what they wanted. The man explained to my wife that he was a victim of political persecution who needed protection. The police were called to protect the embassy, and we contacted the Panamanian and Venezuelan Foreign Ministries."

Ambassador Pereira said that the man described some of his life underground and in the guerrilla struggle, noting that he had been held since 1975 without any decision made on his status. "He claimed to have been moved to the Military Hospital on 22 March. From that date until the present, he received medical treatment because of ailments in some parts of his body.

"He said that he belonged to the Revolutionary Armed Forces, specializing in agitation and propaganda," the ambassador remarked, and "he disclosed that he had been captured in 1975 in the state of Monagas. Since then, the military courts kept a file on him, and he was not benefited by the decree on pacification, which is why he intended to escape for a long time."

Ambassador Pereira said that the deputy foreign minister, Oswaldo Paez Pumar, is studying the case, so as later to issue a report, and that the Panamanian Foreign Ministry already has part of the information. More data is expected to be procured, so that a subsequent decision may be made on the asylum.

"Will they give him diplomatic asylum?"

"At present, he has preventive diplomatic protection."

"If he were to be granted asylum, when would he leave?"

"That problem must be resolved very soon. I think that tomorrow, at the earliest, we shall have a decision. If so, perhaps this weekend, or possibly Sunday or Monday. Depending on what my country decides, we would wait for the safe-conducts issued by the Venezuelan Government."

The Letter From 'Comandante Chino'

Ambassador Pedro Pereira kindly allowed us to photograph Perez Baez. "But only photos, nothing else! You cannot talk to the person seeking asylum, because that is in violation of the conventions on asylum."

They brought a stool so that Ramon Garcia could take the picture. The former guerrilla limped over to the blue railing, and gave the reporter a letter in which he recounts some of his experiences in the guerrilla struggle and in prison.

"I was in the Military Hospital since 22 March, being treated for some 'ailments.' I took advantage of the carelessness of the guards who were watching me to escape. I had been planning this for a long time. I had a clear idea of how I could do it, and I even knew the location of several embassies, in case of emergency, as it so happened."

Elsewhere in his account, "Comandante Chino" said that he reached the embassy during the afternoon, and was well treated by the ambassador and other employees. He also described how native and international groups of artists had requested his release.

"I am known in artistic circles as a poet and dramatist, and I have produced a great many pictorial and literary works. I have collaborated on famous magazines, such as ZONA FRANCA, IMAGEN and CASA DE LAS AMERICAS, and I belong to the cultural group known as Kereper and the puppet performing group known as 'The Laughing Bee.'

"I spent 42 months confined in La Pica, in the eastern region, charged with military rebellion, and I was never considered to be covered by the decree on pacification, which concerned people who had been armed. For that reason, I decided to escape."

There was no more time to talk or remain near the former guerrilla, Carlos Perez Baez. The police and embassy officials were watching the movements of "Comandante Chino" and of the reporters as well.

Ambassador Pedro Pereira Arosemena remarked that, during the 5 months that he has headed the Panamaniana deiplomatic headquarters, this makes two cases of asylum that he has encountered: "The first one involved the eight Haitians, in May, and now there is this one."

Venezuelan Safe-Conduct Possible

Caracas EL NACIONAL in Spanish 12 Sep 80 Sec D p 24

[Text] The acting foreign minister, Dr Oswaldo Paez Pumar, stated that if the government of Panama declares the individual who sought refuge in that country's embassy in Caracas last Wednesday a political refugee, Venezuela will take steps to grant him the pertinent safe-conduct.

Answering questions from newsmen, Paez Pumar announced that, yesterday morning, he had received a phone call from the Panamanian ambassador notifying him that, on Wednesday night, Carlos Baez had appeared at the chancery of the embassy and had sought diplomatic protection.

He also said that the ambassador had told him that he would send the ministry the pertinent note, without proceeding to pass judgment on the case, because they wanted to analyze the situation carefully.

Paez Pumar commented that he had confirmed to the Panamanian ambassador Venezuela's traditional position, "to the effect that we respect the right of the country granting asylum to make the judgment."

He said that, if Panama decides to declare this person a political refugee, the Venezuelan Government would take steps to grant the necessary safe-conduct.

Dr Paez Pumar stressed that, in fact, he could not be declared a political refugee. He claimed that there are no victims of political persecution in Venezuela. Moreover, according to reports received from other government agencies, the petitioner is an individual who has been implicated in criminal activities on several occasions. "He has a sizable dossier."

When asked whether these recent cases of asylum would bring about a reinforcement of the measures for guarding the embassies, the acting foreign minister said that there was no reason for this, and hence the normal surveillance would simply be maintained.

He emphasized: "What is clear is that these individuals are not victims of political persecution." And he added:

"So we hope that, in this matter, the status of asylum will not be something taken rather lightly."

He noted: "We have respected and we shall continue to respect the judgment that the various countries may make concerning asylum, but there are obvious instances, such as this one, wherein, at best, a country will decide not to declare this person a political refugee."

Refugees in Our Embassies in Several Countries

In response to questions, he confirmed the fact that the status of those seeking asylum in our embassy in Havana is still unresolved, and we are waiting for the Cuban Government to grant them the pertinent safe-conducts. There are 19 refugees in both the headquarters of the mission and the offices of our Foreign Ministry in the Cuban capital.

In Bolivia, there are about 50 persons who have sought asylum, also awaiting the safe-conducts from the military junta.

The refugees who were at the embassy in Guatemala have now left. There are none at the Venezuelan Embassy in Chile.

POSSIBLE GUERRILLAS ARRESTED, ARMS CONFISCATED

Caracas EL NACIONAL in Spanish 5 Sep 80 Sec D p 23

[Text] Maracaibo, 4 Sep--At dawn yesterday, officials from the Police Intelligence Directorate raided the premises on La Limpia Avenue, where they made four arrests and seized military uniforms, ammunition and implements for making Molotov bombs and other explosives.

The building subjected to the domicile search is No 35-76, located on La Limpia Avenue near the so-called "Molina curve." Inside, Kalmin Rafael Anselmi Castellanos, with CIV [Venezuelan Identity Card] 9114555; Jose Antonio Valera Martinez, with CIV 5945455; Eduardo Antonio Parada Mora, with CIV 560343; and Jesus Castillo Castillo, of Colombian nationality, were captured.

The four men in custody who, according to the authorities, are implicated in subversive activities, were turned over to the jurisdiction of the First Infantry Division, together with the confiscated materials.

Yesterday, the investigation was joined by the Military Intelligence Directorate, an agency which will attempt to probe more deeply in the activities carried out by the individuals who are now under arrest.

It was learned that the investigations include those of the many holdups of banks and business establishments in the area thus far this year.

However, there is no confirmation that the four suspects are really guerrillas, although the entities which captured them claim that they have all the characteristics for being guerrillas.

According to the official report, the following material was discovered in the operation conducted at residence No 35-76 on La Limpia Avenue:

Three green shirts and three pairs of olive drab pants; a military belt; three red berets; one police truncheon; two placards of the Movement of the Revolutionary Left; two pairs of scissors; three rubber containers; two sewing machines; two bankbooks; one knapsack; documents; 10 cylindrical connections for making nipples; several rounds of ammunition for an FAL-type rifle, and three 38-caliber revolvers. Also confiscated were the remains of plants which the police presume to be marihuana, in addition to a supply of AHR pills of unknown origin.

They also succeeded in confiscating three roles of film which were exposed and processed, 482 bolivares and $3.00 in bills.

The DISIP [Directorate of Intelligence and Prevention Services] put those who were arrested at the disposal of the First Infantry Division in mid-morning, and they were sent from the garrison to the Military Intelligence Directorate, where they are currently being subjected to questioning.

CATTLEMEN'S FEDERATION PROTESTS GUERRILLA ACTIVITIES

Caracas EL NACIONAL in Spanish 6 Sep 80 Sec D p 7

[Text] Zaraza, 5 Sep--The president of the National Cattlemen's Federation, Rafael Marcial Garmendia, gave notice here that "if the atmosphere of insecurity being experienced by the owners of farms in the Monagas, Anzoategui and El Guarico areas persists, there will be guerrilla fighters in the countryside instead of agricultural and livestock producers."

At an assembly called by the Zaraza District Agricultural-Livestock Association to cite the urgent need for a technical-financial assistance and a roadway plan, to guarantee the collection of the large corn harvest expected this year in the Unare Watershed, the president of the Cattlemen's Federation made these statements, and demanded forceful government measures "against the frequent acts of extortion and banditry victimizing the working people in the rural sections of the east and El Guarico."

In statements made to EL NACIONAL, he added: "There are specific complaints, and there is also fear of complaining, but the Venezuelan Cattlemen's Federation is assuming that responsibility. We have requested a hearing, that has not yet been granted, from the minister of interior, to submit to him a document bearing the names of the cattlemen who have been subjected to extortion and who have been forced to keep away from their productive activity out of fear of reprisals from armed bandits. We maintain that, if this atmosphere of unrest and fear persists, what there will be in the countryside will be guerrillas instead of cattlemen. This is having a very negative effect on the indexes of productivity, and it could worsen still more the status of an importing country which we are suffering from, still having to depend on foreign countries for 60 percent of the food products consumed by the Venezuelan population."

Zaraza Has Record Corn and Sorghum Figures

In Zaraza, the president of the Agricultural-Livestock Association, Jose Manuel Panzarelli, and the head of the Chamber of Commerce, Rafael Ayala, in a document sent to Rafael Marcial Garmendia and to the vice president of FEDECAMARAS [Association of the Chambers of Commerce and Industry], Carlos Sequera Yepez, state that there is an increasing danger that a record production of over 70 million kilograms of corn and sorghum may be partially lost, owing to "the bad condition of the rural roads throughout the entire Unare Watershed." They demand "immediate intervention by the government sector, so that this situation may be resolved promptly."

Panzarelli added: "If this does not happen, obviously the effort of many of the farmers of the Unare Watershed may be completely thwarted, with losses that we do not hesitate to describe as devastating."

The document also cites such critical aspects as the lack of timely technical and credit assistance, poor quality and no control of the price of input, stoppage of the rural electrification and irrigation plants, etc.

Panzarelli remarked: "Our area, and especially this town in which we live, Zaraza, continues to exist without any attention from the government."

Abuses on the Part of Oil Contractors Charged

Another serious charge made to the heads of the Cattlemen's Federation and of FEDECAMARAS relates to the oil contractors and those from Caroni Electrification (EDELCA), who "invade our farms without permission, cause destruction and deny any possibility of compensation."

The document declares: "The multinationals behaved in a more responsible and humane manner."

Rafael Marcial Garmendia said: "It may be asserted here and now that the great damage caused by oil as an instrument distorting the Venezuelan rural economy has been compounded by these abuses disclosed to us today in Zaraza, which the owners of farms and farmers in the entire eastern region are experiencing as well. We have already expressed our views to Venezuelan Petroleum but, without explanation, a meeting that we were going to hold with board members and legal advisers of the operating companies has not yet been called. This problem, and the harassment from the unlawful individuals in the so-called 'Bermuda Triangle,' as the territory of this state and Anzoategui and Monagas is now known (to depict the dangerous nature of the situation), will be reported again to the national government within the next few days."

Garmendia and Sequera Yepez stated that what has been explained by the agricultural-livestock sector of Zaraza will be considered next week by the Cattlemen's Federation and FEDECAMARAS, by a special committee, for the purpose of demanding immediate solutions from the executive branch, through the cabinet offices and autonomous agency which have direct jurisdiction in such matters.

SAFE-CONDUCTS TO EXILES--Caracas, 18 Sep (EFE)--Venezuela will grant safe-conducts to the two persons who requested asylum in the Peruvian Embassy in Caracas last Monday. Venezuelan Deputy Foreign Minister Oswaldo Paez Pumar, after reiterating in statements made here that "in Venezuela no one is politically persecuted," announced that Jesus Maria Almeida and his son will receive safe-conducts to travel to Peru. Paez Pumar insisted that the two refugees in the Peruvian Embassy asked for asylum in a bid for publicity, but since the Peruvian Government had granted them asylum, Venezuela will grant them the respective safe-conducts. NEWSPAPER OWNERS DECRY LACK OF PRESS FREEDOM

PY302115 Buenos Aires NOTICIAS ARGENTINAS in Spanish 2320 GMT 26 Sep 80

[Article by an NA correspondent]

[Text] Concordia, 26 Sep (NA)--The 18th annual assembly of the Argentine Newspaper Owners Association (ADEPA) that was held in Concordia stated today that "it cannot be said that there is freedom of the press in Argentina." But it admitted that "there is more respect on the part of the authorities regarding ideology."

On its next to the last day of negotiations held at the San Carlos Hotel in Concordia, the assembly unanimously approved the report on the development of the press in Argentina during September 1979-September 1980 and particularly what has taken place since April after the meeting that the ADEPA directors held in Buenos Aires.

The report was read by Carlos Ovidio Lagos, president of ADEPA, president of the press commission, and director of the newspaper LA CAPITAL of Rosario.

The assembly also approved two complementary declarations: in one of them it refutes and rejects the program sponsored by the UNESCO which aims to regulate the activities of the media throughout the world. In the other it demands that the executive branch to "immediately" lift the intervention that was ordered 3 years ago on the newspaper LA OPINION in Trenque Lauquen. In addition it stated that the government measures are a virtual confiscation.

The text of the declaration issued by ADEPA states:

1. Although it is true that since the time of the last assembly--particularly since the 52d meeting of ADEPA directors held in Buenos Aires--there have been some deeds that have undermined the freedom of the press, it is undoubtedly true that in the ideological area there has been more respect on the part of the authorities.

2. In the national economic sector there is an insistance to continue with an illegal attitude that led to the renegotiation of a corrupt contract that is completely null, such as the contract with the Papal Prensa Inc. This contract established a 45 percent tax on paper imports, which is something that a country that respects freedom of the press cannot accept. The Argentine constitution, article No 2 states: "The congress will not issue laws that will restrict the freedom of the press laws or that will establish federal laws that will affect them..."Moreover, the Buenos Aires state reform commission has specifically explained the meaning of the constitutional article by stating that "restrictions and taxes that hinder their existence cannot be imposed upon newspapers."

Both the 45 percent tax, which is completely unconstitutional and which threatens the existence of many newspapers and weeklies throughout the nation, and the government decision that deprives newspapers of the possibility of competing on equal terms with the owners of Papel Prensa Inc., undoubtedly affect the freedom of the press that is consecrated in our constitution.

3. The so-called security law No 20840, article No 2 clause A; article No 3 clause 8; and article No 222 of the penal code undermine the freedom of the press. We, therefore reassert that these laws must be repealed and replaced by proper laws that comply with the constitution and the principles of authentic democracy.

News, whenever it is reported with responsibility, objectivity, and in a truthful manner can never be confused with subversion or with the practice of terrorism.

4. In conclusion, it cannot be said that there is freedom of the press in Argentina.

'NATIONAL RECONSTRUCTION' TERMED END TO STATE OF REVOLUTION

La Paz EL DIARIO in Spanish 26 Aug 80 p 2

[Article by Guillermo Gonzalez Duran: "National Reconstruction or Permanent Revolution?"]

[Text] Intoxicated by the constant preaching of communism and terrorist practices over many years, finding itself at the brink of grave collapse and definite chaos, Bolivia, due to providential design and civic reaction on the part of the Armed Forces, has decided to return to the ways of order, work, peace, and dignity, with the current administration being referred to as a government of "national reconstruction" with a definitely patriotic meaning.

As has been established quite clearly, there was no revolutionary change on 17 July since the president at that time, Mrs Lidia Gueiler, felt too weak to resist the anarchist avalanche which was flooding the country, handing the country over to the oppression of left-wing extremism, and, as we know, "resigned" from the illegal office which she held and turned the government over to the military commanders so that they may save the country. And that is what this is all about: the country's salvation!

However, in spite of the fact that the measures taken so far by the supreme goverment tend to assure tranquility and public confidence, aimed at pacifying the nation and bringing about brotherly understanding among all Bolivians in a real nationalist union, which is what we want, we must pay attention to something we have all heard repeatedly in public declarations and that is that there continues to be talk of the military "revolution" of 17 July, as if it were an undertaking of violence (something which is not true), an undetaking which must be carried forward, something which, as we see it, is in absolute contradiction to what we must have now that the serious danger of wiping out the nation has been eliminated, so that we can move on to a policy of "national reconstruction."

In earlier articles we said that the doctrinal theory of communist origin regarding the "permanent revolution"--which people have been talking about constantly in Bolivia since 1952--tends to wipe out all religious principles, the family, private property, and the state, in order to impose the dictatorship of the proletariat. We said that this revolution, deliberately aimed at weakening society and spreading anarchy everywhere, can be compared to the fever associated with a sickness. Who could think that, if a person is to recover his or her health, it would be necessary for that person "permanently" to live with a high temperature of 40 degrees [Centigrade]? If that seems illogical, would it make any sense to talk of a permanent revolution?

Comparing the case of government reform (an issue on which we must move with great care and which cannot be radical for reasons which we need not analyze at this point) to the construction of a new building on the same terrain on which the old one is located will show us that it is necessary first of all to remove the old building, using its materials as much as possible, and that it makes sense to do this, rather than blowing it up; after we have begun the new construction project (assuming that the earlier work has been dynamited), will it be necessary, to raze the walls, to set off more dynamite in order to finish each row of bricks? Does that make any sense? And if not, is it perhaps more rational to accept the thinking of the theoreticians of the "permanent revolution?"

In spite of the fact that Bolivia's history, unlike any other in the world, offers us more than a hundred revolts over its 155 years of republican life, we continue to talk of the "necessity" of advancing the revolution. Which revolution? And who are the people who, while calling for pacification, order, and "national reconstruction," keep talking about revolution? Perhaps they do so out of good faith, out of habit, and without thinking of the effects of their words? Could it be that there is no strong red infiltration of the government, an infiltration which, operating skillfully, seeks to maintain a climate of national tension? We know that the task of "national reconstruction" is a difficult undertaking and this is why we believe that we must be alert on this point. Are we not by any chance providing incentives, by constantly preaching revolution, for the various forms of extremism to continue with their acts of terrorism which cause disturbances and social disorder--a situation which any aware citizen along with the government seeks to have terminated?

In more than one article we mentioned the famous saying by Goethe and we feel that we must repeat it now and that it must be properly taken into consideration: "Progress comes through evolution and order, never through revolution and upheaval."

If the real civic attitude is not aroused and if the marxist games are not terminated once and for all, games which are imitated even in our language, continuing marxist propaganda, always encouraged from abroad, sustaining the campaign of conspiracy against Bolivia, then, in the not too distant future, we will have to lament the consequences which, when it comes to Bolivia's national pacification and security, we must prevent through calm measures, including the dissemination of official information and guidance for the citizens.

We need much more in the way of the philosophy of civic motivation as a part of the integral philosophy of nationalism with which we will deal in several articles. We need this spiritual food which, in elevating our dignity and in making us proud of our nation, strengthens us and enables us, on the basis of work, honesty, and brotherly love, to build a really great and prosperous fatherland in which there will be no ambivalent, dangerous, and negative games. Let everybody know what role he is to play: white or black.

MAGAZINE DRAWS PARALLEL BETWEEN MEZA, PINOCHET REGIMES

Sao Paulo VEJA in Portuguese 30 July 80 pp 33-34

[Text] "This is a national reconstruction government and I am like General Pinochet: I shall remain in power for 20 years so as to give the new generations a country free of the Marxist cancer."

Walking along the streets of La Paz last Thursday, surrounded by security agents, Gen Luis Garcia Meza, president of Bolivia since the military coup of 17 July, smiled as he uttered those words, words which are extraordinarily optimistic in any country particularly in his where six presidents have followed each other in the past 2 years since General Hugo Banzer left office. Greeted by showers of shredded paper thrown by followers, the general gesticulated and spoke to newsmen: "I want General Pinochet to know that I consider him a friend with whom I would like to talk."

Dark, chunky and 50 years-of-age, Garcia Meza, chief of the Bolivian hard-line ranks, had more than enough reasons to be happy: that afternoon infantry soldiers supported by tanks were silencing the last centers of resistance to the coup in the tin mine region in the southeast part of the country. The movement, which Garcia Meza led, also bloody and inhuman, although to a lesser degree than that of Pinochet in Chile in 1973, was consolidated. A new order was installed in the country. Bolivia, after a brief period of redemocratization, once more joined the list of dictatorships in the southern cone at the side of Argentina, Paraguay, Chile and Uruguay.

Without Shoes

Similarities with Chile--a country with which ironically Bolivia does not have diplomatic relations because of border problems--were not limited only to the visceral anticommunism flaunted by the new president. Despite indications pointing to an Argentine influence in the coup on 17 July, as it was whispered in official corridors in Washington, part of his technique appeared in fact to be inspired by the Chilean military. Political prisoners--nearly 700 of them by the end of last week--for example, were mainly sent to a soccer stadium near La Paz, similar to the use made by the Chilean military of the Santiago National Stadium.

In addition to the rhetoric of Pinochet, repeated word for word by Garcia Meza, the Bolivian coup also imitated Chilean rapidity and efficiency, consolidating the new government in only one week at at cost of hundreds of lives. Opposition by the Siglo XX miners of Catavi, the largest tin mines in the country, lasted very little. Initiated on the same day as the coup, that resistance gained impetus last week, spreading to various cities in the interior of the country where miners and peasants blocked roads and faced the soldiers and tanks with sticks, stones and shotguns.

However, the movement ceased completely on Thursday after Juan Lechin Oquendo, president of the Bolivian Labor Federation (COB), who was arrested during the first hour of the coup, was forced to appear on television at the side of Minister of Interior Luis Arce Gomez and urge the workers to halt their general strike "to prevent further bloodshed." Lechin, affably called "don Juanito" on television, was given up for dead by his son, who at the time of the coup was in Paris. In a touch of grisly humor, the military men who arrested him asked him jokingly whether he wanted "his cadaver" shipped to Paris. Even here, Bolivia, in tragic irony, evoked the memory of the Chile of 1973 when the former army commander under the government of Salvador Allende, Gen Carlos Pratt, was also forced to appear before the TV cameras to recommend that the population not resist.

Enriched Lexicon

In certain aspects, however, Bolivians used procedures entirely their own. While he was held at the Miraflores Barracks in La Paz, VEJA special correspondent Alessandro Porro confirmed that the accusations made by the archdiocese of the capital, that the military was using ambulances of Bolivian Social Welfare in the repression of the opponents to the coup, were true. He counted 37 ambulances arriving or departing from the general headquarters, or parked there, and always carrying armed soldiers dressed in civilian clothing, something which is against the most elementary principles of armed conflict.

Whether it had Argentine or Chilean inspiration, the fact is that the movement by General Garcia Meza last week had not yet managed to give a satisfactory explanation as to what the military means to do with the country in the end. After already enriching the coupist lexicon by saying that he was closing down Congress because he considered its operation "unconstitutional," the new president poured out over the amazed Bolivians an extravagant, wordy government plan baptized as "original democracy" from which emerged incomprehensible concepts such as that of "military socialism."

By the end of last week no country had as yet recognized the new Bolivian Government. On the contrary, demonstrations of rejection of the coup took place abroad, led by the United States, which decided to apply its harshest sanction other than that of completely severing diplomatic relations. Speaking on American television, Secretary of State Edmund Muskie personally announced a volley of reprisals against Bolivia: diplomatic personnel--120 persons counting the ambassador--will be "substantially reduced," the eight members of the military mission withdrawn and the 10 Bolivian military personnel who are studying in the United States or in Panama will be returned home. Moreover, Muskie announced the "suspension of any and all economic and military aid to Bolivia." Muskie later told VEJA correspondent in Washington Roberto Garcia: "The U.S. objective is to isolate Bolivia diplomatically in the expectation that the military will return power to civilians."

Argentine Accent

The value of such reprisals in the world of today is, as is known, largely symbolic. In view are the largely negative results of all the boycotts, embargoes and political censures of recent years. Bolivia should not be frightened either by the decision of the traditionally decorative OAS, which Friday in a decision unprecedented in its history censured the coup by a vote of 16 to only three. Brazil, Argentina, Uruguay and Guatemala helped the new regime by abstaining. Only Chile, Paraguay, and Bolivia itself, voted in favor of Bolivia. Argentina, even though it did not vote in this bloc, was considered as a country openly in favor of the new order. American "Bolivian expert" Herbert Klein, University of Colombia history professor, for example, has that opinion. Speaking in New York to Selma Santa Cruz of VEJA, Klein was trenchant: "It is obvious that the Argentines are involved in some way; not in the preparation or help in the coupt but as an element with whom the masterminds of the coup identify and to whom they are certainly going to appeal in case they need help in the future. It is also obvious that the Bolivian military are not pro-Brazilians."

First Steps

Also with respect to possible Argentina involvement, the country which most expressed itself in that respect was the United States again. The Washington Government maintained contacts with Buenos Aires all last week, not only to seek information on the possible role of the Argentine government or paramilitary groups in the coup, but also to discourage any specific helpful gesture in favor of the regime installed in Bolivia.

At the end of the week, the domestic situation in Bolivia returned little by little to normalcy--with radio and television censored, unions shut down, political parties banned and foreign embassies crowded with politicians and newsmen. The "original democracy" of Garcia Meza was taking its first steps. It was believed unlikely, however, that it would manage to survive the promised 20 years in power. The record for staying in Palacio Quemado is held by Hugo Banzer with 7 years. There are no special reasons to suppose that Meza will not in time have to face the presidential ambitions of his colleagues.

MAGAZINE LINKS COCAINE TRAFFICKERS WITH JUNTA

Sao Paulo VEJA in Portuguese 13 Aug 80 p 36

[Text] At first the accusation that Gen Luis Garcia Meza, president of Bolivia since the military coup of last 17 July, was involved in narcotics traffic seemed somewhat exaggerated. After all, the accusation originated with Hernan Siles Suazo, the winner of the presidential elections of last June and, therefore, the politician most directly affected by the coup--naturally other than those killed or those who are in prison. A torrent of accusations of the same type, meanwhile, would come to show that Siles Suazo, since last week the leader of a picturesque "Clandestine Bolivian Government," may not be far from the truth.

The stories telling of the coup-drug connection in La Paz have increased to such a point that today in Bolivia there are those who call the "Putsch" by Garcia Meza a "cocaine coup." According to many, not only are the majority of the military involved in narcotics traffic but the coup itself was brought about to protect the interests of the powerful network of cocaine traffickers in Bolivia. In other words, the coup was carried out less to prevent the Bolivian Left from seizing power--as Garcia Meza bawled out on the day of his inauguration in the standard pretext about "international communist"--than to prevent Siles Suazo, once in power, from upsetting the applecart of the profitable operation of the traffickers, who in recent years have made of Bolivia one of the largest cocaine factories in the world.

The Role of Bolivia

The illegal trade in cocaine yields no less than $500 million per year to a few Bolivians; more than tin, the main export product of the country and of which Bolivia is the second-ranking producer in the world. Operations are based primarily in Santa Cruz de la Sierra, the headquarters of the military and civilian groups which supported the Garcia Meza coup. The largest part of information on this business is found recorded in the Department of State in Washington, where in recent years a significant study of the role of Bolivia in the international cocaine connection has been made. It is a role which has only grown. The Department of State discovered, for example, that the Bolivian connection became the main supplier for American addicts: from 40 to 60 percent of the nearly 30 tons of the drug which entered the United States last year came from Bolivia.

Moreover, since the July coup, American officials have been noting that a larger and larger number of Bolivians involved in cocaine traffic are today in important positions in the new government. The most mentioned name on that list is that of Col Luis Arce Gomez, minister of interior of the new government and former chief of the powerful Army Intelligence Service up to the time of the July military coup. Arce, during the time he headed that service, made efforts to torpedo the government antidrug machinery. Moreover, he had in recent years changed from a simple stooge of the traffickers to a chief of one of the many gangs of traffickers in action in the country himself. Arce, of course, is particularly sensitive when there is talk of cocaine. Last week he ordered the jailing of American correspondent Mary Helen Spooner of the FINANCIAL TIMES. The reason: she had written an article about the involvement of Arce in the traffic.

In Customs

The second person placed on the list of those involved is the new minister of education--ironically an air force colonel named Ariel Coca--involved in a shipment of 100 kilos of cocaine seized last year in Panama. And there are still other cases such as that of Col Otto Lopez, army commander in the Tarija Region, who is considered the main saboteur of previous government efforts to contain drug traffic in the area.

That is not all. There are also indications that known smugglers and traffickers are participating in operations of kidnaping political figures of the left or even members of the interim government of Lidia Gueiler, who was deposed by Garcia Meza. There is another case, for example, that of Fernando Monroy, known gangster of Santa Cruz de la Sierra. Monroy was seen in action in the attack on Palacio Quemado, the home of the Bolivian presidency, when paramilitary commandos arrested President Gueiler and a handful of ministers.

Another revealing sign of the coup-cocaine connection detected in Washington was the extreme rapidity with which traffickers or their stooges went to occupy key positions in those government sectors precisely responsible for controlling drug traffic. Jose Abraham Baptista, for example, a Santa Cruz trafficker, is considered one of the main financial backers of the Garcia Meza coup. He obtained what is probably the first prize in this race for decisive posts. No less than two relatives of his were appointed to positions of authority in Bolivian customs.

PROJECTED INCREASE IN GAS RESERVES VIEWED WITH OPTIMISM

[Text] The progress of initial work on the undertaking of quantitatively determining the nation's natural gas reserves is entirely satisfactory and is being accomplished according to the time schedule established in advance. This was announced yesterday by Col Oscar Villa Urioste, general manager, Bolivian Government Petroleum Deposits.

The undertaking, whose results are considered to be a priority matter in planning the activities of YPFB [Bolivian Government Oil Deposits] for the next 5-year term and the definition of the nation's future energy policy, will be completed by the end of 1981, as he said in his interview with PRESENCIA.

He explained that a recent meeting of YPFB managers and technical officials assigned priority to this project which is getting financing from the Inter-American Development Bank, the World Bank, and the government petroleum agency itself. Each of the international financial institutions will contribute $16 billion; YPFB will provide the rest which comes to approximately $8 million.

Villa expressed his optimism regarding the possibility that the project might yield positive results, confirming the preliminary prospecting done earlier. These studies have set the country's gas reserves at approximately 5.7 billion cubic feet, a volume which, in the opinion of national authorities, is sufficient to cover future demand on the domestic market, with a large surplus that could be exported to the Republic of Brazil.

The YPFB manager said that, if these forecasts come true, the export of gas to Brazil could begin between 1986 and 1987. Before that, it will be necessary to complete negotiations with Brazil and build the gas pipeline.

Recently, the president himself, Gen Luis Garcia Meza, came out in favor of finalizing the sale of gas to Brazil as soon as possible. This statement produced an official comment in Brazil, repeating the opinion to the effect that future exports depend on the results of the undertaking to determine the quantity of gas reserves.

The end of the quantitative determination project is completely assured because agreements have been signed with the loan institutions and because the first loan disbursements have already been made. Regarding this matter, Villa said that no difficulties arose and no future obstacles are anticipated.

Project implementation has already gone beyond the preliminary administrative phase. Initial field work was started a few days ago.

The project consists in the seismic prospecting of 1,600 linear kilometers in the region of Boomerang, in the northern part of the Department of Santa Cruz. The seismic prospecting lines will be plotted in the zones of Santa Rosa, Yapacani, Palometas, and Enconada.

Plans also call for the drilling of 12 wells in that region and two wells in Vuelta Grande, in the southern part of the Department of Chuquisaca.

A secondary petroleum recovery plant will be set up, with the same financing, as a parallel project component, in the town of Monteagudo, in Chuquisaca.

The preliminary agreements worked out with Brazil provide that Bolivia will sell Brazil approximately 400 million cubic feet of gas per day, that is to say, almost double what is currently being exported to the Republic of Argentina.

Gas Reserves. The map, prepared by technical agencies of the YPFB, shows places where field work is being done as part of the natural gas reserve quantity determination project. The project will be completed at the end of 1981, according to the official timetable.

NEW TRACTOR FACTORY OPENS IN SANTA CRUZ

La Paz PRESENCIA in Spanish 29 Aug 80 p 1

[Text] The Prointercont industrial consortium has established an articulated tractor factory in Santa Cruz, for the domestic market and for export, as was announced yesterday at a press conference.

Moises Ponce de Leon, vice president of the National Automotive Commission, My, introduced the representatives of the above-mentioned industrial consortium who allocated $3 million for the tractor production plant's establishment.

Ponce de Leon praised the entrepreneurial vision of the industrial group and pointed out that tractor production will be based on domestic technology, with the advice of foreign experts.

Tractor production will involve sales under the brand name ARBOTZ, with four models for agricultural work, highways, forestry, and land clearing.

Dr Oscar Ramirez, a representative of Prointercont, explained that the production of tractors here at home does not imply the payment of technology transfer nor for patents, because "a domestic technology has been developed through the use of material produced in the country."

He said that a tractor produced at Santa Cruz consists of 35 percent domestically produced parts. Only the moving train, the gearbox, the axles, and the tires will be imported because they are presently not being produced domestically.

He indicated that the tractors are equipped with four-wheel drive but there are models which have eight wheels. The engine power will range between 120 and 360 horsepower and prices will vary between $30,000 and $40,000, each.

Ramirez said that the tractor presents the special feature of being "articulated," that is to say, it can bend around the center and it can therefore operate without any problems in areas where there are no roads.

The first models of these tractors were sold in Alto Beni, Santa Cruz, and Beni, where they are being used without any trouble and with free technical assistance provided by the factory. The plant has an annual production capacity of 350 tractors.

The tractor plant employes more than 50 persons, including skilled technicians, workers, and specialized foreign personnel.

Opening and Investments

The representative from the Prointercont consortium said that the industrial plant will be officially opened tomorrow, Saturday, during a ceremony to be attended by the president of the republic, Gen Luis Garcia Meza and Industry and Commerce Minister Col Mario Guzman Moreno.

On that occasion, consortium president Tomas Tuman will reveal details on the prospects of this plant in Santa Cruz, especially regarding the development of agriculture.

GOVERNMENT MODIFYING SHIPBUILDING POLICY

Sao Paulo O ESTADO DE SAO PAULO in Portuguese 19 Aug 80 p 27

[Text] Brasilia--The import cargo surtax intended for the rehabilitation of the merchant marine will be increased from 10 to 30 percent, and 77 percent of the receipts will go into the Merchant Marine Fund (FMM) to finance shipbuilding and the remainder will go to the shipowners. In addition, the contingency fund premium granted to the shipyards to cover the difference between the domestic cost of the ship and the world price will be abolished.

Those are the main modifications in the new Brazilian shipbuilding policy that will be in effect for future ship contracts, according to the provisions of the decree-law signed yesterday by President Joao Figueiredo. The new measures were announced in Planalto Palace by Transportation Minister Eliseu Resende to representatives of shipbuilding unions and shipowners.

At the present time, 65 percent of the Cargo Surtax for the Rehabilitation of the Merchant Marine (AFRMM) goes to the FMM and 35 percent goes to the shipowners. According to the minister, the modifications in the percentages of division of receipts generated by the surtax were adopted so that the additional surtax generated by imports will all be channeled into the FMM without detriment to the amount of subsidies currently granted to the shipowner, who will receive the same gross sum as from the previous system.

With regard to elimination of the merchant marine premium, Eliseu Resende asserted that the measure does not change the situation of the shipyards. He explained that the difference between the domestic cost of the ship and the world price, paid by the federal government today out of contingency funds, will be paid by the ship builder, according to the following system: 10 percent during construction with its own revenues and 20 percent later with AFRMM funds generated by the chartered ship that replaces the one ordered during the construction of the new ship, and the first contributions generated by that ship. Previously, the shipowner only paid 10 percent of the domestic building cost during the construction phase and could use the AFRMM for this.

Special Cases

However, in the case of special ships (container ships, petrochemical ships and "roll-on/roll-off" ships, the new policy maintains the contingency fund premium. Similarly, a premium is provided in case the revenue generated by the AFRMM is not enough for expenses. According to Eliseu Resende, the purpose of this provision is simply to provide a guarantee for possible cases, especially in the construction of ships for coastwise and river navigation, to which the AFRMM increase would not apply, being maintained at the 20 percent level.

According to the new policy, the cargo transported in small ships (of up to 500 tons) operated separately or grouped into convoys, will be exempt from the freight surtax; the transportation of newsprint and paper for the publication of books and printing of periodicals will also be exempt provided that there is no similar national product.

The percentage of the AFRMM generated by coastwise and river shipping, when intended for the state shipowner, will remain at 35 percent but when intended for the private shipowner, will increase to 50 percent. Resende declared that the government, thereby, seeks to encourage that type of transportation, particularly in moving general cargo and coal.

Imports Increase

The remaining 70 percent of the domestic cost of shipbuilding, which is equivalent to the world price of the ship will be financed by the National Merchant Superintendency (SUNAMAM), using the FMM. Previously, this financing was made in 15 years. With the new policy, the National Monetary Council will have the responsibility of issuing regulations for the financing.

With the increase of the AFRMM, the minister admitted that there will be an increase in the prices of imported products, especially oil, which figures most prominently in the schedule of Brazilian imports and will increase in price by 0.6 percent. Resende announced also that the increase of the AFRMM and of the FMM's share in its revenue will provide funds in the order of 10 billion cruzeiros per year for SUNAMAM.

GUERREIRO SPEAKS ON DOMESTIC, FOREIGN EVENTS

Sao Paulo O ESTADO DE SAO PAULO in Portuguese 6 Sep 80 p 5

[Text] Minister of Foreign Affairs Saraiva Guerreiro, in a talk to students of the Superior War School in Rio, commented that "the establishment of pluralism and democracy" in Brazil "strengthens international trust and credibility of the country."

After saying that areas of international tension have increased recently, Guerreiro blamed that process on the behavior of states which "most shape the international situation, inhibited as they are by laws limiting their power or by immediate and sectoral interests."

Listing the recently developed trouble areas, the minister mentioned the "invasion of Afghanistan, with a violation of the principle of nonintervention, clearly condemned by the UN General Assembly," an episode which raised the "temperature of the East-West confrontation, an impasse which persists today."

The internal disputes of the Atlantic Alliance, the renovation of disputes on armaments, "particularly nuclear" and the creation of "new and fearful levels in the balance of terror in Europe," were another two episodes listed by Saraiva Guerreiro. He also listed the "difficulties of the political transformation in the Caribbean and Central America and the difficulties faced in the democratization of countries of South America" in addition to the "persistence of the impasse in the North-South dialog."

Basis for Analysis

Guerreiro emphasized that he listed all those events so as to take them as the "basis for a structure of international coexistence" and in it place the position of the Brazilian foreign policy. "In the first place, coexistence is based, or should be based, within a framework of rules which minimally guarantee the security and integrity of each state, the main pillar being that of nonintervention."

In his opinion, within the reality of the system of power and the need to reformulate international coexistence, "It would be a bad response to believe that the more power one has the more one can shape the international system." The country would be gaining the status of a power and would begin to act as such. That response is bad because it is based on three false premises. In the first place, reform of the system by means of power would not be a true reform but it would be a new level with new actors among whom we would be included; we would be chosen. That is not what we want."

The increase in tensions in the Middle East was attributed by Guerreiro on the frustration of the peace sponsored by the United States between Egypt and Israel. "Broader alternatives for peace in the region with the actual participation of interested parties are relegated to a dangerous second plane," he commented. The conflicts in Southeast Asia were also mentioned by the minister "a situation which remains without any prospect of solution."

The peaceful transition of Zimbabwe by means of a process of negotiations "does not resolve the problems of southern Africa, according to Guerreiro because that solution "is not automatically transferred to Namibia nor much less to South Africa, the only country in the world in which a policy of racial discrimination remains institutionalized."

Another point mentioned was the "upswing in terrorism in Europe, while the death of Yugoslav President Josip Broz Tito, in the opinion of the minister "Leaves a void and a question in East Europe and it could aggravate the Nonalined Countries Movement."

He continued: "In the second place, we are not thinking of copying or repeating the path of present-day powers, which would be against Brazilian foreign policy and against the logic of the contemporary international system itself. To live or attempt to live as a power means the adoption of hegemonic behaviors and the use of methods we condemn. In the third place, we did not receive, nor do we pretend to have, any imperial mandate or mantle; Brazil did not replace anyone on the international level. Brazil practices its own policy."

He then pointed out that it would be "similarly useless to imagine, disregarding reality, that Brazil has ceased to be a developing country or one which is about to become one. There was and there has been progress thanks to our own efforts, however, we continue to face regional and social inequalities in our country. Brazil should not allow itself to be deceived by titles such as "a country in advanced development," whose objective is simply that of separating us from the other countries of the south and thus deny us the benefits of international cooperation."

"Create Filters"

Emphasizing the Brazilian status as a country "affected in various degrees by the international system," Guerreiro recalled the structural problem represented by dependence on petroleum, technology and capital imports and said: "Our concern is to create filters so that the influences received will be those we want to receive as a nation. The expansion of Brazilian international presence is made necessary for its own national development but it shall not be expanded in terms of power. Our foreign presence must be strictly compatible with the policy we adopt. If we do not believe in solutions of power, we should not use them and we should condemn them."

He also commented on the limitations of Brazilian possibilities in modifying the historical roots of the present system, but explained: "That circumstance should not frighten us or lead us to shutting ourselves in or an isolationism. On the contrary, our international position invites intensive participation, without preconditions, in the business of the world. Because we depend on the system, we must live in it fully in all its dimensions with universality and dignity, as was well-stated by President Joao Figueiredo.

"Looking at the overall events of these past 12 months," Saraiva Guerreiro pointed out, "would show that Latin America was the priority area for Brazilian diplomatic activity. The most important facet of our rapprochement is our identity as a South American country. An effort in the direction of unity has already begun. The trips by President Figueiredo are part of the search for, and the finding of new paths. His visits to Venezuela, Paraguay and Argentina; the visits by the presidents of Peru, Mexico and Argentina, are events which coherently make up the framework of our relationships."

"Proposal of Equality"

With respect to Africa, another priority area for Brazilian foreign policy, the minister revealed: "On my trip to Africa, we were understood to be bearers of a proposal of equality and solidarity and that we did not want anything except the establishment of those countries and their prosperity; we were seen as someone who understands the drama of the anticolonialist struggle, as someone who rejects the transformation of African countries into an area of dispute among the powers."

He declared: "Relationships with the United States are developing frankly, equally and without inhibitions between parties. Relations with developed western countries, with whom we share basic values, have taken place on a bilateral plane and with the most perfect cordiality. In January President Figueiredo will visit France, continuing our broad contacts with Europeans. Dialog with Japan is increasing and we receive high-level visits from China. We have maintained normal relationships with European socialists and the Soviet Union, primarily based on trade exchanges.

"I believe that our activities will incorporate the best of our diplomatic tradition and will be the best bridge between the services of Itamaraty and the plans for economic development and the implantation of a full democracy. Our inclination is toward full coexistence and contribution so that such coexistence may be structured in such a way that tensions will lessen and the extreme disparities of wealth among nations will decrease," concluded the minister of foreign affairs.

GENERALS SPEAK ON RADICALS, DEMOCRACY, ARMED FORCES UNITY

Bandeira Scores Radical Activities

Sao Paulo O ESTADO DE SAO PAULO in Portuguese 2 Sep 80 p 5

[Text] Speaking at the beginning of "National Week" in Porto Alegre, the commanding general of the Third Army, Antonio Bandeira, said: "The people must trust more and more in the willingness and the determination of His Excellency the President of the Republic, Gen Joao Baptista de Oliveira Figueiredo to make of the country a true democracy at a time when unsatisfied radical minorities are seeking, through sordid processes, to compromise the advanced phase of a democratic opening, embarking on a crusade and creating innocent victims."

Gen Antonio Bandeira added: "In this hour of remembrance in which we civically revere the events and men who made Brazil independent, we also think of the way of reinvigorating our faith in the future of this young nation, which grows stronger day by day, so that we may not waste the sacrifice of our forefathers or lose respect for our tradition of a free and sovereign people, who because of their nature chose a democratic system so as to develop and live in it."

In his speech the commander reminded us: "Years passed and our independence was consolidated. We were an empire until the proclamation of the republic; we abolished slavery and we participated prominently in two world wars. Throughout time, these historic facts have revealed the democratic inclination and love of freedom of the people of this land." He added: "It was the people who took to the streets in 1945 and 1946, first to demand from the government of the time to repell the Nazi aggression made against Brazil in our territory and, subsequently, asked the armed forces to take a position against the communist threat which hung over our heads."

The statement was made at zero hours yesterday at a ceremony attended by the governor of Rio Grande Do Sul, Amaral de Souza, and other authorities of the state. Yesterday morning, during a ceremony commemorating the 24th anniversary of the Third Army, Gen Antonio Bandeira issued the order of the day on the subject, saying: "Since the first days of its creation, and because of the courage of its formative units who came here to lay the foundations of the present reality, the Third Army understood and undertook, with blameless behavior, its sacred patriotic mission, integrating itself perfectly with the local population and determinedly maintaining the spirit of order and justice which made possible the productive and useful work of this region. This won for it the sympathy, recognition and admiration of those who here toil for the progress and happiness of the nation."

He added: With this hard, devoted and many times unrecognized work of the military, with difficulties faced and overcome, with a military spirit reigning among the officers and men, with the responsibility for the performance of duty and the camaraderie among the commanders and the commanded, the Third Army sought and consolidated an identity of objectives, which today becomes the highest moral standard of all its members and the operational efficiency of all its units for the benefit of a cohesive Brazilian Army of high moral and professional standards, always capable of accomplishing its honorable constitutional missions well even against the most insidious attempts at subversion which unceasingly attack the legitimate yearnings of the Brazilian nation."

Newsmen Challenged to Publish Photographs

General Bandeira also challenged newsman Helio Fernandez to publish any photographs he may have, showing tortures practiced by the military in Recife, in his newspaper.

In an interview with newsmen accredited to his office, the general said that previously (in its edition of 10 April this year) TRIBUNA DA IMPRESA had already published that on that day he would be in Brasilia delivering a report to the minister of the army requesting federal intervention in all Brazilian states, at a time when he was "in Sao Gabriel presiding over the ceremonies celebrating Engineer's Day, therefore, being completely unaware of such a report, which surely must have been born in his imagination.

"Now he comes here accusing me of the practice of torturing political prisoners in Recife, particularly former Deputy Gregorio Bezerra, saying he has frightening pictures of such procedures." He continued: "The accusation is a complete lie; this can be proved by reading the memoirs of the former deputy or even by his statement, because Gregorio Bezerra is alive and in the country." On the other hand, the general did not wish to comment on the statement by Deputy Genival Tourinho that he is unwilling to relinquish his congressional immunity before the legal suit Bandeira has brought before judicial authorities that he prove the accusations that Bandeira participated in the so-called "Operation Crystal," responsible for the most recent attacks. Bandeir limited himself to saying: "I read the Saturday newspapers but I have nothing more to say because I have turned the case over to the legal authorities and only they have the right to decide."

General Denies Threat

Sao Paulo O ESTADO DE SAO PAULO in Portuguese 28 Aug 80 p 16

[Text] Gen Jose Luiz Coelho Neto, commanding the 4th Army Division with headquarters in Belo Horizonte, who was recently accused by Deputy Genival Tourinho of involvement in recent terrorist activities, said yesterday that "No one threatens the government of President Figueiredo," discarding the hypothesis that the recent attacks are an attempt to destabilize the present government and prevent redemocratization of the country.

In an interview with O ESTADO, General Coelho Neto explained that "no one threatens the Figueiredo government because it is on the right path, on the path of the Revolution, which is that of reestablishing democracy."

In that endeavor, he averred, "The president of the republic has the support of the armed forces: the Army, Navy, Air Force and the political forces."

The military chief lamented the events which took place in Rio yesterday. Asked about the charges repeated the day before yesterday by Deputy Genival Tourinho of the PDT [Democratic Workers Party] of Minas Gerais (who accused him of being behind terrorist actions together with 3rd Army Commander Antonio Bandeira de Mello and 2nd Army Commander Milton Tavares, he declared: "I do not know that citizen. I accept neither confrontation nor provocation and I will not speak on the subject because that is also another way of seeking to create a disturbance. At this time we need tranquility so that we may work."

Questioned as to the origins of the attacks, Coelho Neto said that he "frankly" had no information, saying that "to continue to belabor the point is counterproductive."

The 4th Army commander also refuted comments that the government was not able to find the guilty parties because it had run into obstacles placed before it by members of the government itself: "If there were such persons, the government has the means and the power to prevent being hindered by them; this is attributing superman powers to those persons and, therefore, I do not believe in that hypothesis."

In Sao Paulo, advisers to Gen Milton Tavares met with newsmen seeking out the 2d Army Commander to learn his opinions on the recent terrorist actions. They repeated a phrase used by the general himself Monday: "Who benefits from the crime? Certainly not the government or the Army."

According to colonels of the 2d Army Staff, the position of Milton Tavares is the same as the one stated on Soldiers Day when he granted an extensive interview, reaffirming: "Any act of terrorism, whether from the left or right, is vehemently censurable because it is the same thing."

General Guarantees Unity

Sao Paulo O ESTADO DE SAO PAULO in Portuguese 3 Sep 80 p 5

[Text] Transferring command of the 3rd Army Division yesterday in Santa Maria, Rio Grande do Sul, Gen Mario de Mello Mottos made a farewell speech of a political nature in which he guarantees that there is complete unity of the armed forces.

"At this time in history in which we live, in which the armed forces, and therefore our army, have the enormous responsibility of guaranteeing the social peace required for the effort being made by the government with the high objective of improving the democratic system; at this time in which some ill-intentioned people have the naivete to believe they are capable of dividing us so that they may achieve their sinister objectives; at this moment in which others, insensible and ambitious, feign naivete and pretend they do not see what really threatens the nation; at this moment it is necessary that it be said very clearly that nothing or no one will ever manage to undermine the solid pillars of our army and within it those of our division; at this moment I address one last message to the men who have their mind impervious to adverse, insidious propaganda; at this moment I address a final word to them: unity."

This was the fifth speech of a clearly political nature made by the 3rd Army general between Friday and yesterday. General Mello Mattos turned over command to Gen Josa Sebastiao Ramos de Castro in a ceremony attended by 3rd Army Commander Gen Antonio Bandeira and the 5th Comar [expansion unknown] Brig Gen Portilho Antony.

PCB HEAD VIEWS LEGALIZATION, ARMED STRUGGLE, POLISH STRIKES

Sao Paulo O ESTADO DE SAO PAULO in Portuguese 23 Aug 80 p 5

[Interview with Giocondo Dias, secretary general of the Brazilian Communist Party (PCB); in Rio, date not given]

[Text] Giocondo Dias, secretary general of the PCB, 67 years old, lives modestly in Botafogo. He has been an activist since his youth and is a tradesman. He was sarcastic about the current Polish situation, believing that the Brazilian press, radio and television should devote the same attention given to the strikes in Poland as they do to those by our workers. He denied that there was any similarity between the demonstrations in Poland and the revolts that occurred in Hungary and Czechoslovakia.

According to him, the possibility of armed struggle is never the choice of the working class; it is imposed by the ruling class. In all countries where it achieved power, the peaceful course was not possible because of the resistance of the ruling class. "It is the ruling class that always prefers violence."

[Answer] In the first place, it will not be the PCB that will achive power in Brazil but the working class. Naturally, if it achieves power via the peaceful road, it will be better for it and all the other classes. The possibility of the armed course is not chosen by the working class. It is imposed by the ruling class. Everything depends on the correlation of forces. Now, I have no doubt that the working class prefers a peaceful solution. If we consult any worker, he is not going to perfer that. Civil war and insurrection are imposed by the ruling class. The ruling class always prefers violence. Naturally, it creates such obstacles that in order to overcome them, the oppressed class sometimes has to use violence. But that does not mean that the workers are advocates of violence. On the contrary, they really want the peaceful road. And that is the position of the party.

[Question] Of all the current party programs, is there any that is closer to the PCB line?

[Answer] It is not a matter of affinity. I feel that all, because of votes or supporters, all the current parties feel the need to raise reformist banners. Nowadays, no opposition party can fail to talk about the immediate interests of the workers. They talk about subjects that only we talked about for many years. It is not a matter of affinity but of political necessity. They all have to talk about human rights, agrarian reform, the defense of national interests, and freedom; as is the case of the Constituent Assembly banner, which we raised in 1977.

[Question] In that connection, how do you view the Constituent Assembly? Would it resolve Brazil's problem?

[Answer] I do not know but it would undoubtedly be a beginning, with a Constituent Assembly elected by the people and with the participation of all the civic forces in the country. It would really be very good.

[Question] Better with Figueiredo or without him?

[Answer] I prefer to pose the question in other terms: the country needs a Constituent Assembly which must be freely the result of the will of all representative political forces. I am an advocate of a freely elected Constituent Assembly. It does not matter with whom. The government may even take the initiative before the movement matures and convene a Constituent Assembly,producing a constitution that instead of being an advance is a step backward. Furthermore, many newspapers distort my thinking when they say that I am in favor of a Constituent Assembly with Figueiredo. I am in favor of a Constituent Assembly, that's all.

[Question] If the PCB is legalized, what segment would leave the Workers Party (PT) to join the PCB? Would it be possible for the two parties to get along together?

[Answer] Simply the more enlightened segment would leave. As for getting along together, it would be normal. They are two different programs. The PT is not Marxist. Do not the Socialist and Communist parties exist in France? The PT's solution is social democracy; it does not seek to change society. But in any case, it is a party with union leaders.

[Question] How do you view the fact that the workers want to organize in their own party--in this case, the PT--independently of the other leftist organizations? Has the PCB ceased to be the party of the working class?

[Answer] First, the party as an organization has not yet succeeded in reaching the working class to the necessary degree. Second, the working class itself is still deluded, not to mention the fact that the worker prefers to participate in a legal organization rather than in an organization persecuted by the police.

[Question] Does not the recent internal struggle within the party hurt it and does it not affect its legalization?

[Answer] The internal struggle does not harm the party; on the contrary, it helps it because it arouses curiosity and study. What hurts the party is division, factionalism, liquidationism, the absence of principles. As for the differences; they are useful, very necessary. Furthermore, our statutes guarantee those differences as long as there is submission to the decisions of the majority.

[Question] How do you regard the emergence in Brazil in the sixties of movements to the left of the PCB, such as the National Liberation Alliance [or Action] (ALN), the Revolutionary Popular Vanguard (VPR), the Communist Party of Brazil (PC do B), and Marxist-Leninist Popular Action (APML)? The PCB assumed rightist positions after de-Stalinization.

[Answer] The emergence of those organizations is historically normal. In the last century, there were the socialists and the anarchists. Today, with the development of society, it is natural that certain radical sectors of the petit-bourgeoisie may not be satisfied with the organization the working class offers. At the same time, I believe that with the revelation of the Stalinist cult, many people became disillusioned; thus, the proliferation of many leftist groups. As for the position of the PCB, I do not believe it assumed a rightist position. And the ultraleftist groups, especially in their forms of struggle, did not reflect the yearnings of the working class but rather those of the middle class, the part that was disillusioned over the delay of the revolution, because we were even promising that that revolution was going to happen the next day, forgetting that the revolution process may be a long one. At the same time, the normal Brazilian tendency to copy foreign experiences, such as the Cuba one, was greatly intensified. They are the transplants, the mechanical analogies. Basically, those movements taught us what should not be done. Such as the one of 1935; it was premature. It showed that the barracks alone is not enough. It has to complement the mass movement.

The Strike in Poland Is Not Ideological

[Question] With regard to the strikes in Poland, without intervention by USSR: Does that mean a change of Soviet attitude after the experiences of Hungary and Czechoslovakia?

[Answer] From what I know, thus far there has not been any repression. Although it is an unusual fact in socialist countries, it is necessary to take into account that 80 percent of the Polish economy is still private besides the fact that Poland is practically Catholic. On the other hand, there must have been mistakes. With regard to the Soviet Union, I believe that it does not have anything to do with that. And what is happening has nothing to do with the revolutions against the regimes that occurred in Hungary and Czechoslovakia. The governments of those countries asked for help against movements that sought to overthrow the regime. In Poland, it is a matter of a strike. And I believe that the Polish Government is already negotiating. Thus far, the movement does not seem to me to be antisocialist. What I ask is that the mass media give the same prominence here in Brazil to the strikes of our workers, the same space.

[Question] How does the PCB view a revolution with a religious base, such as that of Iran?

[Answer] The fact is that the Iranian people liberated themselves from imperialist tyranny. What will come of that will depend on the organization. The shah was an instrument of the United States; Iran was always at the service of imperialism. You can say what you want about the ayatollahs, but the fact is that they are at the service of Iranian interests. They may make mistakes, but they are succeeding in getting things on the right track.

[Question] And the invasion of Afghanistan?

[Answer] I believe that for a long time the government of Afghanistan had been asking for the intervention of the Soviet Union to help it in relation to Great Britain and the United States. It was help to the people of that country.

[Question] And who asked for that help?

[Answer] The head of the government of that country.

[Question] But was he not deposed by the Russians?

[Answer] The Soviet Union intervened to help the Afghan people.

[Question] How do you interpret the fact that the communist parties have acheived power only through popular revolution (the case of 1917 and of the Chinese revolution) or by war (case of Eastern Europe) and never through elections? And when that occurred by elections, as in Chile, why are they unable to maintain power?

[Answer] First, the following: it was not achieved by peaceful means because it was not possible. The resistance of the ruling classes was of such an order that there was no other solution. I do not believe that in certain countries in Europe, the communist party achieved power because of the war; it was a consequence of the war. That was the case of Czechoslovakia. Everything occurred there in a peaceful manner, the result of a mass movement. This does not mean that there was no violence. The country went from a bourgeois democratic republic to a socialist people's republic through the imposition of the mass movement. Naturally, perhaps that would not have happened before the war. As for Chile, I do not believe that the party had achieved power there. It only participated in a share of power; it did not assume any power. There was no change at all in Chile; bureaucracy remained the same, the armed forces also. Executive power rested with the president of the republic. The party participated in the legislative branch but the majority of the congress was Christian Democratic.

[Question] How do you interpret the fact that dissident politicians in the Soviet Union are interned in psychiatric hospitals. Did the czarist police not do the same thing?

[Answer] I do not know if the czarist police did that. So, I cannot say if that occurs in the Soviet Union.

[Question] What about Solzhenitsyn's charges?

[Answer] He was a great personality in Russia and today everybody admits that he is quite reactionary. Nobody wants to have anything more to do with him, not even the reactionaries. On the other hand, there are dissidents everywhere and there are many people there with a capitalist mentality. Why deny that. As for the hospitals, granting that they do exist, I cannot make a categorical statement because I do not know Soviet society intimately. It is much better than getting rid of and murdering people. Sometimes, it is even a more humane treatment. At least, I do now know about anybody who has been murdered.

DOMESTIC PUBLIC DEBT REACHED 599 BILLION CRUZEIROS IN JULY

[Text] Brasilia--The Central Bank reported yesterday that the domestic public debt reached a balance of 599.73 billion cruzeiros by the end of July, an increase of 15 percent over the figure accumulated by December 1979. By raising the yield of National Treasury Notes (LTN), the Central Bank succeeded in reducing its portfolio of federal bonds to 84.21 billion cruzeiros in July, compared to 123.85 billion cruzeiros at the end of last year.

Last month, with the recovery of about $600 million from the exchange reserves, the Central Bank increased its efforts to sell National Treasury Readjustable Notes and Obligations (LTN and ORTN) in order to compensate for the renewed pressure of exchange accounts of 51.9 billion cruzeiros, in July alone, on the monetary base--the primary currency issue. For that reason, the net sales of the LTN and ORTN amounted to 31.6 billion cruzeiros for the first 7 months of the year.

The voluntary and compulsory deposits in foreign currency amounted to 448.09 billion cruzeiros at the end of July, compared to a balance of 351.73 billion cruzeiros. According to the Central Bank, expansion of deposits in foreign exchange caused a contracting impact of 117.2 billion on the monetary base from January to last July. The return of reimbursable deposits on foreign tourism, imports and fuel oil made before the "December package" totaling 49.96 billion cruzeiros for the first 7 months of the year exerted a direct expansionist pressure on the base. In July, the balance of reimbursable receipts dropped to 39.98 billion cruzeiros compared to 88.9 billion cruzeiros in December 1979.

For the first time, the Central Bank included the gold from Serra Pelada in its accounting. According to the Central Bank's accounting evaluation the Serra Pelada deposits, entered under the heading "gold bullion," have already produced 1.24 billion cruzeiros, as of last July, while the gold already incorporated into the exchange reserves totaled 57.05 billion cruzeiros.

MINISTRY OF EDUCATION BUDGET TO DOUBLE IN 1981

Brasilia CORREIO BRAZILIENSE in Portuguese 22 Aug 80 p 8

[Text] The Ministry of Education and Culture [MEC] general budget will be 100.7 billion cruzeiros in 1981, an increase of 102 percent over the amount approved for 1980 (42 billion cruzeiros). The request made by the MEC was for a total of 129 billion cruzeiros.

According to technicians of the Secretariat General of the Ministry [SEG/MEC], denial of the total amount of the request was explained as the suppression of money for personnel cut as a result of a decree which bans contracting of officials until December 1981, while part of the increases in money were for other expenses and costs, the ceiling of the MEC itself rising from 13 billion to 21 billion cruzeiros in the budget.

The amount of 100.7 billion cruzeiros, according to technicians of the SEG/MEC, refers to all the funds the MEC will have in 1981 originating from various sources, added to the appropriations made and operations of credit and resources of the National Treasury. However, this 102-percent increase with respect to 1980, is nothing more, in the opinion of SEG/MEC technicians, than a correction which is even below the inflationary rate admitted by the government. The area for which the most money is targeted in 1981 will, as always, be the area of higher education, keeping in mind that the MEC has direct responsibility over it since it maintains 41 federal educational institutions.

ECONOMIC RELATIONS WITH CANADA DISCUSSED

PY022038 Rio de Janeiro O GLOBO in Portuguese 28 Sep 80 p 5

[Text] Foreign Minister Saraiva Guerreiro believes that Brazil and Canada have many common interests within the framework of bilateral relations. Canada is the seventh most important foreign investor in Brazil, and is a heavy supplier of raw materials, foods, machinery and equipment. Currently Brazil purchases approximately 1 million tons of Canadian wheat per year as well as other products such as airplane engines, sulfur, potassium, aluminium frames and several kinds of paper. Canada will soon cooperate in the field of energy, specifically in the utilization of coal. This latter issue has already resulted in the trip of the chairman of the Brazilian Iron and Steel Corporation (SIDERBRAS) Henrique Brandao Cavalcanti to Ottawa.

According to Saraiva Guerreiro, Canada and Brazil have held similar positions during the lengthy law of the sea negotiations. Despite its conciliatory attitude, Canada advocated control over mineral resources of the sea beds, especially against the organized exploitation of ore-rich nodules, so as not to destabilize the countries which mine for these minerals on the surface. For certain economies such as Canada's, minerals such as nickel, manganese, copper and cobalt are essential.

With regard to the North-South dialog (talks between underdeveloped and industrialized nations), Canada's position does not directly confront the developing nations. Like Australia, Canada exports foods and raw materials as well as iron ore; for this reason it does not assume a clear-cut position within the bloc of rich countries.

According to other itamaraty sources, Foreign Minister Saraiva Guerreiro's visit to Canada has great political significance because it is a preliminary contact for further negotiations. Just recently Canada expanded its diplomatic offensive toward Brazil and has invited Industries and Commerce Minister Camilo Penna and Agriculture Minister Amaury Stabile to pay official visits.

The Canadian diplomats have revealed that there are plans to crown these contacts with President Joao Figueiredo's visit to Ottawa next year. This invitation will be made official during current talks with Saraiva Guerreiro.

By seeking contacts with Latin America in general and Brazil in particular, Canada is implementing a strategy whose goal is to gradually change the fact that its relations are centered on the United States. Approximately 70 percent of Canada's foreign trade is with the United States and before reaching the point of business saturation with Europe and Japan, Canada is looking for new options among those which its diplomats describe as "alternative partners."

During his stay in Canada, Foreign Minister Saraiva Guerreiro will meet the foreign, agriculture, industries and commerce, and finance ministers as well as Prime Minister Pierre Trudeau and representatives of the business sector.

USSR MAY TRANSFER COAL GASIFICATION TECHNOLOGY

Sao Paulo O ESTADO DE SAO PAULO in Portuguese 16 Aug 80 p 23

[Text] Minister of Mines and Energy Cesar Cals revealed yesterday that the Soviet Union may transfer to Brazil the technology for gasification of coal at the mine, in announcing the forthcoming arrival of a mission of Soviet technicians for a series of talks on the process used in that country for about 40 years.

Minister Cals provided that information after participating in a roundtable on coal in the mineral technology center of the Mineral Resource Research Company (CPRM). Industrialist Antonio Ermirio de Moraes, who attended the meeting, said that he had read in a U.S. scientific publication that the USSR had abandoned the system of on-the-site coal gasification over 30 years ago but he was disputed by another businessman who said that 4 years ago in the Soviet Union he had confirmed the use of the system at four coal deposits.

According to the minister of mines and energy, the gasification of coal on the site of the mineral deposit may contribute enormously to reducing processing costs because it will eliminate the transportation of coal to the gasification plants. He asserted that the Soviet technicians will come to Brazil for a series of talks and discussions with private miners, explaining that there is no prior commitment for Brazil to accept the process that will be described.

Cals yesterday also signed contracts for the transfer of the CPRM-owned mines to the private sector. Two mines located in Rio Grande do Sul were transferred to a company to be formed by the National Cement Industry Union; Busato Construction received one mine in Rio Grande do Sul while the Prospera Company gained one mine in Santa Catarina.

CNE TO STUDY PROGRAM FOR MIXING DIESEL, VEGETABLE OILS

Sao Paulo O ESTADO DE SAO PAULO in Portuguese 24 Aug 80 p 45

[Text] Brasilia--At its plenary meeting on Tuesday, the National Energy Commission (CNE) will discuss, among other topics, the development of a program for mixing vegetable oil with diesel oil in a proportion of 30 percent as a means of contributing to the reduction of Brazilian dependence on oil.

The members of the CNE have already been analyzing a study by the Secretariat of Industrial Technology (STI) of the Ministry of Industry and Commerce, containing alternatives for the mixture of vegetable oils with diesel. The STI study stems form the results of field and dynamometric tests carried out with motors, indicating that the consumption level, in cases of a mixture of up to 30 percent, varies between 5 and 28 percent depending on the type of vegetable oil used, and engine power decreases on the average only 15 percent.

For a mixture of up to 30 percent, there is no need for any change to the motors and, according to the STI, that makes it economically feasible. When used to run a diesel-cycle type motor, alcohol results in 60 to 70 percent higher consumption, even when using additives, which indicates that this type of fuel is not recommended for heavy motors, according to the STI.

The heating power of diesel is 10,200 kilocalories per kilogram; of alcohol, a little higher than 6,000 kilocalories, of "dende" palm oil, 9,104 kilocalories, and of peanut oil, 8,844 kilocalories. These figures reinforce the STI's position that the mixture with diesel oil must be made with vegetable oils.

The idea of establishing a program of vegetable oil for fuel purposes, beginning with a mixture with diesel oil, is due to the fact that at the present technological stage, Brazil does not yet have a solution that would justify the simple use of any pure vegetable oil, and their production is still insufficient. As in the case of alcohol, which was first mixed with gasoline until the development of engines that permitted the use of alcohol by itself, the diesel program would begin with mixtures in the proportion of 30 percent.

Among the mixture alternatives that the STI submitted to the National Energy Commission was one that envisages the substitution of 10 percent of the diesel oil used in the country by vegetable oils in mixture by 1985. It is estimated that by 1985, Brazil will be using about 25 billion liters of diesel, therefore, 2.5 billion liters of vegetable oils would be needed.

Unlike gasoline, the consumption of diesel oil is more concentrated in parts of the country where there is more transportation of goods. This being the case, the 30 percent mixture might not occur indiscriminately but merely in predetermined areas, thus reducing the costs of the mixture. By means of that STI alternative, mixing 30 percent of vegetable oils with diesel for consumption in places to be determined, it would be possible by 1985 to substitute the equivalent of 10 percent of the diesel oil used in the country.

The STI believes that despite its good farm yield and high heating power, "dende" palm oil must be considered in long-term planning because the palm tree takes 5 years to reach 70 percent of its maximum productivity and the country does not yet have sufficient seed for a large planting program.

The STI studies indicate that the most feasible short and medium-term alternatives are peanuts and soybean. Peanuts produce two crops per year; in addition, the planting technique is sufficiently well known and there is practically no influence from the world market, as is the case with soybeans.

PETROLEUM PRODUCTION INCREASES SIGNIFICANTLY

Sao Paulo O ESTADO DE SAO PAULO in Portuguese 6 Sep 80 p 23

[Text] August national petroleum production totalled 6,296,000 barrels, an increase of 20 percent over the quantity extracted in August 1979, it was reported yesterday by PETROBRAS [Brazilian Petroleum Corporation]. Average daily production reached 203,110 barrels in August, remaining constant throughout the entire month at a level of more than 200,000 barrels per day, which is the first time this has happened in the history of Brazilian petroleum.

PETROBRAS believes that from now on the trend of domestic petroleum production will be upward. Just the forecasts for the various deposits existing in the Campos Basin will increase production of the area by 90,000 barrels daily by 1982, which will be added to the quantity of 50,000 barrels which are being extracted daily from there.

To accelerate programs of exploration and production, PETROBRAS President Shigeaki Ueki will go to Paris next week where he will negotiate a loan of $150 million with the French Government. Ueki will precede the trip by Minister of Planning Delfim Netto, who will also engage in negotiations with the Giscard d'Estain government for project loans to Brazil.

Smaller Field

The size of the Campos Basin field, in which Rio de Janeiro Submarine Well 110 is located and which provided a flow of 4,000 barrels daily, is smaller than was thought initially by PETROBRAS technicians. Reports from the exploration area of the company say that the first extension well of the field, drilled nearly 1.5 kilometers from the discovery well, was a dry well without any of the conditions for producing petroleum on a commercial basis.

Nevertheless, PETROBRAS decided to drill another well near RJS-110 in the hopes that the new well will once more find the oil-bearing stratum. The region which is the object of interest is nearly 60 kilometers from the coast of Campos and is considered a priority by PETROBRAS. Technicians once more met the same difficulties found in prospecting in the Campos Basin: it is unlikely that the characteristics of a structure will be repeated nearby, which delays the work of outlining the area of discovered deposits.

The intensification of exploration on the continental shelf, despite the lack of success in many wells, results from the importance that the region assumed for increasing national petroleum production. According to figures released by PETROBRAS, production of the offshore fields in August reached 2,828,000 barrels, an increase of 54.8 percent over production in August a year ago. From January to August, Brazilian petroleum production totaled 46,807,000 barrels, an increase of 16 percent over the same period of 1979, when production reached 40,324,000 barrels.

STRESS ON FUEL ALCOHOL PRODUCTION CONTINUES

Alcohol Control Justified

Sao Paulo O ESTADO DE SAO PAULO in Portuguese 6 Sep 80 p 23

[Text] In Sao Paulo yesterday, Minister of Industry and Commerce Camilo Penna justified official control on production, sales, prices and amounts of alcohol in mixture with gasoline, saying that the phase of partial transition from gasoline to alcohol is "an area of turbulence" which must be closely monitored. "We cannot allow gasoline refineries to remain idle nor allow the indiscriminate use of alcohol because we have to guarantee the supply of that fuel for vehicles produced to use it," he added.

He repeated that alcohol is not the final solution for the problem of petroleum and is aimed at meeting the increase in demand for fuel, reducing the vulnerability posed by dependence on foreign sources.

Concern

The charges of excessive water in fuel alcohol made by Minister Camilo Penna, worried the vehicle assembly organizations of the ABC [Industrial Sections of Santo Andre, Sao Bernardo do Campo and Sao Caetano do Sul], who recommend a closer monitoring, not only of the percentages of water, but also of the standardization and purity of the product so that the image of their vehicles, and particularly that of PROALCOOL [National Alcohol Program], will not be damaged.

Excessive water in hydrated alcohol causes malfunctions in engines, premature wear in the exhaust system, increased consumption, makes starting difficult and can even cause the breakdown of some components, according to the automobile plants.

The percentage of water allowed by the National Petroleum Council [CNP] for fuel alcohol is four percent, however, automobiles of the Ford line are adjusted to burn from zero to eight percent water.

General Motors has made some tests with alcohol distributed by ABC gasoline stations and those of Sao Paulo, with results that are not encouraging. "We did not find excessive water but impurities which clog the fuel filter, requiring a change every 2,000 or 3,000 kilometers," according to engineers of the Department of Motors. In Volkswagen engines the tolerance to water in the alcohol is a maximum of four percent, according to a limit established by the CNP. The standardization of fuels was always a concern of the automobile industry, said plant sources. There is also concern about the addition of hydrated alcohol to gasoline, which already has 20 percent anhydrous alcohol mixed by PETROBRAS [Brazilian Petroleum Corporations]. According to the automobile plants, that hydrated alcohol cannot be mixed with gasoline because it contains water which does not burn but corrodes components. The automobile plants explain that engines built to use hydrated alcohol have linings of plastic or tin in the fuel lines to protect them against corrosion, something which is not provided in gasoline engines.

In Jundai, technicians of the CNP confirmed that the Piracaia gasoline station was selling gasoline with more than 20 percent alcohol.

The president of the Petroleum Byproducts Distributor Retail Sales Union in the state of Sao Paulo, Paschoal Vinicio Catucci, said yesterday that he considered the statement by Camilo Penna as being very "unfortunate."

He said: "We distribute the alcohol just as we receive it," adding that the owners of gasoline stations do not commit this irregularity. "Even if there exists one case, the minister cannot generalize the problem to all."

Pachoal Cattuci added: "Many things happen by the time the alcohol reaches the station." According to him, it could be that the alcohol reaches the station with more than four percent water, the limit established by the CNP. He recalled that many plants are already old and obsolete and it could be there that the problem lies.

He also said that the owners of gasoline stations do not have any means for measuring the amount of water in the alcohol delivered to them by PETROBRAS.

Automobiles Converted to Alcohol

Brasilia CORREIO BRAZILIENSE in Portuguese 24 Aug 80 p 8

[Text] Minister Cesar Cals, following the policy of containing the use of petroleum byproducts adopted by President Figueiredo, ordered the replacement of 80 percent of gasoline-powered vehicles of the Ministry of Mines and Energy by Alcohol-powered automobiles. The measure is aimed at achieving a saving of a million cruzeiros by the end of the year. Gasoline-powered vehicles have been being replaced since last January by alcohol-powered automobiles. This produced a savings of 25 percent. With the new restrictive measures, by December the Ministry will reach a 50-percent savings in the use of fuel in all the vehicles it uses.

PROALCOOL Approves Projects

Brasilia CORREIO BRAZILIENSE in Portuguese 24 Aug 80 p 8

[Text] By the end of last month the Bank of Brazil had already approved 158 industrial projects for the expansion or installation of distilleries in the country amounting to 25.8 billion cruzeiros in loans to be granted through the National Alcohol Program [PROALCOOL]. These distilleries will produce more than 18.4 million liters of alcohol per day.

Of this total, the Bank of Brazil Industrial Credit Directorate has already contracted the financing of 135 projects in the amount of 15.7 billion cruzeiros through PROALCOOL. The distillery projects already contracted alone will allow an increase of 15.7 million liters per day of alcohol as of the moment the units go into operation. Another 23 projects, dspite the fact that they have already been approved, still await the decision of the Industrial Credit Directorate for the financing contracts, which amount to 7.7 billion cruzeiros.

INDUSTRIAL PRODUCTION TO RISE 6.3 PERCENT IN 1980

Santiago EL MERCURIO in Spanish 30 Aug 80 pp A-1, C-12

[Text] A total of 316 companies, representing various sectors of production invested $203 million during the first half of this year.

Therefore, industrial production for 1980 will increase 6.3 percent, according to estimates by the research department of the Industrial Development Association.[SOFOFA]

The information was released yesterday during a press conference with SOFOFA president Hernan Daroch and the head of the research department, Miguel Bejide.

The general results of the Fifth Industrial Survey of the sector's condition in 1980 were released at that time.

The sample includes 316 small, medium and large companies which are representative of all production sectors.

The survey was done last April, with figures to March and projections from that point for the entire first half of the year. Moreover, they include the businessmen's expectations for all of this year.

Preliminary Results

Bejide reported that the initial results projected 10-percent growth for the year. However, last July the projection was revised using the real figures for the first half of the year, and the result was the 6.3 percent given.

Sales

Actual sales by the companies in the sample will increase 11.2 percent during 1980.

Stock

As to stock levels, the survey indicate that the companies averaged 39.4 days' reserves.

Investments

The 316 companies stated that they planned to invest $203 million during the first half of this year. Of that total, 20.3 percent was for replacements and 10.3 percent for capital assets.

Productivity

Production capacity of the companies surveyed will increase by 20.7 percent. In 1978, investments that were made permitted projection of a 15.8-percent increase in production capacity, while last year that amount was 19.3 percent.

Employment

Employment will rise slightly this year. Of the companies surveyed, 19.3 percent estimated that they would increase their hiring, 64.6 percent said that their levels of employment would remain constant, and 15.8 percent estimated that they would have to reduce employment.

Taxes

In addition, the survey estimates the effect that lowering the social security tax will have on hiring. If the tax were decreased by 10 percent, there would be a 9.4-percent increase in employment. If there were a 50-percent decrease, hiring would increase by 26.7 percent.

Negotiations

Daroch stressed the results of the collective bargaining process. Two hundred forty-four companies, or 77.2 percent, had negotiated. Only 22.8 percent had not.

With regard to readjustments, the average real percentage granted was 9.25 percent. Only 3.3 percent of the companies surveyed said that they had decreased the benefits. The final results, after negotiation, show that benefits equal 26.7 percent of wages. Before negotiation, they were only 23.8 percent.

Strikes

Of the companies who negotiated in May, only 6.1 percent suffered strikes, while 93.9 percent reached agreements. Only one used a lockout.

As of 1979, for every peso of current liabilities, the companies averaged 1.73 pesos of liquid assets.

Inflation and the Dollar

Among the subjects surveyed, the companies reported that they estimate annual inflation for 1980 will reach 30.1 percent.

Regarding the dollar, 5.4 percent of the companies said that it is overvalued, 39.6 percent said that it is undervalued, and 55 percent believe that it is correctly valued.

COST OF LIVING UP 2.2 PERCENT IN AUGUST

Santiago EL MERCURIO in Spanish 3 Sep 80 pp A-1, A-20

[Text] The director of the National Institute of Statistics [INE] Sergio Chaparro, yesterday announced a 2.2-percent increase in the Consumer Price Index [CPI] for the month of August.

Chaparro stated during a press conference that the index for August is the lowest since 1971, when it was 1.1 percent.

The accumulated CPI for the rest of the year is 19.3 percent, a figure that is also the lowest in the past 9 years, when it was 12.7 percent in 1971.

According to the INE, the rise in the cumulative CPI allowing for the effects of the change in salaries and wages to be granted in October is 11.48 percent including April (2.5 percent), May (2.3 percent), June (1.9 percent), July (2.0 percent), and August (2.2 percent).

Incidence

The CPI for last August was 165.77 points (from a base of 100 in December 1978). The incidence of the various categories in the general index was approximately the following: food, 1.6 percent; housing, 0.1 percent; clothing, 0.1 percent; and other, 0.4 percent.

The main increases were in vegetables, meats, dairy products, bread, rent, maintenance and care of the home, clothing for men, women, children, and infants, tobacco, private transportation, and miscellaneous.

Increases and Decreases

Out of a total of 347 products on the CPI sample, 234 products rose in price in August, 42 dropped, and 71 remained the same.

The greatest increases in the food category were in: bread (2.9 percent), premium-quality rice (2.2 percent), pasta (2.5 percent), rump roast (5.2 percent), goose (5.7 percent), filet roast (7 percent), chop (4.6 percent), ground lamb (16.4 percent), lamb cutlets (16.1 percent), pork cutlets (8.2 percent), pork ribs (5.7 percent), pork stew (8.8 percent), eel (5.1 percent), fish (5.3 percent), condensed milk (7.1 percent), eggs (8 percent), common-grade oil in bulk (10.2 percent), apples (27.1 percent), bananas (10.9 percent), lettuce (4.4 percent), potatoes (12.0 percent), bottled wine (7.5 percent), restaurant meals (5.3 percent), hot dogs (5.3 percent).

The articles that decreased the most in price were: pastry (-9.15 percent), whole dressed chicken (-3.6 percent), sausages (-5.4 percent), mortadella (-1.3 percent), canned sardines (-1.8 percent), lemons (-24.1 percent), carrots (-3.9 percent), tea bags (-0.8 percent), mineral water (-0.5 percent) pilsener beer (-1.1 percent)

Wholesale

Also in August, the wholesale price index [WPI] increased 2.1 percent over the previous month, to a level of 5,656.64 points, on a base of 100 in December 1974.

The index for national products in the WPI rose 1.8 percent, while that for imported products, fish and seafood, mineral products, and construction materials.

Among the imported products, the greatest increases were for those from the "vegetable kingdom" and synthetic products.

Chaparro said that the August WPI, like the CPI, was the lowest since 1971, when it was 1.2 percent.

The WPI reached 21.3 percent for the first 8 months of this year, comparable only to the same period in 1971, which was 11.5 percent.

Table

Year	August (%)	First 8 months (%)	12 months (%)
1970	2.5	29.5	32.0
1971	1.1	12.7	17.4
1972	22.7	63.5	77.2
1973	17.1	150.5	303.6
1974	10.9	203.7	637.2
1975	8.9	221.2	403.3
1976	5.5	118.9	200.3
1977	3.4	43.5	79.9
1978	2.8	20.9	37.7
1979	4.7	25.0	34.7

UNEMPLOYMENT FIGURES DOWN, WAGES UP

Santiago EL MERCURIO in Spanish 3 Sep 80 p A-20

[Text] Unemployment in the Greater Santiago area dropped 25.7 percent in the past 4 years, comparing the adjusted averages for June through August of 1976 with those for the same period this year.

The information was released yesterday by the National Director for Statistics, Sergio Chaparro, who said that in absolute terms the number of unemployed fell by 56,200 persons, while the total population rose from 3,479,500 to 3,857,100.

Chaparro termed the change "very positive," indicating that the number of unemployed dropped from 218,600 in June through August of 1976, to 162,400 for the same period this year.

Employment

Employment registered a sharp increase of 20.2 percent during the same period. The total number employed in the June-August 1976 period was 944,600, while for the same period this year the figure reached 1,297,800, showing an increase of 353,200 jobs.

The increase in employment and decrease in unemployment took place despite an 11.6-percent increase in the work force between the two periods. While the entire work force for the June-August 1976 period was 1,163,200, it was 1,297,800 for the same period this year, an absolute increase of 134,000 persons entering the work force.

Percentage

In percentage terms for the June-August quarter of this year, adjusted unemployment was 12.5 percent. In the same period last year it was 12.7 percent, and in 1976 it was 18.8 percent. The 12.5 percent figure for this year breaks down to 10.1 percent out of work and 2.4 percent seeking work for the first time.

Regions

The National Director for Statistics then reported on the results of surveys on employment and unemployment in Regions II, VI, and VIII.

In Region II, unemployment decreased from 14.6 percent in November 1979 to 13.2 percent last May. A breakdown of the May figure shows 9.4 percent out of work and 3.8 percent seeking work for the first time.

Region VI

In Region VI, there were 23,620 unemployed in June of this year, or 13.6 percent of the work force. The October figure showed a total of 30,500 unemployed, which is 17.4 percent of the work force.

When last June's results are broken down, we see that of a total of 13.6 percent unemployed, 9.8 percent are out of work and 3.8 percent are seeking work for the first time.

Region VIII

Finally, in Region VIII all unemployment as of 30 May was 13.8 percent, of which 9.0 percent are out of work, and 4.8 percent are seeking work for the first time.

The Wage and Salary Index of the National Institute of Statistics showed an increase of 1.6 percent during this past June over the figure for May 1980.

The government statistical agency made the announcement yesterday, indicating that the difference from June of 1979 was 52.6 percent. After adjusting that figure with the CPI, we see a real increase of 10.5 percent for the wages included in the survey.

The salary indicator showed an increase from May to June of 0.6 percent, so that compared to June 1979, the gross increase (without adjusting) was 50.1 percent.

The wage indicator showed a larger increase--2.5 percent from May to June. The increase compared to June 1979 is 54.9 percent.

CARIBBEAN, THAILAND, UNGA SITUATIONS DISCUSSED

CIA's Caribbean 'War'

Havana PRISMA LATINOAMERICANO in Spanish Aug 80 p 2

[Commentary by Carlos Mora Herman in "Conditions" column: "The CIA's Secret War in the Caribbean"]

[Text] The bomb which destroyed that automobile on a street in Georgetown, the capital of Guyana, on Friday, 13 June, was not one of those that can be crudely put together at home. It was a sophisticated bomb, designed by experts; a bomb of the type called "unipersonnel," which explodes upwards and more certainly ensures the destruction of the human target.

That bomb killed Dr Walter Rodney, a brilliant, progressive intellectual, the leader of the Guyanese opposition party, the Working People's Alliance (WPA).

Before that deed, an invasion of Surinam by mercenaries had been repulsed, and later two significant events occurred: the attempted dynamiting of Maurice Bishop in Saint George's, Grenada, and the attempted coup against Michael Manley in Kingston, Jamaica, the primary purpose of which was the physical elimination of the Jamaican Prime Minister.

Bishop saw in that chain of events in the Caribbean region the sinister workings of a plan conceived and carried out by the U.S. Central Intelligence Agency to thoroughly and violently eliminate progressive leaders in the area, the Caribbean's best men.

It is not easy for the American goverment to accept the desire for independence and sovereignty manifested by Michael Manley since he began governing Jamaica.

It is not easy for Washington to remain inactive in the face of the political actions taken and ideological statements issued by Maurice Bishop in Grenada.

Both Caribbean leaders, Manley and Bishop, expressed strong opinions and adopted resolute stances at the Sixth Summit Meeting of Nonalined Countries, which took place in Havana.

The destabilization campaign unleashed against Jamaica by the United States Government harmed the country and aggravated the economic crisis that American harrassment had caused.

The International Monetary Fund (IMF), a body dominated by the United States, tried to strangle the Jamaican economy by means of the granting of loans conditioned on complete political submission.

Michael Manley rejected the proposal and stated in New York City on 4 June that financial aid from some countries (the Netherlands, Sweden, Libya) enabled his country to retain a measure of dignity and independence of the IMF demands through the credits needed to deal with the Jamaican crisis.

During the next 5 years--according to Manley himself--the aluminum industry will grow 50 percent, and production will increase by 4 million tons a year.

Algeria, the Soviet Union, Venezuela, Mexico and Iraq will buy large amounts of aluminum.

Tourism is another of the country's major industries that is expected to grow during the coming years. During the period 1978-1979 it increased 43 percent.

Jamaica's economic problem is essentially structural.

That problem consists of changing from a dependent economy based on the importation of consumer goods and the exportation of raw materials to an independent economy by means of increased production, especially in agriculture.

The Americans belonging to the government team are concerned to the point of obsession about the interest Manley has repeatedly shown in Cuba's revolutionary process and about the close relations between the two Caribbean countries.

They also have this concern about Grenada and any other Caribbean country that shows a tendency toward an independent, anti-imperialist, anticolonialist policy.

At the press conference Manley held in New York in early June, they asked him whether he wasn't worried about the expansion of "communist totalitarianism" in the Caribbean.

Manley answered that the only sort of totalitarianism that worried him was that which can be seen in Chile today.

That is precisely the totalitarianism that the United States would like to install in Jamaica and throughout the Caribbean.

Some Latin-American journalists and politicians have said that the government in Washington is trying to repeat in the Caribbean what it achieved in the Southern Cone of South America during the 1970's. For that to happen, it was necessary to assassinate Salvador Allende, Prats, Juan Jose Torres, and, along with them, thousands of revolutionaries and progressive, democratic fighters.

As was charged before the United Nations on 25 June, the American government has launched an undeclared war against all the progressive movements in the Caribbean.

That conspiracy is in the hands of the CIA, which is reviving old habits after having been freed of some restraints imposed on it by the U.S. Congress.

It has been trying to carry out a plan that embraces actions ranging from invasions by mercenaries to the murder of the most highly respected anti-imperialist leaders in order to behead the region's revolutionary and progressive movements.

It is a history of intervention, aggression, blackmail and crime that is repeated, that has been repeated since the United States adopted a policy of world domination over 100 years ago.

Thailand's Kampuchea Stand Scored

Havana PRISMA LATINOAMERICANO in Spanish Aug 80 p 21

[Commentary by Miguel Rivero in "Viewpoints" column: "Pretext and Armaments"]

[Text] The regime in Thailand has been scarcely original in its formula for obtaining substantial arms aid from Washington: stir up a conflict in the region bordering the People's Republic of Kampuchea, with Peking's blessing.

Quickly, as if reciting a prepared lesson, all the Pentagon's and the White House's spokesmen held forth in unison about "Vietnamese aggression against Thailand."

Then President James Carter, like a good imitator of Superman, decided that he should send that Southeast Asian country a large shipment of 155 mm guns, M-48 tanks and a full, sophisticated arsenal. Without a doubt, it is a generous contribution by the Pentagon to still further inflammation of affairs in an explosive region, where Chinese agents are also actively at work providing training and arms and food to the remnants of Pol Pot's army. As people will recall, he was ousted in January 1979, although before that he brought about nearly 3 million deaths in the former Cambodia.

Any sensible person might wonder what interest would prompt the Vietnamese, who at a considerable sacrifice are helping the people of Kampuchea to recover from the great hardship they suffered, to kindle a border conflict with Thailand.

What interest can the new officials in Phnom Penh have in encouraging or justifying these actions when they are immersed in the titanic job of organizing an entire country that had been practically defunct after the nearly 4 years of experimentation in the most refined techniques of torture and murder, under the sponsorship of the so-called Khmer Rouge?

Unquestionably, a situation of war and conflict with neighboring Thailand is useful to neither the Vietnamese nor the new government in Phnom Penh.

Only a few months ago, during my last visit to Phnom Penh, I spoke at length about these matters with President Heng Samrin and Vice President Pen Sovan. Both indicated that they favored peaceful resolution of all the problems with the Thai regime. However, thus far Bangkok has responded negatively to all proposals for negotiations with officials from People's Kampuchea.

In reality, if we analyze the motives for these provocations by the Thais more deeply, we can find three other powerful reasons:

One: The Bangkok regime has tried to use the Kampuchean refugees who settled in its country as "shock and infiltration troops" against Kampuchea.

It is no secret that Pol Pot, Ieng Sary and Khieu Samphan have established camps in Thailand. Journalists from Japan and other countries who have interviewed these leaders have even publically stated that the meetings took place in Thai territory.

First, the Thai officials forced the Kampucheans to move into the interior of the country. Then they offered facilities to the remnants of Pol Pot's forces for the recruiting and training of these people.

Now they are trying to have these "refugees," converted into an armed, trained fifth column, accepted again in Kampuchea.

Only a few weeks ago, in a rather cynical manner, a reporter for the American news agency AP reported from one of those camps that a follower of Pol Pot had said the following:

"The Khmer Rouge told us to come to Thailand to recover and regroup our forces. Now that this phase has ended, we think the time has come to return to Kampuchea."

Two: Both Washington and Beijing painstaking prepared this plan for execution during the period preceding the next meeting of the UN General Assembly, where the Pol Pot regime still illegally holds Kampuchea's seat by means of some legalistic hocus-pocus; for everyone knows that it controls not an inch of the territory of what was Cambodia.

The General Assembly will have to debate this issue at its next meeting at a time when even allies of the United States, such as Great Britain and Australia, have withdrawn recognition from so-called Democratic Kampuchea, which exists only in the feverish brains of Beijing's hierarchs.

The purpose of the border conflict is to make the "refugees" and the nonexistent Pol Pot-Ieng Sary-Khieu Samphan regime the most urgent issue.

Three: Another purpose of this provocation was to delay the process under way within the Association of Southeast Asian Nations (ASEAN) after the patient, fruitful negotiations carried out by Vietnamese Foreign Minister Nguyen Co Thach.

It is no secret that Malaysia and Indonesia, for example, tended to favor a peaceful negotiated solution to the so-called "Kampuchea problem," including recognition of an irreversible reality, the fact that a new government has been established in Phnom Penh with President Heng Samrin at its head.

The provocation of the border conflict naturally means interruption of this process.

This is the background of the provocation, of the pretext and the row stirred up by Americans, Thais and Chinese in a volatile, unstable region.

They are forgetting recent lessons. The Shah Reza Pahlavi and Anastasio Somoza also received numerous guns, tanks and planes . . . and we all know what happened to them.

Upcoming UNGA Session

Havana PRISMA LATINOAMERICANO in Spanish Aug 80 p 58

[Commentary by Jose Bodes Gomez in "Interchange" column: "Not Everything, but Not Nothing, Either"]

[Text] During this month and those ahead, the United Nations is going to be the setting for a series of negotiation sessions concerning the principal problems of international economic relations.

First, the General Assembly is going to hold a round of extraordinary sessions to review events since 1974, when under similar circumstances it approved the declaration and the plan of action regarding the establishment of a new international economic order.

Then the 25th regular session of the General Assembly will witness discussion--in accordance with the agenda--of the new international development strategy for the 1980's.

On few occasions has there been such an opportunity as this for examination of the world's economic problems by such a large, representative group of major figures: top government officials, diplomats and experts from over 150 countries.

Whatever they may be, the results of these debates will undoubtedly have considerable importance in the years ahead. However, the possible effects are diametrically opposed.

If the agreements reached are effective and progressive, the path of international negotiations will be widened for future advances, and the present political atmosphere in the world will undergo a marked improvement, at a time when such a change is very necessary for consolidation of peace.

On the other hand, there is no concealing the fact that another failure will further aggravate tensions, and it will be very difficult, if not impossible, for the underdeveloped nations demanding a change to stand about quietly, hoping that their demands will be discussed again at another conference.

It is not a simple, clear-cut dilemma: all or nothing. It would be naive to think that the complete solution to problems as complex as those of underdevelopment can be found through a few weeks of debates, however illuminating they may be and however prominent the participants may be. Moreover, it must be borne in mind that for the colonialist and imperialist powers--as well as for the dominant classes in the dependent countries--to preserve the old order is to prolong the exercise of their privileges.

The experience of the past decade demonstrates, if that was necessary, that the path of negotiation has serious limitations. The chief of these rests in the weakness of the agreements obtained, for as a rule those expressing the greatest sense of justice have the support of a majority that still lacks the power to ensure that they are carried out in comparison with a minority that has the resources needed for that fulfillment.

The documents approved 6 years ago calling for the establishment of the new international economic order suffered from this lack of support from the moment they were voted on. A small group of delegations, made up of the developed capitalist countries, expressed many reservations at that time, and in some cases they even voted against some of the articles in those drafts.

The declared or covert opposition that appeared on that occasion has been seen again and again throughout these years during which the different international economic conferences have been taking place. The result has been that many of the measures proposed are in suspension and some others have undergone modifications that profoundly affect their original intent.

The balance of power cannot be changed simply through a decision by the majority of an international body, however representative and democratic it may be. As history shows, changes take place initially within nations, and their importance and large number alter the course of international politics.

Ascertaining that these 6 years have not witnessed a profound transformation of economic relations should not be grounds for discouragement or resignation. It is enough to recall that the UN General Assembly reached the point of discussing and approving a new order for those relations because of the efforts of the underdeveloped countries, especially the nonalined movement, with the support of the socialist governments. We should remember, too, that this unity and recognition of common interests has grown considerably in recent years.

Meanwhile, the capitalist system has become enmeshed in its worst crisis since World War II, but at the same time it has become more dangerous and complex. Along with inflation, unemployment and monetary instability, we see increased military spending and higher earnings by the multinational firms in activities as important as energy production.

The weight of the crisis is falling overwhelmingly on the weakest economies, and even the developed socialist countries are completely escaping its effects. This reality clearly indicates that the progressive forces should not only close ranks in the quest for changes but that at the same time they will have to find means of overcoming the stalement and clearing the way for the economic development of all peoples.

The nonalined movement, the Organization of Petroleum-Exporting Countries, the Group of 77 and other bodies representing the underdeveloped world unquestionably have opportunities to expand their cooperation and, at the same time, to strengthen the bonds of friendship with the socialist community's Council on Economic Mutual Assistance.

HUMAN RESOURCES VICE MINISTER DISCUSSES FMC

Havana GRANMA in Spanish 22 Aug 80 p 2

[Interview with Julio Cesar Valmaseda, Vice Minister for Human Resources, Ministry of Agriculture, on the occasion of the 20th anniversary of the Cuban Women's Federation]

[Text] [Question] One of the tasks to which the federation has given great meaning is the incorporation of women into agriculture. What value is placed by your ministry on women's participation in this sector, which is of vital importance to the country's economy?

[Answer] Our ministry values very highly the role of women in the tasks of developing agriculture and the livestock industry in our country, in which, in the course of the past 20 years, they have come to occupy an outstanding and fundamental place as an important force in production. This is an expression of the high degree of political and revolutionary awareness of the Cuban woman, who considers active participation in the economic construction of socialism her chief social duty.

This evaluation is based on the immediate response to the call of the revolution, in the early days of the revolutionary victory, for the mass incorporation of women into agriculture and their decisive contribution to the development of the sugar harvest, the plans for sowing and harvesting coffee, tobacco, citrus and other fruits, foods and vegetables, the plans for poultry development and other branches of the livestock industry, where they have worked carefully and enthusiastically, joining in any necessary task, including the operation of agricultural machinery and the tasks of research and scientific and technical development.

[Question] The support of the FMC [Cuban Women's Federation] for the development of agriculture includes volunteer work in the various development plans. In what measure has this contributed to fulfilling your ministry's commitments and in what areas do you think women's participation has been of most importance?

[Answer] As we all know, agricultural and livestock production requires, at certain times of the year, a work effort greater than is customary to respond to so-called "production peaks," and these needs are only met by the volunteer work carried out en masse by our people, mobilized through their mass organizations. The Cuban Women's Federation has played a significant role in this activity, contributing decisively to the fulfillment of the plans to bring the agricultural products to the people and for the sowing of various crops; to the preparation of hatcheries and even to the tasks of cleaning and beautifying the agricultural and livestock installations.

They can be called extraordinary for their magnitude and for the enthusiasm displayed by the members of the Federation, the days of volunteer work they have contributed in the harvest campaigns for foods, fruits, vegetables, coffee and tobacco; in the filling of sacks for the roosts in the hatcheries; in the sowing of sugarcane and in other tasks where the women's participation has been outstanding.

We deeply appreciate this magnificent work by the Cuban woman, which is a deciding factor in the fulfillment of our production plans and which has even greater meaning since the work is in agriculture, a work which demands outstanding physical effort and which the women develop voluntarily and firmly, occupying a vanguard position along with other workers in this vanguard activity: volunteer work.

[Question] The FMC organizes this volunteer force in contingents, detachments, brigades, etc. What do you think of these structures?

[Answer] The structures conceived by the FMC for carrying out volunteer work are efficiently suited to the forms of organization in agriculture, while at the same time permitting the feminine organization to exercise effective control over the mobilized force and allowing us to program, direct and execute, as a result, all the activities in which women participate.

[Question] How do you evaluate the work done by the Cuban Women's Federation in support of sugarcane agriculture, and in what measure does this sponsorship contribute to the various harvest objectives in the sugarcane emulation?

[Answer] The work of the FMC in developing the sugarcane emulation has become an important factor in fulfilling the objectives set by them, and the organization is not only noteworthy for its tasks of sponsorship of various activities, but also for its permanent incorporation into sugarcane agriculture, where 22,225 women are working.

An outstanding aspect is the result of the organization's sponsorship of the manual cutting brigades in the cane fields, which has contributed to increased production by the cutters and to greater efficiency in operating the mechanized equipment for the cultivation of sugarcane, as well as to the quality of the raw material which is delivered to the sugar mills.

Also very important has been the women's presence in the camps, doing unprecedented work for the brigades. We can also characterize as stimulating their presence during these contests among the workers, since they contribute subjectively to the maintenance of discipline in this work, which demands a certain amount of strength and lasts for several months under difficult conditions. Under such conditions the workers require the sort of attention which, with singular self-denial and dedication, the women give to each of the activities developed by the FMC during the harvest and other campaigns in sugarcane production.

One cannot set aside, in the carrying out of the sugar emulation, the extraordinary political importance of having the women achieve productive success in the millionaire cane-cutting brigades [when a Cuban sugarcane cutter or brigade of cutters has cut 1 million arrobas, the cutter or the brigade is designated "millonario" or millionaire], where our extraordinary harvest heroines are outstanding. This is an irrefutable proof of the outstanding place the Cuban woman has achieved with her efforts in the plan for social equality.

[Question] To what extent are women represented in this sector, and how much participation do they have in leadership responsibilities within it?

[Answer] Women represent 15 percent of our labor force, including sugarcane agriculture; this indicates the thrust of the feminist movement in our sector.

At present there are 87,035 women in agricultural and livestock activity, and they are grouped by occupational category as follows:

Category	Number of Women	Percentage of Total Workers in Each Category
Workers	49,696	11
Technicians	5,063	13
Adminsitrative	21,261	69
Services	9,478	33
Managers	1,537	3
TOTAL	87,035	15

Within the sector, according to their employment in the basic branches of agricultural and livestock activity, they are grouped as follows:

Agricultural and Livestock Sector	Number of Women	Percentage of total workers in branch
Sugarcane	22,225	11
Non-sugarcane	19,563	16
Cattle-raising	28,565	15
Forestry	2,733	13

This demonstrates that 84 percent of the female work force employed in agriculture works in the main branches of agriculture and livestock production. As you can see, only 3 percent of our managerial posts are occupied by women, which shows that they are participating in our complex task of administrative and technical leadership and indicates the possibility that this will continue to increase to more satisfactory levels.

[Question] Do you have any message for the Federation members on their 20th anniversary?

[Answer] The story of the activities of the militant Cuban Women's organization in these last 20 years of its existence shows a positive balance in the enormous task of agricultural and livestock development in our country and goes beyond our geographical limits with their presence in internationalist cooperation, which we give to brother peoples in the tasks of economic construction.

Today's Cuban women, from the rank and file of the FMC, has been able to hold on high the banners of struggle and victory raised by their predecessors in the glorious eras of our struggles for independence and revolution, of whom they are the faithful and valorous successors.

As the FMC celebrates the 20th anniversary of its founding, we extend to all its members our recognition of their extraordinary contribution to the fulfillment of our tasks, and our assurance that as before, we will continue to count on the years of effort which still remain before us, on the consolidation of work for economic development, on that unequalled force which they constitute and which will, in the joint effort with the rest of our workers, lead to the strengthening and advancement of agricultural and livestock production in our country until the satisfaction of our people's needs is gradually attained.

DEVELOPMENT OF CAMAGUEY CANE ENTERPRISE DISCUSSED

Havana BOHEMIA in Spanish 29 Aug 80 pp 16-22

[Article by Andres Rodriguez: "Portrait of the Agricultural Battle"; passages enclosed in slantlines printed in boldface; original paragraphing not followed]

[Text] Synopsis of the Agricultural "Battle"

1. Geographic location
2. Planned area
3. Receiving centers and their planned daily task
4. Level of mechanization
5. Planned delivery of cane to the mill in the coming 1981 harvest

1. The Batalla de las Guasimas cane enterprise is 22 kilometers south of the city of Vertientes in Camaguey Province and 52 kilometers from the city of Camaguey.

2. According to the plan, this enterprise covers about 274 square kilometers which equals the total territory of four small European states: San Marino, Vatican City and the principalities of Monaco and Liechtenstein.

3. It will have six preprocessing centers with 60,000 arrobas of cane to process daily. There will also be direct shipment of 240,000 arrobas a day --that is, 40 percent of the daily cane delivery--to the scales of the mill.

4. Land preparation is totally mechanized; mechanization also predominates in cultivation and fertilization. However, sowing is done almost totally by hand so a mobilized work force is needed. Mechanized harvesting should handle between 40 to 60 percent of the total cutting.

5. In the coming 1981 sugar harvest, plans are to deliver 36 million arrobas of cane to the mill at the rate of 400,000 per day.

Preface

During the past 2 years, we have watched the construction process of Batalla de las Guasimas, one of the four sugar enterprises that the revolution is building in the country after almost 50 years of silence in that field. Therefore, it is logical to turn our eyes now toward its supplier of raw material--that is, cane agriculture.

Therefore, we present below what could be called a portrait of the Batalla de las Guasimas cane enterprise.

It is a portrait with a corresponding set of evaluations which, obviously, are only opinions given with the constructive desire to inform and alert our readers without exaggerating.

The reader has, before his eyes, a portrait which includes the following aspects:

1. Composition of varieties and stocks; situation and control at enterprise and /district/ level. We emphasize the word "district" because it is at this agricultural level where the harvest is done and, consequently, where there should be appropriate composition of varieties and stocks.

2. Rain, soil and /drainage/. Drainage is emphasized because it is one of the main problems of the enterprise.

3. Roads. They are important to an enterprise that transports 40 percent of its cane directly to the mill scales.

4. Situation of the cane fields. This is what we saw, with our own eyes, during our tour.

5. The infrastructure. What is there and what is missing?

Now permit us to make a final statement.

The best encouragement that we could receive, as a just counterpart, would be the opinions of the laborers, technicians and leaders of the enterprise which is the subject of this portrait. Therefore, we publicly propose a needed and constructive exchange of opinions leading toward our common denominator: the advance of socialist construction to benefit the people.

We are persuaded that this exchange of opinions is an effective way of reaching that common denominator and, at the same time, materializing the indispensable journalistic inquiry into the actions of our enterprises.

Is the composition of varieties presented in the chart good or bad?

To answer this question, it would be appropriate, first, to insert excerpts from the agricultural report for 1978-79 written by the Batalla de las Guasimas cane enterprise itself.

It stated:

"This enterprise had two varieties as of 31 December 1977: Barbados 4362, 77.6 percent; and Jaronu 60-5, 18 percent. The rest were obsolete varieties like Barbados 42231 and Puerto Rico 980. Varieties like Cuba 8751 which has high sugar potential and is easy to adapt to almost 50 percent of our land were not known. A similar situation occurred with Mayari 5514 which, although there was almost a caballeria of it, had not been propagated by anyone. The new varieties were not known.

"An explanation was given for this situation: lack of transportation to go find it or plant it. The truth was different--lack of a policy on varieties."

Between 31 December 1977 and 31 December 1979, a better composition of varieties could be seen at Batalla de las Guasimas. The extreme dependence on Barbados 4362 was reduced and a magnificent variety--Cuba 8751--was introduced and spread to all the districts of the enterprise.

However, there is still an imbalance.

In the first place, it seems there is a healthy trend toward Mayari 5514 in spite of the fact that this is a variety with a very short harvest season. According to the experts, it can only be cut in the last 10 days of March and in the month of April. Nevertheless, it is the third variety in order of importance at the enterprise.

However, this Mayari 5514 has been propagated unevenly. For example, it occupies 45 percent of the cane area in District No. 4. Doesn't this appear to be an excessive area for a variety that can only be harvested at the end of the harvest period?

The dependence on Barbados 4362 is still significant in some districts. Of course, it is inferred that this situation is the result of the legacy expressed in the 1978-79 agricultural report.

However, there are contradictions which are hard to explain.

Let us look at a concrete example of this.

We recommend that the reader look at the chart on the composition of varieties by district, specifically at District No. 3.

Barbados 4362 has an overwhelming majority in it; it is a variety which is very susceptible to rust and, therefore, its agricultural yield is affected. Nevertheless, that district, according to the information, has the highest agricultural yield in the enterprise with 56,500 arrobas per caballeria.

Is this due to the influence of a better composition of stocks?

Let us look at the chart on composition of stocks.

First, we see that this is an enterprise where short-cycle canes (sprouts and winter sowing) predominate. The first, as is known, is harvested at a maximum of 14 months of age while the second is cut later; that is, between 15 and 20 months. Of course, this assumes there are no dreaded delays which still occur in both cycles. It is as harmful to harvest spring plants and sprouts at 9, 10 and 11 months of age as it is to harvest leftover cane at 24 and 30 months. All are past their optimum stage.

District No. 3 with 87 percent of the sick Barbados 4362 has the highest agricultural yield of the enterprise. Does that district have a balanced composition of stocks that affects this?

That does not appear to be true if we look at the information on the chart on the composition of stocks per district. In District No. 3, as in the others, the predominating stock is sprouts. As was already stated, it depends heavily on a variety affected by rust.

There is another contradictory phenomenon.

Looking at the agricultural yield by variety in the enterprise, the four most important according to the area that they occupy are as follows:

Barbados 4362	54,200 arrobas per caballeria
Jaronu 60-5	53,200 arrobas per caballeria
Mayari 5514	61,900 arrobas per caballeria
Cuba 8751	51,900 arrobas per caballeria

Barbados 4362, affected by rust, has a higher agricultural yield than the magnificent Jaronu 60-5 and Cuba 8751.

2. Rain, Soil and Drainage

According to engineer Lugo, assistant production director at the enterprise, drainage is a major problem and he is right. It is good that he and other comrades show interest and concern about this.

Why is drainage so important?

According to 40 years of data, an average of 1,714 millimeters of rain, that welcome /heavenly irrigation/ as scientist Alvaro Reynoso called it, fall on the area of the Batalla de las Guasimas cane enterprise. This precipitation covers two periods: the dry season from November to April with 288 millimeters; and the rainy season from May to October with 1,426 millimeters.

During the rainy season, the average frequency is 15 days with rain; that is, it rains every other day.

According to available information, Batalla de las Guasimas cane enterprise has the highest rain average in Camaguey Province.

This natural irrigation--always beneficial for an /irrigation crop/ like sugar cane--falls on soil that is generally distinguished for its high natural fertility and its slow natural permeability.

This last factor can be solved through drainage.

Let us look at that 1978-79 agricultural report again:

"One negative element in the productive potential of these soils is the poor internal drainage in the central and southwest zone of the enterprise. Combined with very poor work in superficial drainage, this causes great losses in sowing, low crop density in the areas, harvest problems, etc. Therefore, it is necessary to undertake serious drainage work which includes, among other measures, cleaning natural drains, constructing factories on block foundations and setting boundaries as well as building a network of interior drainage that permits evacuation of water within 48 hours since, during the spring, there are 15 days of rain each month."

The major importance of drainage in a place with the natural characteristics described above can be understood. Its solution can help increase cane production and agricultural yield without resorting to artificial irrigation systems and unnecessary growth in new areas.

3. Roads

They are important to an enterprise that transports 40 percent of its cane directly to the mill scales.

The plan includes construction of 264 kilometers of roads with the objective of guaranteeing the movement of cane to the receiving centers. It also includes three highways which will cross the enterprise from north to south and from east to west to facilitate communication between the population centers and to improve ties with the different parts of the enterprise itself.

That is the plan. What is the reality?

At the time of our tour, 40 kilometers of the planned roads had been constructed, according to reports. Being like doubting Thomas, we saw part of those roads with our own eyes; we not only saw them but we traveled on them.

The comrades at the enterprise showed keen interest in accelerating the construction rate of roads in the cane development areas as well as in the areas of direct shipment to the mill scales.

That interest is understandable. In the first place, the two largest districts of the enterprise are in the areas of direct shipment. Those areas should supply 240,000 arrobas of cane daily, 40 percent of the daily delivery, to the mill scales.

4. Situation of the Cane Fields

In the section on varieties and stocks, we emphasized the work done by the enterprise concerning varieties. A comparison of what it received 2 years ago and what it has now unquestionably reveals better work. This in itself is a demonstration of cane cultivation which is so necessary in efficiently administering any enterprise devoted to that crop.

Does the above mean that there is cane cultivation throughout? That statement would be such an exaggeration that even the most naive person would not believe it.

The comrades of the enterprise itself are aware that there are no grounds to say that.

The progress achieved in the policy on varieties requires the accompaniment of other equally important factors for true technical and economic effectiveness.

In spite of that progress, the agricultural yield of the enterprise is still significantly low (47,000 arrobas per caballeria). We must say, even though it sounds unpleasant, that no variety has the potential to take care of low crop density, overgrowth, lack of drainage or delays.

The first three factors, at least, are seen at the enterprise. We saw them with our own eyes at the fields we toured. We will not say anything about the last factor (delays in the cane harvest) because nothing should be said when there is not enough evidence.

We know the effect of the lack of drainage on the above so we understand the enterprise's insistence on its solution. However, the effect of the agrotechnical deficiencies should be presented also.

For example, we observed sowing by mobilized workers from the city of Camaguey.

Those workers, whose efforts and enthusiasm were unquestioned, occasionally used sprouted seeds. As is known, these seeds directly affect the sown field since they produce sprouts with poor germination.

That poor germination prevents the necessary density of stalks and, consequently, affects crop density during the years of life of that sown field. This also provokes other negative factors including overgrowth of the field and waste of cultivation. For example, when the bare fields are fertilized, the weed sprouts benefit as well as the cane sprouts.

Finally, attention should be called to the cost of each caballeria sown in the spring and winter campaigns of 1979.

In the spring campaign, 1,276 pesos were lost for each caballeria sown while that loss increased to 8,028 pesos in the winter campaign.

5. Infrastructure

What is there and what is missing?

Here there was no complaining tone. However, this does not prevent noting an obvious fact with no other desire than an objective notation in the book of constructive development. The Batalla de las Guasimas sugar enterprise (we are referring to the factory) has received better attention for the creation of its infrastructure and its security base than the supplier of raw material has.

The sugar enterprise is a great factory with modern technology and a complete system of control of the production process.

The supplier of raw material does not even have a plan for its cane fields per district.

However, the above cannot be viewed absolutely and finally. In spite of the difference noted, the cane enterprise has been able to obtain some elements for its security base. Today it has: a supply warehouse; fuel and lubricant base; and temporary offices with dining room and lodging.

A pesticides warehouse and buildings and dining rooms in the Concordia and La Aurora districts are now under construction.

However, much remains to be done.

It can be noted that there is no central machinery shop; nevertheless, no equipment (for example, its 200 rubber-tired tractors) has been left unrepaired.

The workers, as always, have responded in the midst of difficulties that also require an appropriate response.

They are confident that this response will come. This is certainly not the confidence of resignation. It suffices to look at concrete realities like the modern sugar enterprise or the new community that already has 400 housing units, a semiboarding primary school, a commercial center for 4,000 customers and a sugar agroindustrial polytechnical school for 550 students. Anyone can verify the concrete realities by traveling on the 22 kilometers of a concrete and asphalt reality--the highway from Vertientes to the door itself of Batalla de las Guasimas.

PEASANT WOMEN'S TRAINING DISCUSSED BY ELENA GIL

Havana GRANMA in Spanish 20 Aug 80 p 2

[Interview with Elena Gil Izquierdo, member of the Cuban Communist Party Central Committee and president of the Movement for Peace and Sovereignty of Peoples, by Jesus Orta Ruiz; date and place not given]

[Text] Elena Gil Izquierdo, member of the party Central Committee and president of the Movement for Peace and Sovereignty of the Peoples, is one of our long-time fighters for the emancipation of the proletariat and for women's rights. She began her political career in 1927, coincidental with the founding of the Cuban Communist Party. A worker and union leader in the Telephone Company, she participated in the leadership of two long strikes against the electric power complex in 1925 and 1934, respectively.

A contemporary of revolutionaries Maria Morales and Charito Guillaume, she formed a close friendship with them and under their influence embraced the scientific ideology of the working class. Registered with the police and blacklisted by employers, she suffered persecution, arrest and loss of her job. She distinguished herself in the struggle against fascism and in support of the Spanish Republic. As a member of the Popular Socialist Party, she served on the directorate of the Democratic Federation of Cuban Women, and in the struggle against the Batista tyranny was a leader of the United Women's Opposition.

When the revolution won its victory, she undertook to form the various feminist groups into a single bloc. The Cuban Women's Federation--the fruit of those efforts at unification--named her to direct the plans for the improvement of the position of women, a beautiful idea of Fidel's, which evolved into the Ana Betancourt Peasant Women's School, about which Elena tells us now as something well known and remembered with affectionate satisfaction.

[Answer] The school was established in response to an imperative need of the times in which our country found itself with the victory of the revolution, since from the beginning--as Comrade Fidel said--it was necessary to include the most humble and until that time most marginated classes of the people in the revolutionary process. Of course, among those most backward classes were the women who served as domestics and the peasant women. In order to develop the Ana Betancourt school, it was necessary to take some very important steps, because where were we to find the personnel who, with great firmness and dedication, would teach the girls who came from the rural areas? And so, on Fidel's initiative, the Conrado Benitez school was established for that purpose. There, the comrades who were selected from the contingents of volunteer teachers from the Sierra Maestra were trained, beginning in January, 1961, in a plan which always combined study with work. They were the teaching personnel for the schools for domestic servants and later on of the Ana Betancourt Peasant Women's School.

[Question] What role did the Cuban Women's Federation play in the training of the first students and in that teaching center?

[Answer] Fidel entrusted to the Cuban Women's Federation the task of incorporating into the revolutionary process the peasant women, who had been cruelly mistreated by the capitalist society, which only offered them discrimination and oppression, ignorance and poverty. In mentioning the role of the FMC it is not possible, in speaking of the peasant women, to forget the task carried out by one of its leaders, Comrade Celia Sanchez, whose understanding of the true economic and social situation of the peasant family aided so much in that task. The Federation participates, then, in very diverse ways to carry out the mission entrusted to it by the commander in chief. It welcomes the peasant women as members, supervises visits of the various contingents to Havana, visits the homes and education centers, personally visits with the mothers of the students and, in general, lends its firm and definitive support to all the work carried on in the school.

[Question] What were the living conditions of those girls in the rural areas?

[Answer] In recalling those times--long gone, thanks to the revolution--it is impossible for one who lived close to those sitautions to forget the state of poverty which ruled absolutely over the Cuban peasantry. Lives which were wasted in remote areas, in miserable shacks, without communications, doctors or schools. Bare feet, stomachs distended by parasites; malnutrition and obscurantism. Lives which were cut short, in many cases, when they had scarcely begun, sometimes by perfectly curable diseases. Intelligences frustrated, because how could one dream of studying when survival was a task for titans? The revolution extended its arms to the peasants with the signing of the Agrarian Reform Act. Those strong and robust arms, which fought for the humble, also embraced the peasant girls.

[Answer] At the beginning of the course, most of the students were in the first and third grades, and only 7 percent were in grades four, five and six. The school began with a matriculation of 10,000 girls in 1961. The following year registration had grown to 14,000. During its existence the school has graduated nearly 150,000 peasant women. It is noteworthy that the school, which at first had been for primary grade and almost illiterate students, did not take long to become a teacher training school and a secondary and high school. The qualitative achievements of the girls in their studies made that possible.

[Question] What work did the girls do after graduation?

[Answer] Testimonies received among the peasants show that the girls, who had left for school semi-illiterate or with low levels of primary learning, took an active part in life as self-denying workers in education, health, commerce, the textile industry, agriculture and a whole gamut of specialties and branches of our economy which, as our comrades say, seems like a dream. Many of those who graduated are working as leaders of political and mass organizations in their native areas and many also have finished university careers. In conclusion, what appeared to be a dream became a beautiful reality, thanks to the concern and the work of the revolution.

[Question] Can you cite one of those peasant women who, like many others, surely, might be a prototype of the Cuban woman?

[Answer] We could mention many of those girls, but we will cite, for example, Irma Igarza. She came down from the Sierra with a second grade education when she was 15 years of age. She was born in Cruces de los Banos, in Palma Soriano. In 1961 she came to the Hotel Nacional to study fitting and dressmaking. When she finished the course, within a year, she returned to her village. There she received the sewing machine Fidel had promised her. She taught 20 of her comrades. In 1963 she returned to Havana, where she took some accelerated courses in school. In 1965 she began to study for the teaching profession. Later she entered the Enrique Jose Varona Teaching Institute, where she studied to be a history teacher, graduating in 1971. At present Irma is a tenth grade teacher; she teaches the fundamentals of political knowledge, with very good results. In 1966 she became a member of the UJC [Union of Young Communists] and since 1975 she has been a Party member. I repeat, Irma's case is not an exception. We could cite thousnads of examples.

[Question] Twenty years after the founding of the FMC what are, in your opinion, the highest achievements of our women's organization?

[Answer] I believe that in these 20 years the highest achievement of our organization has been achieving woman's just place within society, through her incorporation into the labor force, the schools and the defense of the country, as the true comrade of man. Through her integration into the various tasks society has entrusted to her, in her struggle against prejudices inherited from the capitalist society, the Cuban woman has come to occupy a dignified and total place in the revolution. She is no longer the ignored, discriminated against and so often humiliated person of former, ominous years. She is today the militant, the internationalist, the worker and the exemplary mother who is following the course of the most worthy women in our history, such as Mariana Garjales, Ana Betancourt, Lidia Doce, Clodomira Ferrals and Celia Sanchez Manduley.

BRIEFS

CASTRO, GROMYKO OFFICIAL TALKS--Commander in Chief Fidel Castro Ruz, first secretary of the PCC and president of the councils of state and ministers, held official talks with Andrey A. Gromyko, member of the CPSU Central Committee Politburo and USSR Foreign Minister. These talks were held on 16 and 17 September as part of the official and friendly visit to Cuba by the Soviet Foreign Minister in response to an invitation by the PCC leadership and the Cuban Government. An analysis of the international situation as well as topics dealing with bilateral relations between Cuba and the USSR were discussed during the exchange held between the two leaders. The talks took place in a fraternal atmosphere and frank comraderie as corresponds the traditional Cuban-Soviet relations of friendship. Around noon on 17 September Commander in Chief Fidel Castro hosted a luncheon for Andrey A. Gromyko at the Palace of the Revolution. [Text] [Havana GRANMA in Spanish 18 Sep 80 p 1]

MAURICE BISHOP'S SPEECH AT FSLN ANNIVERSARY SCORED

San Pedro Sula LA PRENSA in Spanish 9 Aug 80 p 7

[Commentary: "Bishop or Red Interventionism"]

[Text] On the occasion of the first anniversary of the triumph of the Nicaraguan revolution, at a public ceremony in which, among others, the Cuban dictator Fidel Castro participated, Mr Maurice Bishop, prime minister of Grenada (a position he attained by means of a coup d'etat) announced a Marxist revolution for Honduras.

It has been reported that the speech was given in English and that there was very little reporting on the texts of the speeches given there. The communications media of our country has only mentioned the disquieting and irresponsible statements of the second-rate tyrant in a fragmentary way.

Our editors have obtained the official version, which was translated by the Sandinist government, and they felt it was important to disseminate it, along with a brief comment. Here it is.

"Comrades: Five months ago, on Sandino Day, I had the opportunity and the privilege of speaking to the people of free Nicaragua, and in this very short time since then I can see very clearly that the people of Nicaragua are stronger than ever, more energetic than ever, more determined than ever, more productive than ever, and more combative than ever.

"This is a historic month for the peoples of Latin America because in the same way you are celebrating today your first anniversary, on Saturday of next week the people of free and revolutionary Cuba will celebrate the 27th anniversary of the attack on the Moncada Barracks. And who among us, comrades, has any doubt about the importance of the Moncada Movement and about how the Cuban revolution existed and won in 1959? We say that without the Cuban revolution there could not have been a revolution in Grenada nor a revolution in Nicaragua.

"Therefore, our task, the task of the free peoples of the hemisphere, must be carried out through our unity, through our solidarity and through our cooperation, and it must be carried out by showing the way ahead. Our task is to continue to guarantee that by 1981 we will be able to speak not only of revolutionary Cuba, not only of revolutionary Nicaragua, but also of revolutionary El Salvador, of revolutionary Guatemala and of revolutionary Honduras.

"To you, the sons of Sandino, we of free Grenada say: Continue advancing, continue marching always toward greater triumphs, continue combatting imperialism, continue struggling, continue demonstrating with your unity and your victories what the true peoples, the revolutionary peoples of Latin America are capable of."/ [in boldface]

The quote, although lengthy, is nevertheless very useful. It contains almost all of the speech and only omits the demagogic greetings that are the custom in such cases.

The substance, obviously, is in the boldfaced paragraphs. There the Caribbean dictator says in a way that leaves no room for doubt that without the Cuban precedent neither the Grenadan nor the Nicaraguan regime would exist.

And then, with the greatest cynicism possible, he suggests that "our task" should be to offer "solidarity and cooperation" so that the present governments of Guatemala, El Salvador and Honduras may disappear and be substituted by revolutionary regimes that would obey Cuba and the Soviet Union.

It is not often that a chief of state is seen demanding so shamelessly and disrespectfully direct intervention in the internal affairs of other nations. Without any doubt, Mr Bishop does not recognize international law, or at least he completely rejects it.

Of course, one must ask: "How would the prime minister of Grenada and other Caribbean and Central American leftists react if an international conclave were organized tomorrow in Guatemala, El Salvador, Honduras or some other country and the need to put an end to the Marxist dictatorship in the region were proposed in order to replace them with free and democratic governments?

It is easy to imagine the howls of indignation, the charges before the Inter-American Commission for Human Rights, the complaints at the United Nations, the propaganda campaign orchestrated from Moscow against the "fascist and proimperialist regimes," etc., etc.

The extraordinary insolence, the rude arrogance and the insensitive prattle of the second-rate dictator of microscopic Grenada have done nothing more than ratify what we have said repeatedly: Both the doctrine of nonintervention and the affirmation of respect for pluralism that the communists constantly boast about are nothing more than a disguise, a mask that they use when it suits their strategy and which they abandon as soon as it becomes an obstacle to their expansionist and totalitarian plans.

Fortunately for the cause of freedom, Honduras is in the midst of a true process of democratic opening and is going full speed ahead toward the reestablishment of the rule of law.

There is no appropriate climate for violence among us, and the people have shown by their votes that they repudiate extremism.

Therefore, in 1981 we will have a Honduras that is completely free, democratic, and progressive, like Costa Rica and the moderate western societies, even though we realize that economic progress will come little by little. The madness of Bishop and company must not take away our dream. But it should help us realize, in all its sinister dimension, the true substance of communism, which is neither a liberating ideology nor the gibberish that it may appear to be, but plainly and simply a bombastic fallacy behind which a voracious, aggressive and criminal imperialism hides.

BRIEFS

JAPAN DONATES SHIP--The contract for the donation of a ship for research and experimentation in connection with marine resources was signed today by representatives of the Japanese Government and engineer Guillermo Sevilla, vice minister of natural resources. The ship is estimated to be worth 204,700 lempiras. The ship, which will be used for studying marine resources in our country's coastal waters along the Atlantic is a gift from the Japanese Government through the Japanese Volunteer Mission for Overseas Cooperation [JVMOC] to the Ministry of Natural Resources. It will be used by the General Directorate of Renewable Natural Resources [GDRNR]. The studies will be carried out by Japanese scientists and their Honduran counterparts consisting of Honduran biologists and a Honduran crew which will be trained by the Japanese to run the ship in the future. The JVMOC will provide the GDRNR with monthly reports on the studies and research carried out and in addition will work in accordance with programs previously approved by that directorate. The gift contract was signed by Minoru Tagami, JVMOC representative, and by Menji Ishikawa, Japanese ambassador to Honduras, in addition to the vice minister of natural resources. ASSISTANCE AGREEMENT WITH SWITZERLAND-- The development of towns bordering on El Salvador is beginning to go forward with a gift from the Government of Switzerland. I believe that what was lacking here was the hand of the central government in order to foster industrial programs in which a greater number of persons could be employed." This statement was made by Prof Efrain Gutierrez Garcia, mayor of the city of Nacaome, when he was interviewed a few days ago at the same time that a technical assistance and financial agreement for 20.8 million lempiras was signed in that southern city by the governments of Switzerland and Honduras. According to Gutierrez Garcia, the projects which are being carried out there are the following: construction of the municipal building at a cost of 200,000 lempiras, and of a municipal slaughterhouse for 80,000 lempiras. He added: "The cluster school project, which consists of building 44 schools and renovating another, is being carried out. These projects are taking place in the municipality of Nacaome. In addition five more classrooms are being built and eight already existing classrooms are being renovated in different locations of the Department of Valle." Referring to the city's progress the Nacaome mayor stated: "A contract has already been signed with the Ministry of State for Communications, Public Works and Transport for the paving of two sections of the city streets: one connects with the Pan American Highway which leads toward El Salvador, and the second involves three blocks, already partially paved, from the public market to the main street which connects with the route to El Salvador." PAPER, CASTRO AGREE: COUNTRY HAS OWN PATH

[Editorial: "Fidel and the New Revolution"]

[Text] Commander Fidel Castro has strongly emphasized what is new about the Nicaraguan Revolution--the fact that our revolution is a new experience in America--and his desire to learn and to be influenced by it.

Perhaps these statements, made successively on 26 July 1979, just 7 days after our victory; on 19 July 1980, at the celebration of our first anniversary of freedom; and 7 days later in Ciego de Avila, Cuba, on the occasion of the 27th anniversary of the attack on Moncada Barracks, do not convince the most skeptical and those who only want to hear the ill-intentioned, distorted statements the transnational news agencies make about our situation.

But we who are convinced that our revolution is unique in the world understand Commander Castro's sincerity and the fraternal respect with which he always refers to us, with which he visited us and celebrated with us the first anniversary of the victory of the Sandinist People's Revolution.

Those who only want to see us through the prism of American imperialism see nothing new here. But they do "see" what does not exist: "lack of freedom of the press"; Soviet bases everywhere (which appear and disappear with ghostly ease), in Puerto Cabezas, in Esteli, and those which have yet to appear and disappear in Managua, Leon, Juigalpa, etc.; the literacy campaign as a form of brainwashing; and, as if we didn't have enough problems and needs of our own, they "see" our interference in the internal affairs of other countries, such as El Salvador and Bolivia.

As these gentlemen see us, within a few weeks we will no longer be a small country devastated by an earthquake in 1972 and later by a war, and involved in a very difficult process of reconstruction. Instead, they will begin to talk of intervention by "Nicaraguan imperialism" in the internal affairs of all the countries of America which are oppressed by gorillas and where, as a result, liberation movements are beginning to emerge and become strong, and logically so.

Insofar as it concerns us, although all this is obviously false, it will clearly serve as an excuse to attack us, to hold up our loans from other countries and to create around us the despicable aura--as some are already trying to do--of a country which copies the most totalitarian of the "socialist" regimes that appear in the films of the huge American motion picture industry.

Fidel came, and he saw the originality of our revolutionary process--an originality which, like anything else orginal which wants to be permanent, must be based on the other experiences so that it does not fall into the same errors, and must renew itself constantly, with revolutionary humility, to correct those it does make.

He saw the integration into the process of bourgeois sectors, the existing pluralism in political parties, the mixed economic system and the definite participation of large Christian sectors in the revolution. And we call attention to everything Fidel saw because, although it may not seem true, there are many people here who do not want to see it, and there are others who do not want to understand that the foregoing in no way prevents ours from being a true popular revolution, in which the people have the weapons.

The visitor, then, gave us a good lesson in revolutionary objectivity, which it would be wise to learn. He did not come here as a teacher, but rather to learn and to be influenced, in the same measure that all of us must learn and be influenced by his sincerity and experience.

Finally, we must pay our respects to the Cuban people for having commemorated on 26 July--our 19 July--the 27th anniversary of the attack on the Moncada Barracks.

There used to be very little talk here of the Cuban 26 July holiday, and the same is true of all Latin America. We did not even celebrate our own 23 July, when Sergio, Jose, Mauricio and Erick were killed in 1959 in Leon.

But those earlier times, even though we did not talk about them very much because the dictator had a horror of such things, contributed to maintaining people's determination to fight and to the fact that hope was not destroyed.

Those past 26 July's have contributed in great measure to our present.

That historical event on the island could never be held back. It crossed all frontiers.

It remained within the students who year after year celebrated the great event, scorning the dictator's reprisals. And it was precisely thus that in some way it became part of our present. And it transcended all borders, even with losses as irreparable as that of Che Guevara in Bolivia: an irreparable loss, but an imperishable example.

Today, on 19 July--because it will always be 19 July in Nicaragua--we feel we owe much to 26 July: not only Cuba's present generous aid, despite the country's precarious condition, but also our hope and faith in Sandino and Marti.

Our 19 July, with its example, must begin to give back to all the oppressed countries in the world that wealth inherited from 26 July. We have a debt to Latin America which was born on that long-past 26 July and which now augments 19 July. Two revolutions. Two vocations to freedom realized. And all the future.

FSLN PROPAGANDA, EDUCATION CHIEF DISCUSSES ELECTIONS

Managua BARRICADA in Spanish 31 Jul 80 p 3

[Interview with Julio Lopez, FSLN national secretary for propaganda and political education; date and place not given]

[Text] [Question] What is the meaning of the 19 July victory within the framework of today's Nicaraguan democracy?

[Answer] Well, it is clear that while the minorities who are demanding elections today were only concerned with the ouster of Somoza and his clique from power, the people really did not fight for a change of men in power, but to destroy a system of ruling.

These are not mere words. A heroic struggle that has cost 50,000 lives in the last few years was carried out to destroy a way of exercising political power and the economic foundation of a social system. Somozism was also the history of capitalism and the bourgeois society; the goal was to destroy the Somoza government and to create new foundations for the organization of the society of the workers, the peasants, the middle classes and all the patriotic sectors. We have thus come out of the prehistory of oppressed peoples to forge a real history, where the form and content of power change completely, breaking with the traditional canons, and a power based on the interests of the oppressed majority is born.

[Question] But there are minority groups that insist elections must be held to have a "democracy"....

[Answer] That is a false and hypocritical argument. In other words, they are telling the people: "Forget that you have achieved the heroic and historic deed that is the revolution and let us rule the future of the country with traditional forms of power in a society where the exploitation of man by man prevails." That is the aim: to ask the people to regress to prehistory, to negate their own conquests, and to think in the traditional terms of domination and antidemocratic power which prevailed under the presidential system and the bourgeois parliamentarianism imposed by the bourgeois proimperialist rule, denaturalized by the dictatorship. It is no coincidence that these sectors and politicians who were never able to see their ambitions crystallized, cut short first by the Somoza regime and then by the people's revolution, are asking the people to forget the revolution, to return to the traditional election of liberals and conservatives.

[Question] On the other hand, when there is a demand for elections as the only way to democracy, the insinuation is that the new Sandinist power is not democratic. What would you say to this reactionary statement?

[Answer] Of course, that is what they want to manipulate. But it is a simple ideological trick which appeals to the empty and false concept of bourgeois democracy. In any case, the problem is not to argue that there is no democracy without elections, but to ask oneself whether the nature of the new democratic, popular and anti-imperialist government denies or affirms the people's participation in the government. Because, in any case, it is not elections which determine whether a government is democratic or not, but rather the people's participation in the distribution of social wealth and in making the basic decisions in the administration of the state.

We state that in a categorical way a real and effective participation of the people in the exercise of power has been opened up with the revolution.

Let us give a few examples. What else could the People's Property Area mean but the growing participation and decisionmaking power of the people in the administration of production, which is the main source of wealth in any society. What does the Council of State mean by the direct representation of the people through the delegates of the popular sectors. What does the literacy campaign mean but the great decision of the people to end ignorance and open up possibilities for social and cultural development. And we could go on mentioning other instances of power such as the armed forces and the militias, the uprooting of Somozism, the agrarian reform, etc.

[Question] And in that context of a democratic government and the people's participation in its exercise, how should the announcement by the government junta and the FSLN [Sandinist National Liberation Front] that there will be elections in Nicaragua be interpreted?

[Answer] To be exact, we are building a society in which the people participate directly in making the basic decisions, but we are going even further. We are looking for a maximum of representativeness. That is why elections arising at the grassroots level will not decide whether there was a revolution or not, or determine who holds power in Nicaragua, that has already been established by history and the people are constantly ratifying it.

The elections in our country, at the different levels announced, will serve to confirm the authority of the people and the representativeness of the government of the people. No longer will the individual, fragmented man line up to vote for one or another sector of the ruling class as in the past; instead, it will be the people organized in their unions, the EPS [Sandinist People's Army], the militias, the ATC [Agricultural Workers Association], in brief, a people with a strong political awareness of their own interests. In Nicaragua we will have elections with a new popular and democratic content and all the sectors that are identified with and participate in the revolution will be present.

[Question] Another point set forth by the reactionaries is that only elections will lend credibility and legitimacy to the new government. What is your opinion?

[Answer] It is normal for these sectors to think in terms of the government's legitimacy, since it is obvious that whoever did not particpate in the revolution cannot find any legitimacy in it. Their absence from the real revolutionary process and the fact that they excluded themselves from the struggle carried out by workers, peasants and other sectors in the barricades, the guerrilla columns, the political field, etc., leads them to see a lack of legitimacy. The people who fought en masse next to the FSLN do not need to legitimize their power. The minorities' claim is only a reflection of their powerlessness which results from the fact that they do not consider a revolution theirs because in practice they did not make the revolution.

[Question] Besides, they always fought for a reform bill as an alternative to the revolutionary overthrow of the dictatorship....

[Answer] Indeed, we would be talking of elections as demanded by these sectors had the bourgeois reform advocated by the FAO [Broad Opposition Front] in alliance with imperialism succeeded. But the reality is that the revolution succeeded and the old system collapsed.

In addition, it must be said that it is totally ridiculous to believe that in the middle of the revolutionary victory, we will turn back to the reactionary ways of exercising political power because an eye doctor or some reporters from a local newspaper say so. The people's victory cannot be questioned by the desires of some insignificant elements in the historic development of this country. We also believe that their arguments are in part an excuse not to embark with all the necessary energy and vigor on the tasks that the revolution has set forth for all the patriotic sectors of the country.

[Question] But what fundamental reason would explain the reluctance of some elements to accept the revolution as a historic event?

[Answer] Well, it is logical that some interests linked to the past, to the prehistory of the country, might survive thanks to the generosity of the revolution. They are having enormous difficulty accepting that today power is on the side of the oppressed. On the one hand that is a natural phenomenon. But, often, it is also a deliberate attempt to confuse the people, to veil their heroic deed and the depth of their revolution. To do that, they resort to diversionary tactics.

Neither can we close our eyes to the real connection between counter-revolutionary acts and the fact that some sectors insist on questioning the legitimacy of the revolution. However, the revolution insists on its pluralist policy and calls for the integration of all sectors into the revolutionary process. We are convinced that some elements which hold these positions will do so until the end, but we are also convinced that many sectors will identify with those patriotic businessmen who have understood the nature of the historic changes in Nicaraguan society and will advance in a positive way alongside the people.

Here there will never be a regression to the form and content of power as exercised in the societies dominated by imperialism. The only thing left in revolutionary Nicaragua is to deepen the Sandinist people's control of power, a path which is open to all social sectors that want to become involved in national reconstruction.

SOCIALISM, CUBAN SOCIETY, SANTAMARIA SUICIDE DISCUSSED

Managua LA PRENSA in Spanish 3 Aug 80 p 2

[Commentary by Carla Rodriguez: "Haydee Santamaria and Human Suffering"]

[Text] Editor's note: From the point of view of ideals and of revolutionary practice, Haydee Santamaria had it all. She was a guerrilla fighter and shared the hardships of oppression and the glory of victory. She saw her country liberated from tyranny and contributed as a political architect of the first order in building the socialist society of her country.

She was head of the Cuban intellectual and artistic mecca, the House of the Americas, was married to Minister of Education Armando Hart, and was an outstanding member of the Central Committee of the Cuban Communist Party. In her were embodied the circumstances which would most give meaning to the life and aspirations of a revolutionary. However, something was lacking for her. In the midst of it all, happiness eluded her persistently, and one day, Haydee Santamaria decided she could not go on living any longer.

Every suicide has its personal, intimate, deep reasons, but all have in common the loss of hope. We will never know what combination of circumstances led Haydee to see a closed horizon in her future; we will never know when and why the balance of her life began to indicate that the price of living was beginning to be higher than its return for her. Had solitude taken its toll? Did she miss the experience of loving and being loved? Had she placed all her hopes in something which failed her?

One thing is certain among all the doubts: Haydee did not find happiness where she hoped to find it.

Perhaps she was successful in bringing happiness to others, but she did not succeed in achieving it for herself. Her tragedy forces us all to question ourselves seriously about the foundations of that deep yearning which no human being can renounce: happiness.

The following article by Carla Rodriguez is an attempt to plumb the circumstances surrounding this suicide and to offer some reflections. Certain characteristics peculiar to the Cuban revolution are emphasized. One should be warned, however, that the phenomenon is not exclusive to any one system or country. The highest suicide rates are recorded in Japan and Scandinavia, highly developed neocapitalist countries, each with different conditioning factors. In the midst of affluence or in the uproar of revolution, human beings may become desperate when they lack something.

"Communism is not the only system which permits freedom of creativity," said Haydee Santamaria before a Nicaraguan delegation on the occasion of a speech by Armando Hart, Cuban minister of culture.

"It would be unfortunate if our visitors should think we are saying that it is the exclusive attribute of the communist philosophy to respect freedom of creativity, develop human qualities and raise man to his highest expression. Long ago Jose Marti, our country's leader at the time of the revolution against Spanish domination, enunciated his principles on human freedom," concluded the poet, revolutionary and member of the Cuban Communist Party's Central Committee. Minister Hart thanked Haydee for her speech, seconding her statements.

The suicide of this Cuban woman, so closely allied to revolutionary freedom (in which she joined in the military activities) and to the building of socialism in Cuba (within the activities of art and ideology), is significant for those of us who are concerned with social transformation, whether it be through Marxist humanism, Christian values or other social "parameters." Being of the ruling group, the Cuban vanguard, she became overwhelmed by human suffering and decided to end her life, which had developed in an egalitarian society, seeking human happiness through social justice.

It is enough to remember that societies like the Cuban society have thought that abolishing private ownership of the means of production would achieve social justice, because collective or state ownership would permit giving "to each according to his work, from each according to his abilities." However, experience has demonstrated that the so-called Soviet socialist systems do not succeed in developing human potential, expanding man's freedom or strengthening humanism; rather they demand a daily draining to the very last drop of work in honor of production. Thus they create "heroes of labor," who, under the stimulus of competition (called "emulation" under socialism), become productive robots.

It is not, then the quality of the work, but its quantity, which determines social merit. Logically this is a source of human nonconformity, which ends by suffocating the person. The error lies in believing that the human society is composed of machines, and in forgetting that it is, rather, composed of sensitive human beings capable of doing any work, including that of machines. Also, man is not content with having his basic needs satisfied: once that level is achieved, he will seek another incentive, since his nature always demands higher things of him.

Although Haydee was not engaged in manufacturing or farm production, she found innumerable dissatisfactions in her field of endeavor. To set limits, patterns or channels for an intellectual's expression is equivalent to castration. If he is told what, how and why he must write, his dignity is destroyed. If he is told it is not proper to say this or that, because the people must not know, thus regulating historical, academic and ideological information--in short, all the cultural information to which every man has a right--this is something no intellectual can put up with. And Haydee Santamaria was a writer, free in spirit.

Analyzing the limitations of Cuba's social achievements in 20 years of revolutionary process must have caused a great deal of sadness to this sensitive woman who always fought in the front ranks for the social transformation of her country.

Those who enjoy freedom of spirit can understand Haydee's suffering, perhaps similar to that of Karl Marx's two daughters, both of whom committed suicide one after her visit to the Bolshevik Russia of Lenin and Stalin.

The search for a just society continues to be a challenge for men.

PRIME MINISTER'S SPEECH TO CONGRESS ANALYZED

Lima LA PRENSA in Spanish 1 Sep 80 p 11

[Text] Prime Minister and Economics Minister Manuel Ulloa's speech hammered at some chilling statistics about Peru which are known to all, but it did not reveal any specific measures or concrete means to deal with the harsh reality of today's economy, stated Dr Andres Vernal Monar to LA PRENSA. Dr Vernal Monar is a professor of macroeconomics and economic development at the University of Lima, with postgraduate studies at the London School of Economics.

Vernal stated that the prime minister limited himself strictly to Article 224 of the Constitution, which states that the president of the Council of Ministers must address the joint session of Congress and the other ministers of the Cabinet in order to explain and debate the general government program and the principal economic and legislative measures that require action.

He added that now we should see in the coming months a broader vision of the situation, with more specific alternatives in various areas, such as the announced creation of 1 million jobs over the next 2 years, and the offer to make a quarterly adjustment of wages and salaries, which will take effect next January.

Other things which must be more clearly defined in the short term, according to Vernal, are the degree of participation by the government in economic activities, and the exchange and industrial policies of the government, mainly with respect to the maintenance or reduction of the Certex and the use of tariffs as an instrument of economic development; as well as the regulation of foreign investment as related to the Andean subregional plan; and the subsidy policy and the monetary program.

One Million Jobs

With regard to the huge job plan, Vernal recalled that of the 1 million jobs offered, 200,000 would be in highway projects, 400,000 in agriculture and livestock, 200,000 in trades and 200,000 in private sector industry and commerce.

"It is therefore surprising that the prime minister referred only to the creation of an Inter-Ministerial Commission that was supposed to draw up a preliminary report and present it to President Belaunde in the first days of September," he claimed.

"It is also unfortunate that Ulloa mentioned only the programs designed to create labor-intensive jobs to continue meeting the needs of the unemployed and underemployed population," he indicated.

Wages and Salaries

Later he expressed agreement with the announced quarterly wage adjustment, but said that Ulloa has taken great care not to use the term "indexing," which was being used in recent weeks.

He then said that one of the most negative legacies of the military regime was the regression of real wages during the seventies, which was intensified, as Ulloa pointed out, in 1977 and 1978 when the growth rate was -20.6 and -11.3, respectively.

Strong State

Concerning the degree of government participation in economic activity, he remarked that it appears that the prime minister favors a "strong" state in economic terms, and that his criticism of the former regime was directed not so much at the economic-related growth, but rather at the inefficiency, bureaucracy and corruption that prevailed in all spheres of public administration.

"It is a question, undeniably, of fully accepted economic regulations within the context of a mixed economy in which private enterprise prevails in the ownership of the means of production as well as the generation of the Gross National Product. That is no obstacle for the existence of a strong state that engages in economic promotion and supervision, with a certain amount of participation in a few business activities," he asserted.

He added that Professor Samuelson, in his post-Keynesianism, would clearly favor a general statement such as that made by the minister with regard to public enterprises and the economic participation of the state.

BUDGET FIGURE SET AT 1.9 TRILLION SOLES

Lima EL COMERCIO in Spanish 30 Aug 80 p 1

[Text] The Draft Budget of the Public Sector for 1981, sent the day before yesterday to the National Congress by the Executive Branch, totaled 1.903 trillion soles (1,903,000,000,000), reported the chairman of the Bicameral Budget Committee, Senator Sandro Mariategui Chiappe, yesterday.

He stressed that the draft does not include a provision for new revenues (read: taxes), and stated that the budget exceeds this year's budget by 54.7 percent. The initial budget for this year, with the subsequent expansions, amounted to 1.2304 trillion soles (1,230,400,000,000).

However, the current budget is more than 100 percent greater than that of the previous year, 1979.

This is why the members of the Bicameral Committee feel that the 1981 budget draft is "austere and anti-inflationary."

The fundamental objective is to reduce the current rate of inflation from 67 percent to 40 percent, as announced by Prime Minister Manuel Ulloa Elias in last Wednesday's address to Congress.

According to Article 197 of the Constitution, the draft budget must be approved by the Bicameral Committee, which consists of eight senators and eight deputies.

Approval will be subject to debate in the plenary sessions of Congress.

According to Article 198 of the Constitution, it must be passed no later than 15 December. If not, it will automatically be promulgated by the Executive Branch and will come into effect 1 January 1981.

This system will eliminate once and for all any possibility of twelfth-hour delays in the budget, as has happened before.

The Bicameral Committee, having been officially established yesterday, agreed to name three subcommittees, and to meet every Friday at 1000 hours.

CENTROMIN TO INVEST $1 BILLION IN COPPER, SILVER PROJECTS

Lima EL COMERCIO in Spanish 6 Sep 80 p 8

[Text] Huancayo, 5 September--The Central Peruvian Mining Enterprise (CENTROMIN) will invest $1 billion over the next 3 to 5 years in the expansion and modernization of plants for mining and metallurgical development. This should place Peru among the world's principal producers of copper and silver.

This statement was made today by Guillermo Flores Pinedo, executive president of the Central Peruvian Mining Enterprise, in a press conference held in Huaychulo, Concepcion, where high-ranking executives are having a working meeting.

Flores Pinedo explained that the investment was financed almost totally with the enterprise's own resources and those of the World Bank, the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development, and consortia of U.S. banks.

He also mentioned that the Cobriza expansion program includes the construction of a new plant with an investment of $240 million, and that similar plants are going up in Cerro de Pasco and Casapalca.

Another CENTROMIN project is the expansion of mining-metallurgy plants in Tintaya (Cusco), Monterrosas (Ica), and the stepping up of gold exploitation in Madre de Dios and coal development in Hatunhuasi (Huanuco).

"Similarly, the metallurgy and foundry plants of La Oroya will be completely modernized, implementing a vast program of mining development with a view to making this country a great mineral producer, since we have limited potential in agriculture," he stated.

Finally, he indicated that in Cobriza at present 10,000 metric tons of copper are produced each day, and in 3 years production will grow to 60,000 tons. Plant production of 25 million ounces is scheduled to increase to 35 million ounces per year in 3 years.

COPPER MINE TO YIELD $1 BILLION PROFIT ANNUALLY

Lima EL COMERCIO in Spanish 8 Sep 80 p 12

[Text] Arequipa, 7 September--When the Cerro Verde production unit is in full swing at the end of this century, it will generate approximately $1 billion for the country each year in the export category.

A study made by Luis Cohello Gamarra, presented to the "Arequipa Ano 2000" [Arequipa in the Year 2000] Forum, reveals that through copper exports alone, the production during the second stage of Cerro Verde will yield foreign reserves amounting to $800 million, "assuming conservative market prices." Molibdenum exports resulting as a by-product of copper exploitation will yield $175 million for the country.

The study points out that in addition, there will be revenues received from export taxes and taxes on mining company profits.

Referring to the importance of the Cerro Verde project for national and regional development, Cohello Gamarra indicates that in the initial phase of that project, Cerro Verde will employ about 2,800 workers, on whom 10,000 people will depend directly for support.

He adds that during the three construction phases of the second stage, an average of 2,500 workers will be employed for periods of approximately 3 years each.

With regard to the inputs required by Cerro Verde during its maximum development stage, Cohello points out the need for Arequipa industry to be in a position to provide all supplies needed in order to generate new sources of employment for local residents.

In addition, he says it is necessary to promote the development of the copper manufacturing industry in the region in order to increase the aggregate value of exports. Stimulus should also be provided for any industrial or mining project that uses sulfuric acid, which will be obtained in large quantities and at low prices from the treatment plant to be built at the port of Matarani.

Cohello's study explains that in the final phase of the Cerro Verde project, an annual average of 145,000 metric tons of fine copper will be produced in the form of cathodes, while 3,200 tons of molibdenum will be turned out. The treatment of the sulfurous gases resulting from refining will produce 600,000 metric tons of sulfuric acid.

Second Stage

The second stage of the Cerro Verde project includes the exploitation of a reserve of approximately 1.2 billion tons of copper sulfide contained in the mines known as Cerro Verde and Santa Rosa.

According to the results of prospecting in both mines, there are 812 million tons of copper with a 0.65 percent content, while another 385 million tons of copper have an average content of 0.57 percent.

The second stage of Cerro Verde will take place in three phases, and the daily total of tons treated will increase from 20,000 to 80,000 during that period. The third phase should end in approximately 1996.

The Cerro Verde and Santa Rosa deposits are among the largest in the world, and are located 24 kilometers south of the city of Arequipa.

PETROPERU SUSTAINS MAJOR DEFICIT

Lima EL COMERCIO in Spanish 12 Sep 80 p 4

[Text] The minister of energy and mines reported yesterday that the State Petroleum Agency (PETROPERU) is the public enterprise with the highest deficit to date in his sector, resulting from the former policy of fuel subsidies.

Kuczynski made this statement to the press after speaking for 3 hours before the Senate Committees on Energy and Mines regarding his sector's general policy.

The minister cited the Peruvian State Electric Power Enterprise (ELECTROPERU) as another public enterprise that is in the red. The deficit will be made up by raising rates.

Oil: Reserves for 10 or 12 Years

He pointed out that national petroleum reserves will cover our needs for the next 10 to 12 years, based on current calculations.

"The problem is that taking petroleum out of the ground is like pumping water out of a well: little by little the level goes down, and then there is low production. By 1983, the country will have to import oil, unless we undertake the necessary drilling to develop new oilfields."

The minister explained that this task will require several years' work, and that each exploratory well costs about $10 million.

"We think we will have to accelerate that program in order to head off this situation," he stressed, before pointing out that he has proposed three stages for that purpose.

First, there must be secondary recovery of the Talara wells; next there must be more exploration in the region near the oil pipeline; and finally, the region of Madre de Dios must be involved in the search for new sources.

Electric Energy: Concern

With reference to energy, he mentioned that he had noted a "serious concern" in the Senate, particularly regarding the supply of the interior of the country.

He said that in his speech before the Senate committees he had stressed "the urgent need for a National Electrification Plan," which has been given due priority in his ministry.

"In my formal remarks to the Senators I emphasized that in order to achieve this goal, the state enterprises must have adequate resources; otherwise, they will suffer from a shortage of funds. This would lead to delays in important projects that we all expect this administration to carry out."

He said he thinks there is no threat of energy rationing in this country. His office is studying the situation in Lima, and he stated that "there may be a technical solution, through the installation of a power plant that could be fueled by coal once it begins operations."

Coal: Supplement for Oil

Kuczynski said that national coal could become an important resource.

He indicated that the product coming from the north (especially Alto Chicama) could supply that kind of plant in the future for the generation of electric energy.

With regard to the capital city, he indicated that such a plant, supplied by coal, could have a capacity of between 100 and 200 megawatts, according to current studies. This would meet between 10 and 20 percent of Lima's present needs.

Gold: New Resource

Concerning the prospects for gold, particularly in the jungle, the minister stated that the same policy is being followed, but it should be carried out "within an orderly plan."

He mentioned that there are now some problems with the exploitation of mining claims, and that there are also problems regarding support for small miners in the region of the department of Madre de Dios.

Mining: $2.6 Billion in Foreign Reserves

Kuczynski predicted that mining exports, including petroleum, should yield $2.6 billion in foreign reserves this year.

Finally, he pointed out that he had told the committees of the need to clear up some aspects of the General Mining Act, the work of the Peruvian State Mineral Marketing Company, and the taxation of mining reinvestment, which "in this case is quite low," he indicated.

FOREIGN MINISTER SPEAKS AT UN GENERAL ASSEMBLY

PY271946 Montevideo Radio El Espectador Network in Spanish 1600 GMT 27 Sep 80

[Text] Uruguay sees true and deep-rooted respect for human rights as a significant step toward the implementation of a new international law. This statement was made by Uruguayan Foreign Minister Adolfo Folle Martinez during his speech to the UN General Assembly which is taking place in New York.

The Uruguayan foreign minister added that: If we want human rights to stop being a merely rhetorical principle and become an effective and valid factor for international coexistence, they must not be used as an instrument for political struggle between states and groups of people of different social and economic beliefs.

He said: As long as we continue to witness the paradoxical and strange spectacle of nations and groups which are in fact the enemies of freedom, trying to appoint themselves as judges of other states and social groups which have had to defend themselves from criminal and underhanded subversive attacks many times instrumented by those very countries, it will be very difficult to enforce the law and to maintain the unwavering validity of human rights.

With regard to the Middle East, the Uruguayan foreign minister explained that in line with the traditional principles of our country's foreign policy, we openly support the rights of the Palestinian people to settle their own land and become a free and independent country ruled by its own sovereign will.

Speaking about the recent extraordinary UN General Assembly, Folle Martinez indicated that unfortunately this meeting will be remembered by history as another failure in the long and diffidult course which the developing countries have set for the attainment of a new international economic order.

CENTRAL BANK REPORTS 1979 LOSSES BY STATE COMPANIES

Caracas EL UNIVERSAL in Spanish 17 Sep 80 Sec 1 p 18

[Text] The increment in the gross national product during 1979, at constant bolivar prices, with 1968 as a base, amounted to 77.726 billion bolivares, representing a slight increase, estimated at 0.7 percent, in comparison with the previous year; whereas, at current prices, the 1979 GNP totaled 210.217 billion bolivares, the equivalent of a 23 percent increase over the level reached the year before.

The foregoing figures are contained in the 1979 economic report submitted yesterday by the Central Bank of Venezuela and stressing, among other things, a sizable deficit in the current activity of the state companies, which showed losses of about 219 million bolivares, in marked contrast to the surplus accrued by those same companies in 1978, amounting to 1.543 billion bolivares.

It cites the growth of the Venezuelan GNP on the domestic market, registering only 0.4 percent in comparison with the previous year, a rate which increased the trend toward a slowdown in the aggregate growth rate the year before.

This lesser growth applied to both the branches of industry producing goods and those for services (1.0 and 0.1 percent, respectively), as compared with the increments shown in 1978 (6.7 and 3.3 percent).

While the predominantly exporting activities showed a growth of 6.1 percent for the oil industry and 10.4 percent for the iron industry, these figures were in contrast to the reductions which occurred in 1978 (2.2 and 1.2 percent, respectively).

For the reasons given, there was a slight increase in the share of the mainly exporting activities in the total GNP, amounting to 9.8 percent, which exceeded the percentage for the preceding year (9.3 percent); whereas that of internal activities declined from 88.5 percent in 1978 to 88.2 percent in 1979.

The report discloses that the reasons accounting for these slight shifts are, on the one hand, the favorable conditions shown by the international oil market, which had repercussions on the sizable increase in exports of Venezuelan crude.

On the other hand, the obvious slowdown noted in internal aggregate demand caused less incentive for growth in the productive sectors which supply the domestic market, reflected in some instances in a reduction in their absolute levels.

In examining the behavior of the leading productive sectors of the economy, the Central Bank emphasized that, among the activities which produce mainly for export, the macroeconomic aggregates of the oil industry during 1979 reveal expanded results in the GNP at 1978 prices.

The oil industry registered a GNP of 7.260 billion bolivares, a sum 6.1 percent higher than that for 1978, reflecting a rise in production volumes.

Other Sectors

Insofar as the iron and steel industry is concerned, the Central Bank's report indicates that the signs of improvement noted in this sector worldwide in 1979 allowed for a recovery in the real GNP of the national iron industry, after 4 consecutive years of declines in its level, and went so far as to show a growth of 10.4 percent in 1979.

In the agricultural sector, the GNP at 1968 prices totaled 4.854 billion bolivares, reflecting a 3.7 percent rise over 1978.

In the manufacturing industry, there was, indeed, a decline in the GNP, which stood at 11.804 billion bolivares, reflecting a growth rate of 3.8 percent, lower than the 4.9 percent registered in 1978.

In the construction sector, there was a drop of 9.8 percent at 1968 prices, caused, among other factors, by the lesser demand for construction on the part of the central government, and the slowdown noted in the rate of expansion of construction sponsored by the state companies.

As for the tertiary sector (trade and services), the report states that it is virtually similar to the real size attained in 1978. However, it explains that a marked decline was noted because of the slight internal demand in the trading sector, which experienced a decline in its real GNP estimated at 6.6 percent, and the transportation sector, with a drop calculated at 4.2 percent.

Investment and Prices

Insofar as the country's fixed gross investment is concerned, it stood at 67.600 billion bolivares in 1979, representing a 4.7 percent reduction in comparison with the previous year (17.4 percent) and with the average for the period 1975-78 (32.5 percent).

The Central Bank explains this behavior by the slump shown in imported capital goods (16.3 percent) last year, as well as by the considerable decline in those of native origin (2.4 percent in 1979, as compared with 22.4 percent in 1978). The combination of these results contributed to an increase in internal participation from 63.7 percent in 1978 to 68.2 percent in the year under analysis.

In the area of prices, last year they increased significantly.

The implicit deflator in GNP prices of internal activities increased by 13.4 percent, as compared with 11.8 percent the year before.

The same behavior was noted in the cost of living index for the metropolitan area of Caracas, which rose by 12.3 percent, a rate higher than that recorded the previous year (7.2 percent); and the wholesale price index, the increase in which (9.2 percent) exceeded the 1978 rate (7.4 percent).

In the interior section of the country, the cost of living was reflected most sharply in Valencia (13.1 percent), Maracaibo (12.1 percent), Barquisimeto (10 percent), Valera (9.9 percent) and the Puerto La Cruz-Barcelona area (9.4 percent). In other areas, San Cristobal, Barinas, Merida and Ciudad Guayana, a slowdown was noted in the rate of expansion of inflation.

Subsequently, in connection with the central government's budgetary management, the BCV [Central Bank of Venezuela] report indicates that it showed a deficit of 838 million bolivares, equivalent to the difference between the total revenue (48.405 billion bolivares) and the total expenditures (49.243 billion bolivares).

The BCV points out that the current transactions of the state companies during 1979, excluding those producing oil and iron, reflect losses of about 219 million bolivares, before income tax payments; a figure which contrasts significantly with the surplus accrued in 1978 (1.543 billion bolivares).

The aforementioned deficit was essentially a result of the one shown by the group of companies which had losses during the year amounting to 5.737 billion bolivares, a sum exceeding the profits accrued by the companies with surpluses (5.518 billion bolivares). The Central Bank of Venezuela and the Venezuelan Investment Fund contributed 81.4 percent of all those earnings.

The balance of the national public debt contracted on the basis of the organic law which governs it, excluding the so-called floating one, stood at 54.533 billion bolivares at the end of 1979, a sum 5.434 billion bolivares more than that registered in 1978.

The New Interest Rate System Is Beneficial

In a separate comment, the report of the Central Bank of Venezuela cites the importance assumed by the upward trend in interest rates.

It notes that the flow of internal funds, together with the upward trend in interest rates, were the most important factors causing the progress of the financial institutions during 1979. An increase of 18.6 percent was shown in the total assets of those institutions, a rate slightly higher than that attained the year before (16.9 percent), which was basically affected by the increment registered at the end of the year in the international reserves belonging to the Central Bank of Venezuela.

In the case of the other financial institutions, there was a decline in the growth rate.

The Commerce Bank showed an increase 3.1 percent lower than that registered during the period 1975-78 (27.1 percent), which was due to the reduced collection of funds through demand deposits.

The Mortgage Bank registered an expansion in its investments of funds amounting to 11.5 percent, a figure far lower than that for the preceding year (16.6 percent), a slowdown relating chiefly to the area of mortgage loans.

The Central Bank's report observes that the new interest rate system established by this bank of issue has had very significant effects on the development of the financial institutions. As a result of these measures, certain instruments (time deposits, unsecured bonds and savings certificates) were preferred by the investing sectors owing to their more appealing income return, and to the fact that the difference that formerly existed in comparison with the rates in effect on the external market was reduced. This dynamic factor brought beneficial effects in the case of the institutions which were faced with breakdowns in obtaining funds through traditional facilities, such as the Mortgage Bank and the credit institutions, through the sale of mortgage bank bonds and finance company bonds, respectively, making it possible to satisfy the demand for credit.

SLOWDOWN OF SIDOR PROJECTS TAKES TOLL IN GUAYANA

Caracas EL NACIONAL in Spanish 16, 17 Sep 80

[Article by special correspondent Hugo Lopez]

[16 Sep 80, p D-1]

[Text] The iron zone is experiencing its most difficult period since the founding of Puerto Ordaz on 2 July 1961. The standstill and the abandonment of a series of projects for the Orinoco Iron and Steelworks (SIDOR), and the decline in production rates in the leading company, are causing a situation which is disturbing all sectors.

Scores of firms providing goods and services which were created around SIDOR to back up the activities of the powerful state company are facing serious economic problems, and the closing of some of them has caused discouragement among the population, because a phenomenon virtually unknown in the area, namely, unemployment, is appearing.

The shrinkage in the economy, which many describe as a "dangerous recession," is beginning to be reflected in the sector of unskilled workers, the labor previously absorbed by the firms supplying goods and services to meet the requirements of powerful SIDOR, the importance of which in the area may be gaged by citing only one figure: 800 million bolivares per year, an average exceeding 66 million per month, which is the total amount of payroll in wages and salaries paid to its 17,500 workers.

Concurrently, the labor which for years has sought placement in the business firms revolving around SIDOR is beginning to show up.

On the avenues in Ciudad Guayana, one now observes groups of laborers engaged in gardening, pruning and tending the newly growing trees....again there are volunteers for the police force, and for work as firemen and collectors, and even personnel for checking the light and water meters to determine the amount that the users must pay, an amount that they formerly paid on the basis of the companies' calculations.

The inhuman appearance of Ciudad Guayana (every possible convenience was provided for the machinery, overlooking the individual who is the driving force for development) is changing. According to heads of the various activities in the complex, this is a reflection of the policy of cooling the economy, which has put the economy of this area in a kind of freezer.

The "Boom" in Ciudad Guayana

Starting in 1973, as a result of the work on the enlargement of the Guri Dam and SIDOR's Plan IV, the activities of the private economy experienced a period of considerable expansion, owing to the impetus of the sudden development of Guayana.

Small and medium-sized business firms embarked upon a phase of expansion with the new goals for iron and steel, and industrial development. The old companies became enlarged, and new ones were created with an accumulated capital of about 300 million bolivares.

Now, with the conclusion of SIDOR's Plan IV, the virtual standstill of the Guri Dam, on which the rate of construction has not kept the pace that had been anticipated, and the postponement of other sections of Plan IV, such as the seamless tube plant, requiring an investment in excess of 1 billion bolivares, the picture is different.

Francisco Natera, a well-known businessman from the area, current representative of the commercial sector on the FEDECAMARAS [Association of the Chambers of Commerce and Industry] board of directors, and former head of the Chamber of Commerce and Industry of the Caroni District, discussed with EL NACIONAL's special correspondent the present status and prospects of Guayana.

"The shutdown of a group of small and medium-sized industries in Ciudad Guayana and of others, such as the National Tractor Factory (FANATRACTO) in Ciudad Bolivar, is creating a desperate situation for the Bolivar business owners."

He said that the group of business firms created in view of the prospects for an economic "boom" are now discouraged, with installed capacity, with investments made and without a chance of meeting their commitments, because they are not receiving any work from the state companies.

"A capital depletion has occurred in the small and medium-sized businesses, and the closing of bank credit has contributed to it, although the private entities have a liquidity in excess of 100 billion bolivares.

"The commercial banks in Guayana are confining themselves to giving credit to traditional customers and to those with sufficient backing. The merchant or manufacturer who requires financing for working capital does not obtain it. There is a standstill in this respect as well."

The Closing of Business Firms

The most serious effect of the situation that the area is experiencing has been on the sector of small and medium-sized industry, especially in the metal-working field. It is estimated that about 60 percent of those which were in that sector associated with construction have given up production.

"Many of the companies which manufactured frames, doors, windows and metal structures for construction have disappeared. Their former owners are being engaged as master welders, erectors and installers, because they had to close their industries.

"The large firms which have closed down in the area include the Guayana iron industry, whose equipment will be sold to another country.

"Other firms are surviving as a result of an effort being made by the Venezuelan Corporation of Guayana, in Interalumina, representing an investment of about 1.1 billion bolivares. It is the only one that is supporting the medium-sized metalworking firms."

The Stalled Projects

The updating of a series of projects which have been stalled or postponed is a means of reactivating the Guayana economy. They include the SIDOR seamless tube plant, part of Plan IV, whose product has a guaranteed market in the development of the Orinoco petroliferous strip.

The demand for seamless tubing in the new oil-producing areas will be approximately 300,000 tons per year. In its old plant, SIDOR could produce about 100,000 tons, indicating that there will be a need to import 200,000 tons per year, with a flight of hard currency amounting to 1 billion bolivares.

Francisco Natera remarked: "Gen Rafael Alfonzo Ravard, president of Venezuelan Petroleum, assured us that if two plants are built in Guayana to manufacture tubing, the oil industry will absorb the entire production. This is why we cannot understand why construction on the plant has been halted. It will cost much more money within a few years, owing to the international inflation."

The development of bauxite on Los Pijiguaos hill is another project that is stalled. In this connection, the Venezuelan Investment Fund is of the opinion that it is more economical to import the mineral (a raw material for the Interalumina factory) than to extract it in Guayana.

Unemployment

"It has increased considerably. In the construction industry, we had to act through third parties in order to obtain a worker. Nowadays, when one visits the project, there are between 20 and 30 persons on the site seeking employment.

"This situation has also been reflected in the Chamber of Construction of the Caroni District. Its finances have declined because of the fact that the 120 business firms registered have been reduced to half that number. The majority of building firms have left the area or have gone bankrupt."

Housing

Insofar as housing is concerned, the status of Ciudad Guayana appears somewhat contradictory. The economic "boom" fostered migration and immigration, giving rise to a group of slums on the outskirts, with shacks built with zinc roofs and walls, which seem to multiply the normal high temperature in the area.

In contrast to that situation, there are many apartment buildings for which there is no market. The initial rents of from 12,000 to 15,000 bolivares remind us of Caracas during the 1960's, but there are very few buyers. There are approximately 3,200 empty apartments.

Natera commented: "There is a need for housing, but no ability to pay."

Moreover, one notes many buildings under construction which is virtually at a standstill. Very few workers are engaged in continuing the project, in view of the concerned apprehension of the promoters.

"The lack of financing from the savings and loan entities and the mortgage banks is also playing a major role in this. The terms of up to 20 years and the countless requisites that the buyer must meet are diverting the interest toward the renting of housing."

Inefficiency or Lack of Confidence?

In response to a question, Francisco Natera claimed that the general situation exhibited by the Guayana business firms is not a result of the inefficiency of their managers, but rather of a lack of confidence

"All these things are causing a withdrawal by investors, which is halting development, because no one can plan investments with the 'perhaps' used by the public sector as a definition."

"What do the business owners propose?"

"That the government determine the situation, that it tell us what is going to become of SIDOR, whose status is distressing. It lacks the funds for its normal operations, and they will not give it money because of a lack of a determination of policy and contradictions in the economic office, which will not approve the loans required by the firm."

"If this situation is not corrected, what will the immediate future of the area be?"

"We do not see any prospects. The private firms are failing, and those of the state are losing their capital. The government must seek a market for SIDOR's products, so that its production will not be cut for lack of customers. But, most of all, the public sector needs to accept dialog with the private economy; because the general situation that is apparent is helping to create complete confusion.

"The public services, the high rate of inflation and the hesitancy of business owners to invest are creating a feeling of frustration, which should be avoided, because the future of Guayana is involved in this...."

[17 Sep 80, p D-3]

[Text] Ciudad Guayana, 16 Sep --Unemployment resulting from the difficult situation facing both the private business firms and the state's basic industries is assuming desperate features for the labor union leadership, which is the focal point of pressure every day from the workers seeking jobs.

The core of the problem lies in the Caroni District, site of the plants of the major state iron and steel complex. Over 50 firms have closed thus far this year, while SIDOR, ALCASA [Caroni Aluminum Company], VENALUM [Aluminum Company of Venezuela] and VENBOZEL, as well as the small and medium-sized industries operating around them, are unable to absorb labor.

It may be claimed that employment is at a standstill, with the exacerbating factor that the firms are retiring workers and not replacing them, owing to the stagnation of the economy in the state of Bolivar resulting from the crisis that has been cropping out in the Orinoco Iron and Steelworks (SIDOR).

The Situation Is Desperate

The secretary-treasurer of the Bolivar State Workers Federation (FETRABOLIVAR), Jose I. Guilarte, received us at the headquarters of the labor federation which has over 90,000 members, in the capital of this federal entity.

Guilarte said that there must be greater concern on the part of the state to avoid the failure of the small and medium-sized companies, so that the employment levels may thereby be maintained.

He remarked: "The National Tractor Factory was closed, and there were only two workers left, doing maintenance work on the equipment. There are rumors that Mack will follow the same course of action, because the government has not made any clearcut determination regarding the automotive industry and because of the lack of a market for its products. These companies cannot keep the personnel and they will fail."

"What has the percentage of increase in the unemployment rate been?"

"We are taking a census, but it can be said that the figure is rather high. SIDOR has been gradually retiring workers, employed as shift foremen with long experience, many of whom have been working for 15 years. This is quite unfortunate, because such experience is necessary in an industry as important as iron and steel."

He also mentioned the layoff of 60 workers at ALCASA, several of whom were union leaders; but he noted that FETRABOLIVAR, together with the ALCASA union and FETRAMETAL [Metal Workers Federation], are seeking the means for rehiring that personnel. The company's board of directors has already reconsidered 10 cases.

"What is the cause for the area's economic problem, the closing of companies?"

"Unquestionably the lack of incentives from the national executive branch in the financial area. Some firms which were created 4 or 5 years ago have found themselves abandoned, and this is forcing them into bankruptcy."

FETRABOLIVAR is taking a census of all the firms which have gone out of business. To date, the figure exceeds 50.

"If the national executive branch is concerned about maintaining the area's business firms, many could be saved; but with things going as slowly as they have been, we do not see a solution to the problem, and the situation is becoming worse each day."

Jose I. Guilarte makes an off the cuff remark: "If the situation remains this way, the day will not be far off when business owners and workers unite to demand a just solution."

He said: "The business owners have the ability to run the industries, and hence we do not agree with the claim that has been made of their being inefficient. They are individuals trained to run their companies, but what has been missing is the state's playing a part and determining clearcut policies on development; because the stocks are declining, and there are no possibilities in view for the building of new industries."

Guilarte admitted being a member of Democratic Action, a party which dominates the FETRABOLIVAR executive committee, with 14 of its 23 secretaries. The entity is headed by Angel Zerpa Mirabal. The other political parties with representation are COPEI [Social Christian Party], with five secretaries, and MAS [Movement for Socialism], MEP [People's Electoral Movement], PCV [Communist Party of Venezuela] and Morena, with one apiece.

The Failure of the Economic Policy Can Be Bet Upon

Upon returning to Ciudad Guayana, we interviewed the board members of the Single Union of Iron and Steel Industry Workers (SUTISS).

They are all young, having risen to the union leadership through their membership or support for Cause R, GAR [Revolutionary Action Groups], the Socialist League, the Committee of Popular Struggles, the Independent Workers Movement, MIR [Movement of the Revolutionary Left]-Americo and Democratic Action. The MAS was ousted in the last elections, together with COPEI.

Eleuterio Benitez, secretary general of SUTISS, dealt with the special correspondent. He remarked that the situation being experienced by the iron zone is due "to the government's economic policy, which has been reflected throughout the entire country, with particular emphasis on Guayana, which is the area with the highest rate of inflation and unemployment, with a policy of layoffs in all the private firms and in the state companies."

He added: "We are experiencing a rather critical situation with respect to unemployment, which has forced many unions to resort to protection methods, such as immobility, and to mass action, so as to curb this policy of layoffs and fight for the constitutional right to work, which is currently being threatened."

Benitez said that there are other problems which they would attempt to solve in the new collective contract with SIDOR. The one now in effect will expire on 7 December.

The first demand will be the 40-hour work week (it is currently 48). Another important demand is the wage increase, with the aspiration of 40 bolivares per day for laboring personnel, which would bring the total to 92 bolivares per day.

Conflict in SIDOR

The leader added: "This new contract is very important to the union, because it is surrounded by a serious economic and labor situation. The union leadership is maintaining a strong position to obtain demands in whatever way necessary, including conflict."

This would be the first time since 1971 that there has been the possibility of a conflict in SIDOR, "owing to the deterioration in working conditions and demands that have been refused for a long time; but the movement has acquired insight and organization, and it will fight."

Before discussing the unemployment in the area, Benitez noted that, "If the company has problems, the only ones to blame are those heading it. The working class does not acknowledge any responsibility."

He claimed that there were 30,000 unemployed in Guayana, essentially because of the decline in the construction industry and the layoffs at ALCASA, HARBOR and SIDOR.

"Can the closing of business firms be linked with the implementation of the Law on Wage and Salary Increases?"

The secretary general of SUTISS admitted that the wage hike might have had some effect, but attributed the essence of the problem to the government's economic policy, aimed at streamlining the economy. "Within a few years, this government will be unable to show positive results from the economic system that it has applied, which has caused upsets of all kinds: the closing of business firms, unemployment and an entire series of social evils, because it has insisted on a policy that has failed in other countries with more centralized economies."

Eleuterio Benitez commented: "The failure of this economic policy can be bet upon, with a great chance of winning."

Right To Work.

"On which sectors has the economic stagnation had the greatest repercussions?"

"The construction sector, which is a highly volatile industry that has been seriously affected by a policy such as the current one; but metalworking companies, like FANATRACTO have closed also. If it is opened, it would be at the government's decision, but it is closed."

"Why is there no employment?"

"Because of the effects of the economic policy itself. The state is obliged to guarantee the right to work, and it is not guaranteeing it. On the one hand, it is forcing people into unemployment and, on the other, it is not offering them the right stipulated in the National Constitution, a human right, if you will."

"Has the rotation of personnel been curtailed?"

"It has declined, owing to the same economic situation. People think and know that there are no jobs, and they are more cautious about work. That 'boom' in Guayana, in which people left one company and joined another, because of the great demand, has changed completely."

An Emergency Plan

"What would you propose to correct the upsets that exist?"

The answer was preceded by the political factor. "There has been a careless leadership of the country and of industries. We had a government which started a series of industrial plans that gave employment to a large number of workers, including artificial jobs, as in the case of services; but another government has come and attempted to rationalize that situation. We blame all this weakness on the management of policy, which is to a large extent responsible for the disasters; but any set of measures would have to depend on government decisions, on which the labor sector has no influence."

Benitez claimed that "everything is in a state of crisis" in Guayana: the public services and medical services, and now unemployment.

"There is only one hospital in Ciudad Guayana, but they do not operate on anyone, because all the operating rooms are at a standstill, owing to the lack of air conditioning."

We interrupted: "We are waiting for the answer to the question."

"It would appear that what the country needs is an emergency plan which would enable it to deal with this entire problem, with in depth solutions in all areas; but there is no evidence of them anywhere. We hope that the government will be able to change this situation, although it is rather unlikely, because it is not even stealing ideas. If it cannot think, it should adopt the ideas of others. Intelligent people do that to simplify their work."

"In view of SIDOR's influence in the community, there is the view that if there is pressure for excessive wage hikes, new inflationary repercussions would appear in the area...."

"Our requests are sensible. We are seeking an increase of 40 bolivares per day for all of the plant's workers; because, according to the Central Bank, the inflation rate in the area is the highest in the country. We believe that this increase represents a legitimate aspiration of the workers, whose present average income is 52 bolivares."

He pointed out that more money in the worker's hands does not guarantee him greater purchasing power.

"In any event, it would serve to mitigate the crisis that exists in purchasing products consumed daily."

During the interview, we were joined by other leaders: Santos Mendez, secretary of organization, and Gabriel Moreno, secretary of labor and claims, listened carefully to the comments of the leader Eleuterio Benitez, a worker who came to SIDOR 8 years ago and who has now been converted into the top-ranking defender of his union comrades....

FBIS FOREIGN BROADCAST INFORMATION SERVICE

NOTE

JPRS publications contain information primarily from foreign newspapers, periodicals and books, but also from news agency transmissions and broadcasts. Materials from foreign-language sources are translated; those from English-language sources are transcribed or reprinted, with the original phrasing and other characteristics retained.

Headlines, editorial reports, and material enclosed in brackets [] are supplied by JPRS. Processing indicators such as [Text] or [Excerpt] in the first line of each item, or following the last line of a brief, indicate how the original information was processed. Where no processing indicator is given, the information was summarized or extracted.

Unfamiliar names rendered phonetically or transliterated are enclosed in parentheses. Words or names preceded by a question mark and enclosed in parentheses were not clear in the original but have been supplied as appropriate in context. Other unattributed parenthetical notes within the body of an item originate with the source. Times within items are as given by source.

The contents of this publication in no way represent the policies, views or attitudes of the U.S. Government.

PROCUREMENT OF PUBLICATIONS

JPRS publications may be ordered from the National Technical Information Service, Springfield, Virginia 22161. In ordering, it is recommended that the JPRS number, title, date and author, if applicable, of publication be cited.

Current JPRS publications are announced in Government Reports Announcements issued semi-monthly by the National Technical Information Service, and are listed in the Monthly Catalog of U.S. Government Publications issued by the Superintendent of Documents, U.S. Government Printing Office, Washington, D.C. 20402.

Indexes to this report (by keyword, author, personal names, title and series) are available from Bell & Howell, Old Mansfield Road, Wooster, Ohio 44691.

Correspondence pertaining to matters other than procurement may be addressed to Joint Publications Research Service, 1000 North Glebe Road, Arlington, Virginia 22201.

BRIEFS

ARGENTINE'S DISAPPEARANCE FROM BRAZIL--Porto Alegre, 30 Sep (AFP)--Lawyer Omar Ferri charged today that Argentine priest Jorge Oscar Adur, who disappeared here last July, was eliminated by security forces on his own country. Ferri, who was designated by the Brazilian Democratic Movement Party (PMDB) of the opposition to investigate the disappearance of the Argentine priest, stressed that all the information he has collected indicates that Jorge Oscar Adur was eliminated by Argentine forces. He added that he could not obtain more information which could indicate whether the 48-year-old priest was kidnapped and taken to Argentina or went there of his own will. According to information published by the Brazilian press, Adur had been a member of the People's Revolutionary Army (ERP), an extreme leftist organization, since 1978, when he was in exile in France. After spending some time in Cuernavaca, Mexico, Adur went to Porto Alegre last July under the name of Pedro Ramon Altamirano and then to Argentina. POLITICAL LEADER PROMOTES CENTRIST PARTY MOVEMENT

Buenos Aires CONVICCION in Spanish 21 Aug 80 p 10

[Interview with Jose Eduardo de Cara, secretary general of the Progressive Democratic Party (PDP); date and place not given]

[Text] Jose Eduardo de Cara, secretary general of the Progressive Democratic Party, and one of the eight politicians who in recent days shared a meal at the Hotel Claridge with Maj Gen Albano Eduardo Harguindeguy, minister of interior, and presidential adviser Francisco Noyano, explained his intention of promoting "the construction of a truly progressive and alternative force for the country."

[Question] Whom does the Progressive Democratic Party represent? Is it a party of a provincial nature or is it national in scope?

[Answer] The PDP is a party with a national calling of a liberal and progressive nature, which aspires to represent a broad sector of the Argentine citizenry, with the intention of building a modern country in order, justice, and with freedom for all.

[Question] Don't you believe that the ideas the progressive democrats support exist on the basis of the memory of Lisandro de la Torre?

[Answer] Logically, the ideas of the founder of the party, along with a group of notables, have had a profound effect on party life. But the PDP has tried always to incorporate in its ideology and its thinking all of the trends in the contemporary world.

[Question] For a considerable time now, the PDP has maintained contact with the Social Democratic Party and the Christian Democratic Union for the purpose of promoting a common idea.

What common ground has been found and what has the purpose of these talks been?

[Answer] The talks with the Social Democratic Party began in 1975, in an attempt to achieve the integration of a large national political movement which would make possible the establishment of a modern and efficient democracy in the republic, along with recovery from chaos and an end to subversion. Our party proposed the establishment of a great democratic alternative which at that time did not exist.

[Question] Now that more than 4 months have passed since the beginning of the political dialog, what has been achieved?

[Answer] I believe that there has been a positive achievement in the so-called political dialog to the extent that all the political parties interviewed by the minister of interior were able to express their thinking clearly and consistently.

[Question] Does the PDP continue to support the idea, as evidenced in its participation in the dialog, of a popular consultation through a referendum to mobilize the country? And on the basis of what themes would this be done?

[Answer] When we had our interview with the minister of interior, the idea of a referendum was suggested in order to effect a sort of mobilization of the citizenry in connection with specific problems, pertaining in all cases to the municipal realm. This was the plan, so that the referendum would be a kind of exercise in citizens' participation in the concrete problems of cities or towns.

[Question] On the basis of the dinner with Mr Harguindeguy, can it be said that the necessary arrangements have now been made for the formation of a centrist front or group?

[Answer] The talk with Minister Harguindeguy was a form of broadening the political dialog. The minister had engaged in dialog with various sectors in Argentine political life, but representatives of the various political trends corresponding to the moderate parties in the country had never sat down at the table together. I think this was a talk to bring the various sectors closer together, and in the future it will be valuable in an effort to establish contacts and links making possible the construction of a truly progressive and alternative force in the country.

[Answer] I think that the idea of achieving integration of a new political force is not contrary to the preexistence of earlier political groups. Political groups are not born or created by decrees. They are the products of time and correspond to a great historical tradition. In the case of the Social Democratic Party, the National Party and the Progressive Democratic Party, one cannot talk solely of effecting a federation of parties of this nature. We have a long historical tradition, with more than 60 years in the service of the country, and there is within the party the idea of retaining individuality. But without threatening that, we believe that we can contribute with our efforts to the formation of a great civic movement representing the neglected aspirations of vast sectors in the country and serving as a democratic alternative for the next constitutional government.

[Answer] It is not an electoral alliance, but the beginning of the formation of a great civic movement which, in the form of an alliance, seeks to serve as a tool for the government or the opposition, as the case may be, but always in the service of the republic and of a permanent nature.

[Question] For what reason does this type of alliance in an attempt to form a centrist front generally emerge from a de facto government?

[Answer] Not only on the basis of a de facto government. In 1914 the PDP engaged in an alliance, and we were not a part of a de facto regime. What happens is that often the same trend of thought among the citizens is represented by various political parties. We must not forget the federal nature of the country. Currently, there are several parties of a provincial nature which do not have adequate national representation, and there are even national parties which do not have representation in all the districts. Thus, with the federal aspect in mind, an effort is made to create a political movement which will link the activities of the national parties with those in the interior.

[Question] Can this alliance offer an electoral alternative to the two parties with a traditional majority, specifically the Peronists and the radicals?

[Answer] We believe it can, and we think that it will be an alternative for the Argentine people, who have always had to express themselves through options of a negative nature, whereas this time they can vote affirmatively.

MOLFINO CASE STRAINS DIPLOMATIC RELATIONS WITH SPAIN

Damaging Press Reports

Buenos Aires LA PRENSA in Spanish 26 Aug 80 p 10

[Article by J. Iglesias Rouco: "Death of Man Presumed 'Missing' in Madrid and Government Daily Attack on Argentine Government"]

[Text] Madrid--The so-called "Molfino case," involving an Argentine citizen whose body was found on 21 July in a downtown Madrid apartment, has kept Spanish public opinion in uncertainty for some days and has become a new factor in the political and diplomatic tension between Spain and Argentina. It was precisely one of the daily newspapers controlled by the government of Prime Minister Adolfo Suarez which led a propaganda campaign, harsher still than that of the Argentine exiles and the local left wing, against the government in Buenos Aires, which it accuses of having murdered Mrs Noemi Gianetti de Molfino here.

This affair, already rather involved because of the circumstances and the propaganda since the finding of the body, became more complicated last week after the arrival in Spain of Mrs Alejandra Molfino, daughter of the above-mentioned woman and an exile in Paris. Alejandra, who came to Madrid with her brother Gustavo (also an exile) to identify their mother's body, told DIARIO 16 on 20 August that the body found in Madrid was not that of Mrs Molfino. However, a few hours later, Alejandra Molfino herself partially amended her statement and said simply that she was unable to identify the body from the photographs the police had provided.

At the request of the Molfino children and their lawyer, socialist leader Pablo Castellano, the judge ordered the body exhumed, and this was done at noon on Monday, the 25th. Alejandra then stated that it was in fact the body of her mother, basing her identification on a malformation of one foot.

DIARIO 16 Campaign

The scandal promoted in Spanish political circles--above all by DIARIO 16 --about this case, and the very serious accusations made not only against Buenos Aires but the Spanish police as well have led the authorities to undertake an investigation of the reasons for the death of Mrs Molfino, despite the fact that the Madrid police had already said, after the required autopsy, that "no indication whatsoever of violence" was revealed. It is then a question which will continue to develop, probably in ill-defined fashion, subject to all kinds of propaganda activities on the part of the sectors involved. As is known, Mrs Molfino was engaged--although apparently she was not one of the so-called May Square mothers--in work on behalf of the Argentine citizens presumed "missing" and in prison, with international institutions and political groups, as well as various activities denouncing the Argentine military authorities.

For the time being, the only firm information comes from the above-mentioned statement by the police headquarters in Madrid, dated 8 August, which in addition to noting the lack of any evidence of violence to the body, and in view of the "contradictory reports" which "have been appearing in the media," specifies the following:

"1. Said Argentine citizen arrived in Madrid-Barajas on 18 July on a flight coming from Brazil. She traveled alone on false identity documents. She was met by her compatriots, who accompanied her to the apartment on Tutor Street, which they had rented some days earlier.

"The body was found on 21 July. Two other Argentine citizens occupied the apartment with the deceased until the 19th, on which day, at 2100 hours, they were last seen."

The Argentine ambassador to Spain, Mr Washington Ferreira, for his part, announced when the body was identified that this was evidence of the maneuvers of Argentine subversive organizations abroad, since Mrs Molfino had until then been among the "missing."

Since then, DIARIO 16 and some socialist and communist periodicals have increased, if possible, the "contradictory versions" to which the police referred, and DIARIO 16, after using openly slanderous charges in the headlines for one of its editions--"Argentine Embassy Den of Assassins"--carried various editorials, some of them focused directly on the person of Ambassador Washington Perreira, whom this daily termed "Washington, the Evil." Naturally, the newspaper assumed the truth of the report of the Argentine exiles to the effect that Mrs Molfino was kidnaped in the company of three other persons in Peru by Argentine secret agents, and later taken to Madrid and assassinated. On this point, it totally ignored the police statement according to which Mrs Molfino arrived in Spain alone. No other daily newspaper, even those with open leftist sympathies, went as far.

Government Participation

This "definitive" position on the part of DIARIO 16 with regard to a case still under court investigation, and without a doubt very far from having been clarified, is of double interest because the Spanish state, or government, or members of it, are important stockholders in the newspaper's publishing enterprise, and a state secretary, Mr Josep Melia, who is precisely the official spokesman for the cabinet and a personal friend of Suarez, is the individual who plays the greatest role in the publication of DIARIO 16 and in the establishment of its political and editorial policy. In the final analysis, if DIARIO 16 accuses the Argentine representatives of being "assassins," it is in good measure the government which is making the accusation.

This circumstance, apart from the others involved in the matter, represents a real attack on the already deteriorating relations between Spain and Argentina. Highly reliable sources have told us, moreover, about some of the reasons which may have led Mr Melia to his current attack on the Videla government. Apparently, a relative of the secretary of state, a former member of the so-called People's Revolutionary Army (ERP), is in prison in Argentina charged with subversive activity.

The charges made in connection with the Molfino case were supplemented--again by DIARIO 16, which reprinted a report from the periodical STERN--by other reports of presumed "weapons traffic" from Germany to the Argentine armed forces, "for which Spain is providing 'cover,'" according to DIARIO 16. The newspaper mentions the Asturian port of Gijon and a weapons factory in Oviedo as the location of the shipment and assembly of anti-aircraft guns "under the supervision of Argentine military personnel."

Never, even when Peron's second wife heaped coarse epithets on the Spanish ambassador in Buenos Aires, Mr Areilza, 30 years ago, who was moreover a great sympathizer with the Justicialist cause in those days, have diplomatic links between the two nations seemed as precarious as they do today.

Embassy Protests Implications

[Article by J. Iglesias Rouco: "Argentine Ambassador to Spain To Report to Government on Molfino Case"]

[Text] Madrid, 28 Aug -- The Argentine ambassador to Spain will travel to Buenos Aires shortly "to report" to General Videla's government on what in diplomatic language is usually called "subjects of mutual interest." These "subjects" will probably focus on the so-called Molfino case, thanks to which the ambassador personally and the government in Buenos Aires have been the target of very serious charges made here by Argentine exiles and some Spanish political publications.

Although the Argentine embassy has made no statement about this trip, it has been learned that Ambassador Jorge Washington Ferreira will travel to Buenos Aires during the first week of September after receiving a request for "information" in this connection from the Argentine Foreign Ministry. Some diplomatic circles do not exclude the possibility that the Argentine authorities have decided to "indicate" their displeasure with the attacks made against the embassy and the military government in Buenos Aires by DIARIO 16.

Verbal Protest

At the beginning of this month, the Argentine embassy presented a verbal protest to the Spanish Ministry of Foreign Affairs concerning the above-mentioned attacks, some of which, it said, were openly slanderous both to the ambassador personally and to the government of his country. From what we have learned, the ministry responded that although it naturally does not share the opinions voiced by the exiles and DIARIO 16 at all, neither can it take action against those responsible because of the freedom of the press and expression which currently exist in Spain.

In this connection, the Foreign Ministry is said to have noted that the only legal recourse available to the embassy is to be found in the so-called right of reply, for which Spanish press legislation provides, and a court suit against the authors of the charges. Apparently, the Argentine diplomatic authorities have not pursued either of these forms of recourse.

Nor has the embassy taken any action on what Spanish police experts regard as a flagrant omission by the local authorities. When the death of Mrs Noemi Esther Gianetti de Molfino was discovered on 21 July in Madrid, the Argentine consulate was given no official information about the case, as is required under such circumstances.

It was not until later, when the investigation had already begun, as had the flood of accusations from Argentine refugees, that the Spanish authorities asked for the cooperation of Interpol and the Argentine police in identifying the body. A former Spanish diplomat, uninvolved in this matter, termed this attitude one of "prejudice" on the part of the Spanish authorities.

Police Find Trail

The daily newspaper YA, the unofficial voice of the Spanish Church, has just published two extensive reports on the Molfino case. It was stated in the first that the whole affair was "a set-up by the opposition to Videla," while the second said that "the police found evidence of two Montoneros near the body." These two points were confirmed to this reporter yesterday by highly reliable police sources.

According to YA, this evidence--fingerprints--matched the prints of two men sent by Interpol in Buenos Aires. "They proved to belong," the newspaper said, "to Argentine citizens Julio Cesar Ramirez and Luis Esteban Almiron, both members of the Peronist Montonero Movement. If this is true," YA added, "it would be absurd to think that Mrs Molfino was assassinated, as is now claimed by the Argentine Human Rights Commission" (and the children of Mrs Molfino, Alejandra and Gustavo).

This and other newspapers have also reported that some shoes, a towel and a cosmetic product, all purchased in Argentina, were found near Mrs Molfino's body, "which might indicate," they said, "that Noemi entered the country illegally on 23 April of this year, as the Peruvian authorities maintain."

Mrs Molfino's children said recently that the final destination of their mother's last trip was not Madrid, but Rome, as is shown by the ticket issued in her name by the Brazilian airline, Varig. However, the Madrid weekly EL CASO, which specializes in police matters, stated in its last issue that "it has been clearly demonstrated that the ticket only covered the trip between Sao Paulo and Madrid."

Propaganda Campaign

The daily newspaper YA, liberal in orientation, concluded its last report as follows: "All of this presumed plot built around the Molfino case seems to be a part of a campaign directed against the military regime of Argentine dictator Jorge Videla, and the matter could only be entirely clarified if the arrest of one of the Montoneros who was with the victim in the last hours of her life took place, which could happen shortly."

Little more is known, except that the judicial police experts have now made more than 30 analyses of the body and that one of the charges made by the Argentine Human Rights Commission in Madrid, to the effect that it is suspicious that a Buenos Aires daily could publish a report of the death of Mrs Molfino on 24 July, a matter of hours after the crime was revealed, seems to be baseless because of the fact that the Spanish daily PUEBLO had already carried reports of the crime on the 22nd and 23rd, one of them in considerable detail.

After the body was found, groups of refugees also asserted confidently that Mrs Molfino had been kidnaped in Lima along with her son Gustavo. Gustavo Molfino later appeared in Madrid to identify the remains.

FURTHER PRESS COMMENTARY ON MILITARY DRUG CONNECTION

Officials Linked to Drugs

Mexico City EL DIA in Spanish 26 Aug 80 p 16

[Article by Gregorio Selser: "At The Request of the Military Regime A Miami Judge Frees Drug Trafficker"]

[Text] On the eve of the beginning of hearings by a U.S. Senate subcommittee called by Senator Dennis DeConcini, Democrat from Arizona, for the investigation of public threats made by Col Luis Arce Gomez, Bolivian minister of interior,on a greater "flow" of narcotics traffic toward the United States, new revelations are shaking the present calm climate of Washington.

The main point now is the surprising release of Alfredo ("Cutuchi") Gutierrez ordered by the courts of Miami. He is a 44-year-old Bolivian, owner of a cattle ranch and an air taxi company of the department of Santa Cruz de la Sierra in eastern Bolivia.

As we reported in a recent story, Gutierrez and his friend Jose Roberto Gasser Terrassas were arrested in May 1980 in Miami by federal agents of the Drug Enforcement Agency (DEA), the agency for the suppression of drug traffic, when they were attempting to "pass" 854 pounds of pure cocaine (some 390 kg), considered the largest quantity of smuggled drugs intercepted at one time up to that time by the authorities.

Two Entrepeneurs, Captains of Industry

"Cutuchi" Gutierrez is the son of Dario Gutierrez, powerful sugar manufacturer in Santa Cruz and at the same time owner of the rightwing newspaper EL MUNDO, and a prominent figure in the terrorist organization Bolivian Socialist Falange (FSB).

Jose Roberto Gasser Terrassas, "businessman" of 37 years-of-age, is the son of "Old Man Gasser," who began his career as a smuggler of anything from Paraguay and wound up as a powerful figure in the sugar manufacturing branch. The son opened the "branch agency" of narcotics traffic at the same time that he worked as president of the Santa Cruz Chamber of Commerce and Industry, president of the Bolivian Private Industry Federation, a member of the board of directors of EL MUNDO and also a prominent figure in the FSB and presumably its largest financial supporter.

Both captains of industry accomplished the feat of the record single shipment of cocaine (854 pounds), although they could not conclude the operation with complete success. The judge who heard the case set bond of one million dollars—yes, dollars--which Gasser Terrassas paid without blinking, after which he left the United States. Less lucky than he, Gutierrez was bound under a bond of three million dollars, which because it was not paid,caused him to be held in a Dade County jail.

The Garcia Meza Dictatorship Blesses Gutierrez

The scandal today consists of the revelation that on 30 June--the coup of the Cocadollars took place on 17 July--a Florida state court reduced the three-million-dollar bond to just one million, which Gutierrez paid immediately and in turn left for Bolivia. Questioned by the press, the members of the aforementioned court argued that the reduction was based on the fact that the criminal resorted to legal rules which allow the prolonging of an investigation for gathering more proof against the accused. Since Miami newsmen are very alert because several weeks ago it was revealed that some judges were being bribed by the world drug traffic Maffia, they nosed about in the records until they discovered that Gutierrez while in prison presented a statement sworn before the court, whose text, signed by high-level Bolivian officials, among them the present minister of interior, Col Luis Arce Gomez, told of the lack of a prior criminal record by Gutierrez, attesting to his "good character and nature."

The fact that there is no prior criminal record is nothing more than proof of how tainted Bolivian justice is because Gutierrez, as well as Gasser Terrassas, are very well known in their country as important figures in drug smuggling. The court set the trial date for next October on which date it is taken for granted that neither criminal will show his face in the United States. The lawyer for both of them in Miami, Jeffrey Weiner, up to now has shown great skill in avoiding reporters who want to ask questions about his clients.

The Bank of America Also

The surprising thing about this puzzle, which has moved from Miami to Washington, is the appearance of Carlos Aguirre, Bank of America agent in Bolivia. Drug traffic also appears to be mixed up in here, based on an incident which took place in 1975 in which two Bolivians were arrested in Montreal, Canada, for illegal traffic in cocaine. At that time Gen Hugo Banzer was the president. One of those arrested in Canada, named Canedo, worked as Banzer's private secretary; the other was Edwin Tapia Frontanilla, as of that moment nicknamed "cocainilla."

The arrest of both drug traffickers provided a new ingredient to the suspicions harbored by the Canadian police: that the Bolivian consul general in Montreal, "Chito" Valle Urena, Banzer's son-in-law, was mixed up in the "connection." His strong defense of Canedo and Tapia Frontanilla automatically changed the suspicion to almost a proof. Since he could not be arrested because of his official position, the police simply linked his name to the others and let La Paz know about it. His family thus affected (another member, nephew Guillermo "Willy" Banzer Abastoflor, was to be arrested for drug trafficking in the United States), the dictator asked Carlos Aguirre, official of the Bank of America, to "investigate" the charges. Aguirre went to Canada and on his return reported that "Chito" Valle Urena was innocent of "guilt and charges." At any rate, he was quietly removed as consul and transferred to another place. It was only then that Banzer invited the Bolivian Journalists Association so that it could make its own investigation.

The trade union organization declined such an honor, suggesting that it had doubts about the "proofs" provided by Aguirre. The latter was recompensed with a trial position in the Supreme Court of Justice, which as a general rule is attained only after a distinguished career as a lawyer of advanced age or as a legal expert. When Banzer fell, Aguirre was removed from the Supreme Court and returned to his work in the Bank of America.

Concentric Circles

The fact is that at this time the Bank of America is the visible head of the banking-financial group from which the regime of Luis Garcia Meza is negotiating a postponement of the nearly $160 million interest payment on Bolivia's debt. That group of creditors includes Citibank, Manufacturers Hanover Trust, Libra Bank and the Bank of Nova Scotia, both of the latter of Canada.

The Bank of America is not only assigned the work of piloting the operation of postponement but also the "restructuring" of the foreign debt, which is estimated at some $3.6 billion dollars and which this year alone amounted to $626 million. By pure coincidence it turns out that the son-in-law of Carlos Aguirre, Jorge Surco, has been appointed Bolivian charge d'affaires in the United States. Surco has been given the task of the profuse distribution in the news media of Washington, New York and other cities, of a document titled "The Government of Bolivia is Facing an Insidious Campaign," whose text is aimed at distorting the charges made against several of the military men now holding key posts in the government and who are implicated in, and closely connected to, the traffic in cocaine.

Finances, drug traffic, ultraright militarism, professional anti-communism and smuggling roll and unroll in concentric circles, forming a tight mesh, never as thick as it is now. As THE NEW YORK TIMES said: For the first time in the world the drug traffic Maffia has taken over a government.

Colonels Arce and Salomon

The most conspicuous figure in drug traffic and smuggling continues to be Minister of Interior Col Luis Arce Gomez, who was also the mastermind behind the thwarted military coup of November 1979 and that of last 17 July. It was he who publicly threatened the United States with "flooding it with cocaine" if it halted its economic aid.

Arce, together with retired Col Noberto "Bubi" Salomon, are owners of an airtaxi company and a flying school named "Oasis of the Air." In Banzer's time, Salomon was commander of the Air Fighter Group and later minister of urban affairs. In February 1980 an aircraft of his company crashed shortly after takeoff. When the authorities investigated, they discovered that the wrecked aircraft contained 310 kilos of cocaine paste. It was only on the next day after the crash, when the news about the drug was already public. Salomon appeared charging that the wrecked airplane had been stolen, a story which of course no one believed.

This incident caused him to be appointed military attache of the embassy in Venezuela. On 2 June, another airplane of Oasis of the Air, rashly leased by the UDP [People's Democratic Union] and on which presidential candidate Hernan Siles Zuazo was to travel, crashed shortly after takeoff and the crew and passengers were killed with the exception of Jaime Paz Zamora, candidate for vice president of the UDP. Obviously there was sabotage, although Salomon and Arce initiated a claim against the insurance company for "the accident."

Offer of $70 million For "Initial Costs"

In its 15 August edition the LATIN AMERICA WEEKLY REPORT (London, WR-80-32, "Bolivia: Garcia Meza Seeks a Mainline Solution," p 10) provides this news:

"Some of the closest supporters and advisers of the new Bolivian government appear to be thinking seriously of legalizing the growing of coca, as a source of income to replace the most traditional foreign aid programs, if they are canceled. Foreign correspondents were consulted on the subject two weeks ago in La Paz. Last week, Minister of Interior Col Luis Arce, who it is supposed has more than a passing interest on the subject, said to the correspondent of the Spanish news agency EFE that if the United States halts its aid, including the program for controlling drug traffic, it will have to bear the consequences." The correspondence reproduced the arguments for the legalization of cocaine in terms superior to those used normally for the legalization of cannabis.

"The mental stability of Colonel Arce has also been placed in doubt in U.S. diplomatic circles. But no one has seriously questioned the support of the all-powerful drug Maffia to the Garcia Meza coup. A NEW YORK TIMES correspondent said to LATIN AMERICA WEEKLY REPORT that he has evidence that a group of the drug traffic Maffia of Santa Cruz went to La Paz the first week after the coup to offer the new government more than $70 million as an immediate financial support to cover the payment of the amortization of the debt due immediately. The implication of those interests in the new regime undoubtedly has strengthened opposition to it by foreign governments.

"Other observers have described the supporters of the present regime as "political lumpen," and undoubtedly the lack of support of any significant political force is noticeable. With Garcia Meza are working members of the FSB, which was virtually ignored as a political force in the last elections (where it obtained fewer than 20,000 votes). His government also includes members of the dissident faction of the MNR [National Revolutionary Movement] headed by Guillermo Bedregal, who was also involved in the Natusch coup last November."

There is an overabundance of reports on the "Bolivian narcotics connection" in Washington. It was for some reason that officials of the DEA responsible for drug traffic control worked in Bolivia from some years back up to now. There is an overflow of information on that connection in INTERPOL and about the second international business in importance in that country: smuggling. The federal police of Argentina, Peru and Brazil also have extensive dossiers on the subject, although they remain silent for explicable reasons of the political times. However, it will be enough for the United States and Interpol to publish what they know for the entire Garcia Meza and Arce Gomez team to be vomited from power by the clean elements of the Bolivian Army, which although in the minority, do exist.

Brazilian Magazine Comments

Mexico City EL DIA in Spanish 27 Aug 80 p 12

[Article by Gregorio Selser: "The Brazilian Magazine VEJA Also Links the Coup With Drug Traffic"]

[Text] In its edition of last 30 July, the Brazilian weekly VEJA of Sao Paulo published a story on pages 33-34 titled "A Subsidiary of the Coup," in which it referred to a tragic-comic story.

A few days after the Coup of the Cocadollars--17 July--a group of Bolivians, who supported the putsch by Luis Garcia Meza and Luis Arce Gomez invaded Brazilian territory on the border with Bolivia, occupying the consulate of that country in Corumba, state of Mato Grosso do Sul and expelling its chief, Julio Davila Valdivia. This at least was the report that reached Capt Sergio Lara, chief of Military Police in Corumba, who decided to intervene at the head of 30 soldiers, since the Brazilian government had not recognized the rebellious regime and for that reason maintained relations with the government of Lidia Gueiler.

As was reported in his story by correspondent Luis Claudio Cunha, what actually happened was that the consul was repeatedly threatened by customs agent Tito Salinas, office boy Herman Saucedo, assistant Carlos Gimenez and customs guard Guido Pinto--the latter "arrested by the Brazilian police 3 years before for trafficking in cocaine"--and they occupied the consulate and did not allow its chief to enter. The story adds other interesting facts:

The Cocaine That Passes Through Corumba

The recognition by Brazil of the drug-junta had already been decided but "public revelation should wait until after the visit to Brazil by Mexican President Jose Lopez Portillo" and after that official was out of the country. In the OAS, Mexico was among the countries which censured the coup and Brazil among those who defended it. Official recognition while President Lopez Portillo was in the country would have been an undiplomatic move.

The rebellious attitude of Salinas was due to the fact that he owed the consul some 150,000 cruzeiros, which Valdivia was asking for, and to the fact that he "was disgusted with the work discipline and demands imposed by Valdivia from the time he was appointed consul." But the most interesting part of the story in VEJA was the final paragraph: "In Corumba, despite its modest size--two rooms for which it pays a monthly rent of 7,000 cruzeiros--the Bolivian consulate handles 80 percent of Brazilian trade going to Bolivia. Nearly 10,000 of the 70,000 inhabitants of the city are Bolivian and at least a third of them live there illegally. The border bureaucracy, according to estimates of Brazilian officials, yields more than 50 million cruzeiros daily. But the vital center of interest in that area circulates outside the legal transactions: it is the business in cocaine. The Brazilian Federal Police estimate that 1.5 tons of cocaine pass through there annually and that seizures do not even exceed 10 percent of that ton and a half."

VEJA Figures

The same conservative weekly, VEJA, once more dealt with the subject of drugs in an editorial published 13 August (page 36) with the following titles and subtitles: "Bolivia, A Strong Smell of Powder." "Cocaine Traffickers Were Behind the Coup By General Garcia Meza."

The text of the entire page says the following: "The stories telling of the coup-drug connection in La Paz have increased to such a point that today in Bolivia there are those who call the "Putsch" by Garcia Meza a "cocaine coup." According to many, not only are the majority of the military involved in narcotics traffic but the coup itself was brought about to protect the interests of the powerful network of cocaine traffickers in Bolivia. In other words, the coup was carried out less to prevent the Bolivian left from seizing power--as Garcia Meza bawled out on the day of his inauguration, in the standard pretext of "international communism"--than to prevent Siles Zuazo, once in power, from upsetting the applecart of the profitable operation of the traffickers, who in recent years have made of Bolivia one of the largest cocaine factories in the world.

The Role of Bolivia

"The illegal trade in cocaine yields no less than $500 million per year to a few Bolivians; more than tin, the main export product of the country and of which Bolivia is the second-ranking producer in the world. Operations are based primarily in Santa Cruz de la Sierra, headquarters of the military and civilian groups which supported the Garcia Meza coup. The largest part of the information on this business is found recorded in the Department of State in Washington, where in recent years a significant study on the role of Bolivia in the international cocaine connection has been made. It is a role which has only grown. The Department of State discovered, for example, that the Bolivian connection became the main supplier for American addicts: from 40 to 60 percent of the nearly 30 tons of the drug which entered the United States last year came from Bolivia.

Moreover, since the July coup, American officials have been noting that a larger and larger number of Bolivians involved in cocaine traffic are today in important positions in the new government. The most mentioned name on that list is that of Col Luis Arce Gomez, minister of interior of the new government and former chief of the powerful Army Intelligence Service up to the time of the July military coup. Arce, during the time he headed that service, made efforts to torpedo the government antidrug machinery. Moreover, he had in recent years changed from a simple stooge of the traffickers to a chief of one of the many gangs of traffickers in action in the country himself. Arce, of course, is particularly sensitive when there is talk of cocaine. Last week he ordered the jailing of American correspondent Mary Helen Spooner of the FINANCIAL TIMES. The reason: She had written an article about the involvement of Arce in the traffic.

In Customs

The second person placed on the list of those involved is the new minister of education--ironically an air force colonel named Ariel Coca--involved in a shipment of 100 kilos of cocaine seized last year in Panama. And there are still other cases such as that of Col Otto Lopez, army commander in the Tarija Region, who is considered the main saboteur of previous government efforts to contain drug traffic in the area.

"That is not all. There are also indications that known smugglers and traffickers are participating in operations of kidnaping political figures of the left or even members of the interim government of Lidia Gueiler deposed by Garcia Meza. There is another case, that of Fernando Monroy ("El Mosca"), known gangster of Santa Cruz de la Sierra, Monroy was seen in action in the attack on Palacio Quemado, the home of the Bolivian presidency, when paramilitary commandos arrested President Gueiler and a handful of ministers.

"Another revealing sign of the coup-cocaine connection detected in Washington was the extreme rapidity with which traffickers or their stooges went to occupy key positions in those government sectors precisely responsible for controlling drug traffic. Jose Abraham Baptista, for example, a Santa Cruz trafficker, is considered one of the main financial backers of the Garcia Meza coup. He obtained what is probably the first prize in this race for decisive posts. No less than two of his relatives were appointed to positions of authority in Bolivian customs."

Smuggling Also

The VEJA story we have repeated has no political motives. In Brazil, as in the United States, drugs are a national scourge. On 28 June in JORNAL DO BRASIL (page 11) Professor Arthur Pereira de Castilho Neto, attorney general for the republic and member of the National Health Council Technical Chamber on Narcotics and Drugs, published a pondered analysis with the title of "Drugs, a National Epidemic," in which he revealed that the habit has now been detected as beginning in children nine years of age, indiscriminately addicted to marihuana, cocaine and tranquilizers, and he demanded "a global action to fight the epidemic in which the government, private entities and the social community should participate."

An integral part of this scourge is smuggling. The drug trafficker is indissolubly linked to smuggling, he is one of its branches. The Brazilians know perfectly well that no fewer than a dozen airplanes leave their territory for Santa Cruz de la Sierra every week, carrying substantial shipments of ether and acetone, two products needed for changing the coca leaves into cocaine paste, in addition to electrical appliances and food or manufactured goods, whose price is much lower than it is in Bolivia. The colonel with the predestined last name, Ariel Coca, was chief of the Department of Control of Narcotics and Dangerous Substances during the time of Banzer. He was also commandant of the German Busch Aviation School in Santa Cruz. As such he had the perfect front for the smuggling of whiskey, electrical appliances, food, and above all, light weapons from Paraguay, the latter were particularly used to pay off the bands of narcotics traffickers and the gunmen of the FSB for their work of support to the illegal traffic and even more for their work labeled as "paramilitary" which Luis Arce Gomez unleashed from November 1979 on. That he was appointed minister of education appears to be a joke, although the joke that is going the rounds is that they appointed him because they once saw him with a book in his hand and he even wears glasses, which gives him the appearance of an intellectual.

Another prominent case is that of Rudy Landivar, who Garcia Meza has just promoted to major, although he never went to any military school. Immediately after the coup an attempt was made to reward him for his services in Santa Cruz by appointing him director of customs in the department. He feigned refusal, choosing instead to be chief of the organization responsible for reviving the so-called Military-Peasant Pact. Landivar continues to be one of the mainsprings of the traffic in narcotics.

ODUBER EXPRESSES OPTIMISM FOR DEMOCRACY IN REGION

Caracas EL NACIONAL in Spanish 14 Sep 80 p D-26

[Interview with former Costa Rican President Daniel Oduber, date and place not given]

[Text] "All peoples who are fighting for their freedom in Latin America, in the political sphere as well as the economic and social spheres, have the unqualified support of the Socialist International," said former Costa Rican president and Social Democratic leader Daniel Oduber. He is also attending the deliberations of the Latin American Committee of 15 in Caracas.

When asked about the position taken by the Christian Democratic government of Costa Rica with regard to the participation of Christian Democrats in the Salvadoran junta, Daniel Oduber said:

"As former president and a member of the opposition, I cannot analyze what my government is doing while outside of Costa Rica. The Costa Rican Government," he said, however, "has had a clear policy, no matter what party is in power, of supporting the Central American liberation struggles. But in this case it feels a bit restrained by the individual relationship with the Christian Democrats who are participating in the El Salvador Government. For that reason it has taken a more moderate position, I would say, than the one it took concerning Nicaragua."

[Question] Do you feel that there is a movement away from democracy in Latin America?

[Answer] I don't think so. When you weigh everything, you see that democracy was consolidated in the Dominican Republic, in Ecuador, in Peru, and in Nicaragua. In general terms, democracy has gained ground in the countries that already had a democratic tradition. We have had a setback in Bolivia, which is critical.

A journalist asked if the Bolivian coup was not an indication of the "gorilla" advance in Latin America.

[Answer] Well, it is an indication of the gorilla advance, but we have had several examples of the democratic advance, so we are in the battle. The border between those two currents of thought is in the south, in Bolivia.

[Question] So the situation is a draw?

[Answer] No, it is not a draw because as I said we are winning. If we kept score as they do in soccer, we would be ahead 5 to 1 for democracy.

When asked again about the Bolivian coup he said that it is always the case that "you win some and you lose some, but the important thing is the final war, and I think we are headed toward a positive final war."

[Question] The situation in Peru is not very clear, as we see it.

[Answer] It is very difficult to venture an opinion, it has been such a short time. . . But as I was reading, I think here in Caracas, when there are dictatorships no one jokes around; everyone remains silent. As soon as there is a democracy, all the problems come to light and people feel free to protest and to make serious proposals by workers groups, students and others. That is normal; that is part of democracy. The test lies in one's ability to manage the crisis.

When asked if Marxist revolutionary forces are considered an ally in this struggle for democracy, Oduber answered that "in certain cases, yes." "We do not have the same ideology or the same proposals," he added. "We are opposed to all kinds of dictatorship. We are not scared by the purely political ideas and theories of Marxism. We have been much influenced by Marxist ideas in the past. But we are against any kind of dictatorship. We do not believe that the solution, whether it be Marxist, democratic or socialist, lies in dictatorship."

[Answer] You Venezuelans have seen it firsthand. Building a democracy takes time. I think that Nicaragua has done very well to start with the principle of education, and in order to educate everyone, first they had to teach them to read. Democracy is unique to educated countries, countries that are aware of their political position, of their vote, of their participation. And it is not easy to build a democracy. I am happy that you have done so in such a short time.

[Question] Why was there active and militant solidarity on the part of democratic countries in the case of Nicaragua, but not that of El Salvador?

[Answer] That's true. There was total solidarity with Nicaragua. In the case of El Salvador and Guatemala we are more cautious, I think because at this time short-term political interests are still coming into play, concerning which groups will or will not make the revolution, which groups will or will not come into power. That is causing a great deal of damage to the Central American movement in general.

[Question] Then what attitude should democrats have?

[Answer] First, to achieve liberty, the political definition for the strengthening of human rights, to end repression, exile and assassinations; and once liberty has been achieved along with the democratic form of politics, then everyone should join the party of his choice and fight for its ideas. But first and foremost, they must unite to achieve that liberty.

STRIKE VIEWED AS PRODUCT OF SOVIET CONSPIRACY

San Jose LA REPUBLICA in Spanish 20 Aug 80 p 11

[Commentary by Presbyter Rosendo Salas Valenciano: "Communism, the Government and the Strike"]

[Text] At this late date (and I begin ex abrupto), Carazo's government does not wish to admit that Russia is behind the strike. During his campaign, the president promised to expel the Russians. However, he is taking no action. Perhaps we can guess why. However, he could wash his hands of the matter by holding a plebiscite and testing the people's wishes with respect to the country's humiliation. In this regard, Carazo cannot speak of national dignity while this scourge is here because Russia represents the den of iniquities, the site of grief, the absence of God; it is the country which invented treason by betraying Czechoslovakia, Poland, Hungary and Afghanistan.

I could not offer enough epithets which would paint a living picture of the European nation in which there are no strikes because they are not permitted and trade unions are established as a show of freedom. A short time ago, a Russian scholar said that the fact that /the Russian people are preparing for a mass uprising/ [in boldface] is being kept secret. The Virgin Mary has already stolen a march on them because she permitted a Pope to come from behind that wall of shame, and in Moscow almost everyone has religious objects in his home. I say this based on the testimony of a Costa Rican cleric who visited that country and was greeted by a Russian lieutenant who asked permission to kiss the image of Christ which the priest was carrying. As he kissed the image he said: "You are fortunate to have this image." This aside serves to show that it is one thing to talk about Russia (which even militarily is ashamed of not being able to stop the valiant Afghan rebellion) and another thing to take a position which calls things by their proper names.

Russia is slyly mocking our laws and the passive attitude of the president, and right under his nose it is doing what it wants to do without his being aware.

Last time, under the Oduber administration, it was said that the Barrio Escalante fortress, which is occupied by Russia, housed 200 men, including diplomatic personnel, drivers, technicians, lapdogs and everything but the kitchen sink. Now not even the government knows anything. Calderon Fournier himself cannot say anything definite and his management of this matter was weak and naive. The government has handled the strike with kid gloves, not knowing that such was not the attitude adopted by our exemplary presidents of 40 years ago.

The government speaks but knows that it is weak because the people are no longer following it. It is one thing to talk about having kicked out the National Liberation Party with its stories, intrigues and the fact that it brought Marxism into that embassy, and another thing to have the firm attitude of a president who does his duty with a strong hand, all the more so because of the losses from the public treasury, the weakening of discipline, the bad example for students, and finally, the disorder and bloodshed.

The strike is calling the government into question because it has taken a toll in lost time and because it has relaxed discipline and lowered morale. The communists behind the scenes are laughing and are even saying: "We are already in power with this man who is governing."

The strike is showing the workers that they are the plaything of comrades in the pay of Russia and that their hunger and misfortunes are at the whim of the strike leaders, who are making those who do not have 2 cents to rub together the butt of their scheming.

The workers' attitude, at least the attitude of those who are Costa Ricans, should be serious and firm vis-a-vis those who want to play games with their fate, to cause their children to go hungry and to profane the sacred feelings of those who wish to be good Costa Ricans and love their God.

I feel that another strike would have difficulty taking hold because it would bring about a reaction on the part of those who are honorable and do not want to fall prey to officials paid by Russia who conceal themselves and dance for money. The daily life and behavior of those Russophile leaders are known: they are men who do not work, who have come to San Jose to get their orders. They are men whose faces reflect nervousness and men who conceal themselves and make fun of religious matters; that is the mask being worn by those leaders who live without working, change their views like the weather and take refuge in freedom, Russian style, to amass money at the expense of others. At the hour of reckoning they disappear like the mist without facing up to those who are honest.

Let us point them out with our finger because they are the same ones who are betraying and abandoning their homes; they are bad parents, the subject of their neighbors' derision and the dregs of society.

The government, with the gimmicks it is using, gives them a climate in which to operate, while disorder, weapons and rowdiness bring smiles to the faces of those who think that by means of smiles alone they are going to settle the problems of the fatherland.

NATIONAL LIBERATION OFFICIAL DISCUSSES STATUS OF PARTY

San Jose LA REPUBLICA in Spanish 10 Sep 80 p 9

[Interview with Edgar Arroyo Cordero, member of the Political Directorate of the National Liberation Party [PLN], by Wilmer Murillo in the column "Political Wednesdays in the Republic"; date and place not given].

[Text] Until a short time ago the subject of the radicalization of certain forces of considerable importance in the National Liberation Party (PLN) had aroused controversy among those who, rightly or wrongly, continue to mistrust them and doubt their intentions, and those who believe they advocate a renewal of the democratic struggles of the Liberation Party and embody the desire to rescue certain sectors from the totalitarian left in this country. While trying to avoid any kind of controversy, our interviewee this week, Edgar Arroyo Cordero, feels he sees a confusion in the minds of those who have labeled the Liberationists radicals. In his opinion the Liberationists are fighting for the social democratic ideals of social justice and economic justice. An attorney, the father of four children (Edgar Alberto, Alonso Jose, Maricela and Rolando) and married to Mayra Quesada Solis, Edgar Arroyo has held almost all known political offices: alderman (1966-70) in Alajuela, deputy (1970-74), minister of the interior (1974-76). As a legislator he served as vice president of the Congress as well as chief and assistant chief of his faction. He also chaired the budget committee. As minister, he temporarily filled the posts at the Ministries of Planning, Finance, Presidency and Foreign Relations. Now he is a deputy and president of the Judicial Affairs Commission, and is a member of the Political Directorate of the National Liberation Party. Here are the highlights of our interview with Edgar Arroyo Cordero:

[Question] Do you believe that changes are taking place within the PLN that could give rise to concern? That radicals are taking on strength in the party?

[Answer] What is happening within the party framework is that some members are forgetting their social democratic principles. Those who are fighting tooth and nail to raise the banners of social democratic demands are confused by those who do not know the goals of their own political activities. The members that come to mind first are Marcelo Prieto and Rolando Araya. I can attest to their profound conviction and adherence to the principles of social democracy and to their struggle to rescue certain sectors from the totalitarian left. In some ways, their struggle may eventually dovetail with the struggles of the Communist Party. But we must not regard the struggle for wage increases and for better living conditions as the differences between the Communists and the Social Democrats. The basic difference lies in the "religion" which we of the PLN profess, based on the principles of democracy and the defense of liberty.

[Question] Many people believe the control of the PLN is now in the hands of provincial deputies, community leaders, and that the traditional leadership has been displaced. How would you describe the situation?

[Answer] What has come about is a more equitable balance in terms of those who hold the decisionmaking power. During the first stage there was a strong political boss structure. Orlich, Figueres, and Oduber had a strong pull with intellectual and management groups. In recent years the newly emerging figures truly represent districts and sectors of the population. It is not that we have produced, as they say, a kind of "districtization" of power, but the pull of all those sectors has been balanced out. There is, of course, the risk that those local sectors will become the majority.

[Question] Do you think the leadership of Figueres and Oduber is still a solid, palpable political fact?

[Answer] Yes. It is one thing to be a leader and another to be at the head of a party's machinery. Therein lies the difference. I was privileged to witness the end of the Figueres era (1966-70). The Liberationist machinery began to shift to Oduber's hands (1970-77), and now of course we are in the Monge era. He undoubtedly controls the party structures. As of 1982, his era will surely begin to decline, and another will come along. Even so, Figueres, Oduber and Monge will continue to be undeniable leaders and figures in the PLN.

[Question] You supported the primary candidacy of Dr Castillo in the internal struggle of the PLN. Are you a Castillist or a Mongist during this new stage of the party's struggle?

[Answer] I am basically a Liberationist, and I agree with the Social Democratic platform. One of those principles is the ability to disagree. It was within that context that I supported Dr Castillo. Now I have no problem supporting Monge. Background, service to the party, and intellectual, moral and political education are the conditions that a party should look for in a candidate. Not only do I believe that Monge meets these conditions, but I feel a great personal affection for him.

[Question] Do you think Castillo won the right to be the next Liberation candidate?

[Answer] He has the same right to be a candidate as any other Liberationist who meets the conditions I just mentioned. He and many others in the PLN have that right. Castillo did not earn it just for challenging Monge for that place in the last party convention.

[Question] Dr Alfonso Carro maintains that the PLN has an outdated organization, that it is not ready to transform the country or to come to grips with the changes that it has helped produce. What do you think about this?

[Answer] He is probably right in some aspects. In the PLN we are making a great modernization effort. Perhaps the changes have not come about fast enough, but as a result of its new statutes the PLN has entered a stage characterized by rapid modernization.

There is a manifest desire at all levels not only to achieve this objective, but also to bring about the free and democratic development of the country.

[Question] Do these changes guarantee that the PLN will advance toward the elections with a reasonable margin of security for victory?

[Answer] I believe so. The internal reorganization is taking place with more stress on the local sectors. The rejuvenation of ideas and programs will permit us to face the challenge of the times. To seek new ways to strengthen democracy and give greater economic and social weight is the great task of the coming years.

[Question] Do you think the climate of jealousy resulting from the installation of a new party leadership has subsided?

[Answer] Definitely. There will be no shortage of problems, but I do not see any differences that could prevent the PLN from arriving at the next elections with monopolitical unity. That is something which is merely an illusion for anti-Liberationist groups.

[Question] It is said that all political action implies a power struggle. Will this mean the replacement of some people in the PLN?

[Answer] It could be, but it does not surprise or worry me. The problem is not who has power, but how loyal he is to the PLN and to its basic principles.

[Question] You have been pointed to as a harsh critic of the government. But do you know what model of development we will follow under a democratic system if Liberation wins in 1982?

[Answer] We disagree on the term "harsh." I have pointed out some basic problems. I think we all agree that they are: illegal decrees, lack of bank credit, the rising cost of living, unsafe streets, disrespectful and disloyal relations with the Assembly, rising spending, liberation of prices, arms trafficking, imprudent foreign relations in Central America and the East, a lack of assistance and bank credit, and ethical and moral problems.

Very little credit can be given to Rodrigo Carazo, except that he gets up early in the morning and cuts a good figure for the photographers. What is the model that should be followed in the next few years? I am faithful to the party's decisions because they are born of debate and analysis. Thus, Monge has made very clear what are his fundamental commitments: 1) a commitment to production; 2) struggle against extreme poverty; 3) a commitment to reestablish ethical and moral values in the exercise of public office; and 4) continued adherence to the democratic system. I would say that this model, along with adequate control of public spending, incentives for business and producers in Costa Rica through government and banking measures, will allow us to begin the reconstruction of the country in 1982.

[Question] You claim that Carazo is practicing a kind of tropical-style political caesarism, a kind of catch-all autocratism. Would you agree with Dr Alfonso Carro that the style was initiated by Figueres, expanded by Oduber and now strengthened by this administration as a style of government?

[Answer] I read Don Alfonso Carro, and I disagree. It is one thing for Figueres to have been a little autocratic personally, but another thing to have been autocratic in government. Figueres and Oduber showed respect for the law and for their colleagues. I think there is a misconception here. I do not agree with my dear former professor of the theory of the state.

[Question] There has been talk in the PLN of seeking a great multi-party and multi-class pact to carry out the structural reforms the country needs. What have the deputies done to smoothe the way for this pact?

[Answer] We have to sign a social pact, a sort of social contract as envisioned by Jacques Rousseau. We have to sit down with businessmen, professionals, politicians, workers and government officials to analyze and discuss what we want for Costa Rica. Some have taken immovable positions which will be of no help under any circumstances to achieve this end. If some continue to battle, and others play up differences, there is no way to have a true national dialog. With regard to what our parliamentary faction has done, I would like to remind you of the letter Luis Alberto Monge sent to the president on 10 July. He said that the first requirement for progressing toward the solution of problems is deep respect and loyal cooperation which, without prejudice to the independence of the branches of government, should exist between the Legislative Assembly and the Executive Branch. Monge pointed out that these relations have been deteriorating critically in the institutional system. The climate is not conducive to calm, constructive dialog. In addition, government by decree has come into vogue, which has not only hindered parliamentary action and created an atmosphere of insecurity, but has also violated the rule of law. I ask you, what can be done in such a situation?

[Question] So the point is, you have said let's have a multiparty, multiclass pact, but no one has done anything to reach that goal?

[Answer] Of course we still can't devote the best of our human resources and thought to that goal. We are in a stage of restructuring of the issues of the next campaign. Once we finish that, the party organizations will devote their efforts to the search for that great consensus that is indispensable for the progress of the nation.

[Answer] It's all the same to me. If we undertake an adequate internal reorganization and clearly define our platform for the electorate, there will be no dangerous enemy. Furthermore, all the primary candidates are either Unity deputies or former ministers of Carazo, supporters and tools of his disastrous administration.

[Question] Is your party interested in having an ideological and permanent party at the forefront? Would you personally support electoral reforms that permitted that?

[Answer] We have said so many times. We want campaigns with serious issues, as they have in countries with a long democratic tradition. We don't want what always happens, that is, when mudslinging comes before serious issues. But with regard to the Electoral Code, there is a problem of timeliness. There is an internal struggle going on in which there is no clear idea of the issue among the deputies of the government party. We cannot support something on which the interested parties have not been able to agree. That would mean intervention in the internal affairs of Unity Party.

BRITISH MINISTER RIDLEY'S STATEMENTS SCORED

Guatemala City DIARIO DE CENTRO AMERICA in Spanish 14 Aug 80 pp 3, 6

[Text] At his press conference last night Her Britannic Majesty's minister of state, Nicholas Ridley, reflected an attitude or even an intent designed to diminish the importance of--and almost to call nonexistent--a factor which is very real in the case of Belize, a factor to which, in addition, several critics in Guatemala and many others in America have granted the greatest importance.

The factor concerns the threat to those democracies whose systems are based on man's freedom and to the security of the continent posed by the possibility that Belize might become one more possible prize in Soviet world expansion.

Minister Ridley, answering questions put to him on the subject by several newsmen who clearly reflected the anxiety and concern that exist in this respect, said that it cannot be predicted what countries will be infiltrated or penetrated in the future by communist influence, nor what communist countries will be penetrated by liberal forces.

The British minister's reply, for many of those attending the press conferences, seemed to be far removed from the current world situation of conflict and evasive of the struggle which is taking place between the two great world powers to win over strategic points on the globe.

It is clear that we are not in a situation of equilibrium, of a peaceful game of possible influences and infiltrations.

We are facing a rapid, real and clear Soviet expansionist offensive, and all indications are that this has been successful, that there are many African countries which have been won over by Soviet influence and that a net is being drawn around Europe. There are also indications that this expansion is advancing apace in America and that it is precisely in the central part of the continent where this advancement is taking place.

Small countries which have recently become independent from Great Britain have in a short time seen the fall of the constitutions, governments and liberal systems inherited from Great Britain, and extreme leftist groups have succeeded in taking power.

Popular revolutions have emerged to turn the respective countries toward the orbit of the USSR.

When a newsman at the press conference pointed out to him the danger of Cuba's being a base for Soviet influence in the region, especially in Belize, Minister Ridley told the newsman who asked the question that he would do better to inquire about the penetration of liberal forces into Cuba and about how long communist systems would last in countries such as the latter.

To some of those present it appeared that the minister had forgotten for the moment that the Cuban Government does not exactly depend on the consent of the people, nor is an election going to defeat it. The Castro Government is based on force and on Soviet support, and neither of those two factors questions how many Cubans on the island support it. Cuba acts as a base for Soviet expansion.

To belittle the importance and reality of possible Cuban action in serving as an arm for Soviet penetration into Belize gives the impression of failing to connect such a position with the fact that Cuba is the very country the USSR is using for its wars of penetration and domination in Africa, and that it is Cuban armies which have, with weapons in hand, been confronting and sometimes even defeating democratic forces in Africa in order to impose regimes affiliated with the USSR.

Cuba is a country under arms. Certainly at this time it has idle troops which are trained in combat, have been under fire in the African wars and are not exactly in the process of being demobilized.

It cannot be denied that Cuba's sights are trained on Belize, ready to take advantage of the smallest opportunity to step in. As proof of this we have Fidel Castro's statements concerning Belize and the support he says he would give, especially against what he calls possible aggression by Guatemala.

An independent, undefended Belize, almost adrift, could at any moment serve as a pretext for a planned Soviet expansionist coup through Cuba, alleging Guatemalan plans for aggression. Such a step would be, almost indubitably, a preliminary to any global confrontation, or it would be part of a strategy to gain more support in the world in the service of the Soviets. It would be said that it is being done in defense of the people of Belize and at the request of the Belize Government.

Within the play of the great world powers, and for the future of the liberal democracies, those which are inspired by the existence of human freedoms--of which group Great Britain is a part--the need to avoid, in this regard, a hasty solution which would leave Belize as a prize, a land where the USSR can take another step in its advancement, cannot be ignored. This involves the security of the free world and of the Belizean people themselves, for whom Great Britain is concerned, according to the minister. The Belizean people cannot be left to the danger of becoming victims of a communist dictatorship, of being converted into cannon fodder for the wars of the USSR.

Minister Ridley said that Great Britain's plan is for the peoples of the Caribbean and Central America to have their own governments.

This proposal would be frustrated, for example, for a people in the position of being a prize coveted by Soviet expansion.

It is a factor which, if Minister Ridley thinks about it, must be considered very seriously by the British Government, as it is by the democratic sectors of America.

Or is it that the British Government is weighing this danger, but in view of its own direct relations with the USSR. which are delicate in themselves, is simply failing publicly to accept this fact?

FOREIGN MINISTER ADVOCATES NONINTERFERENCE IN REGIONAL AFFAIRS

Buenos Aires CLARIN in Spanish 29 Aug 80 p 4

[Interview with Guatemalan Foreign Minister Rafael Castillo Valdez, date and place not given]

[Text] The Guatemalan minister of foreign relations, Rafael Castillo Valdez, claimed that his motto is "not to get involved in what is none of my business," when asked if he had considered Bolivia's institutional situation in the talks he held with his Argentine colleague, Retired Brig Gen Carlos Washington Pastor.

He also stressed that his government, headed by Gen Fernando Lucas Romeo Garcia, is "democratic," and attributed international criticism to "ignorance" and "bad faith."

Castillo Valdez, who today will finish up a 5-day official visit to Argentina, talked with CLARIN at the downtown hotel where he is staying.

The following are the highlights of the dialogue:

[Question] In your talks with Foreign Minister Pastor, did you discuss the situation in Central America, especially that of Nicaragua and El Salvador? If so, did you reach any understandings?

[Answer] Among all the points of agreement between Argentine and Guatemalan foreign policies, our unrestricted respect for established and recognized international principles such as nonintervention is at the forefront. With regard to Central America, since Guatemala is part of that region it was logical that we exchanged ideas and analyzed situations. In the specific case of my country, it is a nation that has been affected by events unleashed by the two great powers. We regret that this big conflagration has so seriously affected developing countries such as ours. Our position regarding the Central American isthmus in general is one of working intensively so that we can continue developing our potential in cooperation and collaboration.

[Question] What your answer did not make entirely clear is whether the Central American situation was really the subject of discussion.

[Answer] We undoubtedly agreed with Foreign Minister Pastor in our consideration of the region of Central America, and our opinion that the majority of all the problems that plague that area have been inspired or provoked externally.

[Question] The Guatemalan Government, more than any other in the region, has been a target of criticism for its alleged antidemocratic characteristics. To some extent that criticism is similar to what has been said about the Argentine Government. Did you touch on that subject?

[Answer] We feel that most of the criticism of Guatemala has been and is rooted in ignorance of our situation. Mention is made of the deteriorated image of certain countries, and Guatemala is probably included in that. My government's position is that we are much more concerned for the development of our nation than for developing or changing our image. We are not worried when people talk imprudently and foolishly, with obvious bad faith. We believe that it is more important to invest all the funds we can in projects for primary schools or a small hospital. Guatemala will not spend a cent on its image.

[Question] Is it possible that your country will move toward more democratic forms?

[Answer] I think that question could imply some ignorance of the situation in Guatemala. Since 1821 my country has had all kinds of governments in terms of form and duration. Some governments lasted 12, 14 or 20 years; some lasted a lifetime; some did not last 24 hours. Now, for the first time in Guatemalan history, we have had four successive constitutional terms. We are not in a hurry, therefore, to move on to another form of government. What we do need to do is continue a unique process which we think should include "free enterprise" in the economy (although we do not call it capitalism because we will never be capitalists), and what we call "Guatemalan-style democracy" in politics.

[Answer] I would like to tell you a personal anecdote. On the door of my room I have a prayer which I read every day before going out. It has helped me a lot in my private and political life. The prayer says, "Dear God, help me not to get involved in what is none of my business. . ." Guatemala never suspended relations with Bolivia.

[Question] Should I take that prayer--in the specific case of Bolivia--as an answer?

[Answer] Well, yes. To elaborate a bit more, we believe that if Bolivia or the Bolivians have some problem, it should be our Bolivian brothers who solve it. If Argentina has some problem, our Argentine brothers should solve it. If we Guatemalans have a problem, I think we have the sacred right as human beings to solve our problems ourselves.

PEOPLE WARNED OF 'IMPERIALIST' PLOTS AGAINST REVOLUTION

Managua BARRICADA in Spanish 8 Sep 80 p 3

[Article by Oswaldo Zuniga]

[Text] The manipulations of the most reactionary sectors of imperialism in the internal affairs of Nicaragua have been manifested in recent weeks in many varied and dangerous ways.

These forces opposing peace and democracy are constantly conspiring against the Nicaraguan Revolution. They draw up more and more visible aggressive plans, and try to provoke our people.

The U.S. Central Intelligence Agency recently printed up multicolored maps of Nicaragua with details of the oil pipeline between Puerto Sandino and Managua, and of the industries of Managua, Leon, Chinandega, Granada and Matagalpa.

We know from experience what the CIA's functions are, and what precedents they have.

The Republican candidate for the presidency of the United States, Ronald Reagan, said recently that if elected president he would cut off "aid" to Nicaragua, and furthermore that armed intervention in Central America was a possibility.

A few days ago, the reactionaries of the American Congress blocked once again the loan of $75 million to Nicaragua, based on "arguments" and lies supplied by the CIA.

We know that the regimes of Guatemala and El Salvador have ties with these reactionaries.

In Guatemala, for example, several Nicaraguans have disappeared, simply for being Nicaraguan.

In Guatemala, as well, more than 2,000 former Somoza National Guardsmen are getting ready to invade Nicaragua with the help of Guatemalan and Honduran troops, according to statements by Elias Barahona, a former press official of the Guatemalan regime and a member of the People's Guerrilla Army (EGP).

We should make it clear that a bloody battle for democracy and the self-determination of peoples is being waged in Central America, and imperialists have responded to it with a regional strategy. That is why it is so important to have solidarity between our people and our Central American brothers, specifically, the degree of consolidation achieved by the Sandinist Revolution.

A conquest unique in the history of the entire continent was achieved in Nicaragua, and history has assigned us the task of maintaining that victory so that we can strengthen the struggle of other nations.

That is why, despite the imperialist provocations, our main task will always be to strengthen national anti-imperialist unity and the instruments for the defense of the Revolution. Those who conspire against national unity, whether they be businessmen or ultraleftists, are playing into the hands of the imperialists and weakening the process. For that reason, the Revolution will always vigorously oppose them.

But we must not underestimate the imperialist manipulations mentioned above, and therefore we must strengthen the armed defenses of the people along with national unity, in addition to the Popular Militias and the political and economic organizational bases of the Revolution.

PAPER DEFENDS BELIZE CLAIM TO INDEPENDENCE

[Editorial: "Belize in Nicaragua"]

[Text] The presence of the prime minister of Belize at an official Nicaraguan celebration is an unheard of happening in the history of Central America, and is of great historical and political significance, but it has not been given the attention it deserves.

Mr Price was invited to the celebration of the first anniversary of the victory of the Sandinist People's Revolution in another demonstration of the positive internationalism of our foreign policy. Implicit therein was recognition of the desire for independence of his people, who also have aspirations to being considered a fraternal member of the Central American regional community.

That is the way we interpret it by reason of geographic reality and of the desire which has already been expressed in the past by the people of Belize.

It is a fact that Belize sought the solidarity of the other countries on the isthmus in support of its desires for independence, without encountering anything other than the opposite kind of solidarity upheld by Central American governments alined with the Guatemalan dictatorships, with the exception of Costa Rica.

Today, a free and sovereign Nicaragua, in the exercise of the moral leadership conferred upon it by the prestige of its revolution, is receiving a large youth delegation from Belize in another demonstration of its unified struggle with a people who are fighting for their freedom. The delegation is here on the occasion of the celebrations in honor of the eradication of illiteracy from our country.

Belize, of course, continues to be bound to the colonial trunk of the decadent British empire. However, its condition is like that of a person who is resigned to holding on to a red-hot nail for fear of falling into the live coals of the Guatemalan hell, while awaiting historical conditions which will make possible the materialization of its aspirations to freedom.

Guatemala claims rights to the territory of Belize; however, the idea never entered the minds of its dictator to have a fraternal rapprochement with its small neighbor nor did they take any step which led to the identification of both peoples in the political and cultural sectors. Thus, Belize has been acquiring its own personality and has been strengthening its desire for independence. And the latter consideration should be placed above any alleged right to domination which has now been effaced by time as a consequence of the new historical realities of mankind.

Belize, then, wishes to be free and sovereign and, consequently, to be an additional member of the Central American community, with rights equal to those of its other members. And that desire should be respected.

Let these words be a fraternal greeting to the students from Belize, who are brothers and sisters in the desire for integration, brothers and sisters in the universal aspiration of peoples to freedom.

DESERTER CRITICIZES FSLN, WARNS LEADERS

Caracas BOHEMIA in Spanish 15 Sep 80 pp 46, 47

[Article by Humberto J. Hernandez]

[Text] "Venezuela is a country of liberties. We can express our feelings and determine our own way of life." This eloquent affirmation was made recently be President Luis Herrera Campins at the rostrum of an international forum. In fact, our lifestyle would not accomodate any other system, especially considering that for more than two decades of democracy we have gotten it firmly into our minds that ideological pluralism is based on our singular capacity for tolerance and dynamic coexistence. And incidentally, we Venezuelans are most consistent with our national character when we are defending the right of others to freely express their thoughts, even if we don't agree with them.

BOHEMIA, of course, as a spokesman for public opinion, is not immune to this democratic practice of expressing the truths that each person perceives, as long as it is done with the framework of strict, lofty principles of respect for human dignity. That is why today we are printing the "truth of a dissident of the Nicaraguan revolution." We respect his truth, although we do not agree with it completely. We are doing this because Venezuela is a country of liberties, because to express our feelings and beliefs is our customary way of life.

A Deserter's Reasoning

The dissident was aloof when he arrived. He responded monosyllabically in an attempt to penetrate the labyrinth of words and ideas that were struggling to come out, more through his eyes than through his mouth. As he spoke, the heat of his words thawed the air. One condition was that photographs not be taken of him. Not because he was afraid, he cautioned, because a man such as he who lived day and night with death for 6 years could not feel fear. He had felt death physically in his bones, and managed to escape death once, but that thwarted rendezvous crippled him forever.

"Please do not take pictures of me. I cannot reveal my name, either. It's not that I'm a coward, but I fear for the lives of my children and my relatives who remained in Nicaragua. My life does not matter, because it has already been pledged to the cause of Nicaragua's liberation."

[Question] So Nicaragua is not free?

[Answer] It may sound paradoxical to you and others, but the truth is that my country is not free.

[Question] Why?

[Answer] Because the way things stand in Nicaragua, the dictatorship only changed names. Before it was Somoza, now it will be Tomas Borge.

[Question] You give the impression that you believe Nicaragua would be better off with Somoza than with the revolution that overthrew him. Is that so?

[Answer] I am a democrat. The revolution was made by those of us who put our lives on the line in combat. The armed struggle to liberate Nicaragua left this eternal mark on me. But we fought for total liberation, not to throw off one yoke and put on another. People should know that without the popular insurrection, the Sandinist Front never would have meant a thing in Nicaragua; it never would have overthrown Somoza. That is why the people have the right to hold free elections and choose the government they want, not to have a communist dictatorship imposed on them, as is being formed now.

The trauma of war left a visible mark on him both physically and psychologically.

"I don't care about life. Yesterday I was on the point of committing suicide. But not out of cowardice. Impotence threatens me, and it wounds more deeply than the bullet that penetrated my chest here. I am assaulted by many projectiles when I go to my children and they ask me, 'Papa, what shall we eat today?'"

His tragedy lies not only in having to abandon his country, but in the fact that he has no work or means of support here.

[Question] But it seems strange, almost inconceivable, that a combattant such as yourself has abandoned the revolution after the triumph. Why did you desert?

[Answer] I already told you. I am a democrat, but also a Catholic (from one pocket he took a small Bible, worn with time and apparently constant use). In the Sandinist Front I belonged to the Central American Union. I fought for the liberation of my country, not for the installation of a communist regime.

[Question] When did you realize that the revolution had a communist orientation?

[Answer] When 45 days after the triumph private banking was nationalized and bills of 1,000 and 500 cordobas were eliminated. At first I thought the measure would deal a heavy blow to the Somozists, but I realized that they had had time to convert their money into dollars. The ones who suffered the disastrous consequences were the ones who stayed in Nicaragua and had nothing to do with the Somoza forces. My eyes were also opened when I saw the education being given the children. They were taught that Tomas Borge was the national idol, and they were inculcated with an idolatry for the red and black flag in order to replace our national flag. It is true that that combination of colors represented an ideal for us, but never with the intention of replacing the love and respect for the flag and the national anthem in the hearts of Nicaraguans as symbols of our nationality, superior ideals of the homeland. Borges tried to change them, as if these symbols were not our national heritage but the heritage of Somoza.

Napoleon Duarte to Be Assassinated

He stresses that this is part of the reasoning behind his dissidence. From the beginning he had reservations, but he always held out a hope that they would disappear once the triumph of the revolution was finalized. Such was not the case, however. At one point his doubts were confirmed. For example, he knew and claims now that the Costa Rican Government of Rodrigo Carazo Odio ceded a strip 5 kilometers wide to the Sandinist Front along the Nicaraguan border so that those forces could operate there. For that reason most Sandinist military schools operated in Costa Rican territory, in the La Cruz region as well as that of San Carlos. He was not there because he did not belong to the Sandinist Front, but to the Carlos Fonseca Amador Northern Front.

"That is," he concluded, "we were mere babes in the woods."

[Answer] There were two commanders. One was "Ruben" (Fabian Ruiz), who is now leading the operation in El Salvador; the other was Lenin Serna. Both are assigned to International Operations. It is really they who attract the most people, because they are experts in proselytizing among the peasant masses. They also have more military experience than anyone, because they are professional guerrillas. "Ruben" was trained in Arab nations, and Lenin in Russia and Cuba.

"It is certain," he indicated, "that Fabian Ruiz and Lenin Serna are in command of the two open fronts that will invade El Salvador. One front is supplied from the Golfo Fonseca by barges which bring arms and supplies under the guise of fishing expeditions; they go up the Zirama River from Playitas Beach, very close to Puerto La Union, 75 kilometers away along the coast. This front is led by Ruiz. The other front operates through Honduras and is commanded by Lenin Serna. Its objective is to attack El Salvador from the east. If you analyze carefully the situation in that country, you will see that the armed conflicts always happen in the north, for the purpose of distracting the Salvadoran Armed Forces so that the guerrilla contingents can operate freely in transporting arms, medicines and provisions, which are stored at drop-off points located in Salvadoran territory.

The weapons and ammunition are taken to the Golfo Fonseca in trucks (moving vans) with false bottoms and partitions. He explains that the rifles used in El Salvador are from Venezuela, but are not sent from here now. They are part of an arms shipment the Nicaraguan guerrillas received when they were fighting Somoza.

"I participated," he points out, "when we went to transport those weapons from the air base at Carrizales to the La Cruz fortress in Costa Rican territory along the Nicaraguan border."

He explains that the guerrilla groups of El Salvador this September will launch an offensive in order to take cities, especially in the north. There the groups FAL [Liberation Armed Forces] and LP-28 will be fighting, supported by the International Column which operates out of Nicaragua, in order to allow the Salvadoran army operatives to concentrate themselves and to free the southern region so as to speed up the shipment of arms.

"I would like to publicly announce, through this magazine BOHEMIA, that the next victim to be immolated, who will become the Pedro Joaquin Chamorro of El Salvador, will be the Christian Democratic leader Napoleon Duarte. Just as the Sandinist Front confronted interests within the government of the dictator Somoza and a group of his ministers who wanted to win points with him by ordering the death of Chamorro, in the same manner they will proceed to have Duarte liquidated, and to use his name as a catchword to incite the masses."

He said many more things, for example, that Eden Pastora, the famous Commander Zero who on 22 August 1978 took the National Palace of Managua and retained more than 1,500 people as hostages, will end up being eliminated by Tomas Borge. The other statements were recorded, but do not appear here for lack of space.

DEAN OF NEW FACULTY DISCUSSES UNAN'S REVOLUTIONARY ROLE

Managua EL NUEVO DIARIO in Spanish 6 Sep 80 p 4

[Interview with Silvia Villagra Gutierrez, dean of the School of Education Sciences of the National Autonomous University of Nicaragua (UNAN); date and place not given]

[Text] The present dean, Silvia Villagra Gutierrez, regards the establishment of the new School of Education Sciences (formerly it was a School of Humanities) as a revolutionary answer to our people's old education problem.

In Silvia's opinion, it must be realized, first of all, why and for what purpose a revolution is made, before understanding fully the solutions given to the training of teachers in the university.

This is especially to the point with the new orientation of higher education toward the academic year, regarded by many as the revolutionary innovation of 1980 in the university.

An innovation precisely because it has been decided to abandon the credit system to return to the complete year of studies innovated pedagogically, oriented toward the revolution and more in accordance with the graduation of professional people at the rate required by our society for its development.

Nevertheless, the curriculum change has been carried out on scientific methodological principles and a transition pensum has already been prepared for students under the old plan, so that they may graduate without difficulties.

"With regard to the School of Education Sciences, we intend to increase registration of students to 2,000 this year and, starting next year, to 1,000 a year. We have 500 scholarships ready and we are going to increase them progressively every academic year," Silvia Villagra stated in an interview conducted by EL NUEVO DIARIO. We are publishing her concepts below, because we believe that they are very interesting to the people of Nicaragua and especially to the several thousand professors and students returning to the university after carrying out heroically the hard tasks of the great national literacy crusade.

[Question] To what extent has the university responded to the present revolutionary situation?

[Answer] In the first place, the complete incorporation of the university in the present revolutionary process finds expression in the thousands of young students participating in the national literacy crusade, the number of teachers and workers participating in the militia exercises and in all the tasks being performed by means of which we want to eradicate the old emphasis and methods of university education, but, above all, in my opinion, it finds expression in the importance being given to training specialists in agricultural-livestock careers, health careers and teacher training. These are the three priority items at this time and they are logically the solution to grave problems of our society.

But I might especially talk to you about the sphere of teacher training, because that is the task assigned to me.

[Answer] In my opinion, the most important item finds expression in the establishment of the School [of Education Sciences], because it is a revolutionary answer to our society's problem.

Everyone knows that only 68 percent of the elementary-school-age population is enrolled in elementary schools and that the figure has never exceeded 30 percent on the secondary school level. Very well, the revolution must solve this problem. That explains the efforts made by the Ministry of Education and the intentions to expand and improve the training of elementary school teachers. It is up to the UNAN [National Autonomous University of Nicaragua] to meet the need for more and better teachers for intermediate education and the new School [of Education Sciences] is being established for this purpose.

[Answer] We -- and when I say we I am referring to the entire teaching collective of the center, consisting of professors, students, workers and administrative personnel -- we have proposed to train teachers for intermediate education with a solid scientific-education training and a high degree of political and social awareness, to help in qualifying administrative personnel in the whole national education system, to lay the groundwork for scientific research, to support the Ministry of Education in its policy of professional refresher taining and to cultivate, promote and disseminate research in education and solutions to our teaching problems.

Of course, thorough, hard work of curriculum change has been necessary for that purpose.

[Answer] During the whole period in which most of our students have been engaged in literacy work, curriculum change committees were set up. The old pensums were changed into new study plans, in accordance with the university development plan for this year. The credit system was replaced by a linear system in which the courses for the student to take are determined. In this way the grave problem of university planning was solved, because, under the former system, the university never was able to plan what graduates and what enrollment it would have each year. Thus, we can now tell the country how many specialists we are going graduate each year, in addition to having gained much with regard to the possibilities for a complete education of young persons, because they all must follow what has been programed. A change was also made in programs. They were updated in content. Emphasis was modernized and a bibliographical plan was drawn up that is to meet the needs of the students. We are accomplishing all this on the basis of the profile of the graduate, for which education administrators, professors, students and graduates were consulted on what our graduate should be like.

Thus, we believe that we are ready to receive the thousands of secondary school graduates who are all these young persons who have devoted themselves to literacy work, and for whom it was necessary to work seriously, because we believe that with what we had before we could not receive them. The shock that this large mass of conscientious young persons would receive would have been very great. Of course, this reform is not over. There are only the basic changes that will make it possible to carry out, in the 5-year period from 1980 to 1985, a reform so that our education will be in keeping with the present times. The curriculum change has been accomplished on scientific methodological principles.

This is the beginning of the work! It is not free from difficulties. For example, we had to discuss with teachers in the preschool specialty the fact that training of these technicians should be turned over to the normal schools, inasmuch as at that level we would not meet the needs in that sphere for many years. But the teachers collective, who are very capable comrades and fond of their career, agreed, although it meant that they were affected to some extent. They understood the solution proposed to them, but they understood it because the understood the revolution, because, in order to understand the solutions that have been provided concerning teacher training, the why and for what purpose a revolution is made must be understood first. When that is understood, it is easy to understand why mathematics has to be modernized, why physics has to change its emphasis, why teacher training has to be revolutionized, and so on.

[Answer] Most of our students are engaged in literacy work. When they return, they will be offered a special liquidation pensum, designed especially for the different variants that each one may present, for the purpose of having them graduate as soon as possible, without difficulties and in an updated manner.

[Question] Will it be advantageous, then?

[Answer] We hope so. Right now, each case will be handled individually and all the help within our reach will be provided to the student, but he must realize that he cannot continue to study in the arbitrary way in which he had been studying, but rather in an organized, supervised manner. We cannot tell the country that so-and-so needs 7 years to graduate and that someone else needs 10 years. What we shall do is tell the student what he has passed, what it recognized as having taken because of his participation in the crusade and the minimum and maximum time that he has to pass what remains, including tutoring for a course, if necessary.

[Question] You propose to train more and better teachers, but how will you solve the needs for your own School?

[Answer] I can tell you, in this connection, that we have a small group of specialists on our various subjects, but they are technicians who like the work that they are doing and they are ready to work as hard as necessary. This same activity that we are concluding, which was a curriculum change, required many of them to sacrifice their nights and their weekends, but they did it gladly. This is the basic force that we have, but we know that it is insufficient and, therefore, we are developing the student assistant movement consisting in the selection of the best students in the higher years to work as teachers in the first years. This is a revolutionary solution to a problem. What else would be advisable? For us to say, for example: we cannot train more than 100 teachers a year, because we do not have qualified human resources. This would be a nonrevolutionary answer to the question. Solutions must be sought, but thinking always about the newest, the most revolutionary solutions.

[Question] Will teachers have an opportunity to improve?

[Answer] Of course. Right now, we are putting in final shape a teaching course for higher education. We have scheduled other postgraduate courses, and we are working on a plan for a degree in education for those student assistants and graduates who want to work for the master's degree in this field. But now we are working on the project.

[Question] What enrollment do you expect to have this year?

[Answer] We expect to have 3,000 in the transtion plans and we intend to increase registration of new students to 2,359 and, starting next year, 1,000 a year. Logically, these figures include the regional centers of Esteli and Puerto Cabezas, where we shall open up several of our specialties.

[Answer] We are working in that direction. We want to raise the indices of school retention and promotion. Our efficiency in the last few years has never been greater than 10 percent. That is to say that of every 100 who entered only 10 graduated. This must change. The country needs university graduates and our School and higher education in general are taking steps to accomplish that. We can tell you, for example, that education advancement for teachers will be a help in this connection, as will be the textbooks that we have to give the sutdents, organizational measures and material resources in connection with this problem.

There are 500 scholarships that we shall award this year between the regional centers of Esteli, Puerto Cabezas and Managua. We intend to increase them every academic year.

PETROLEUM INDUSTRY TO HIRE MORE PROFESSIONALS

Caracas EL NACIONAL in Spanish 9 Sep 80 p C-2

[Article by Eduardo Isea Borjas]

[Text] Punto Fijo, 8 Sep--PDVSA [Venezuelan Petroleum Inc] will hire around 3,000 professionals with university degrees over the next 5 years, according to a study on the evolution of the work force in that sector published by the INAPET [Petroleum and Petrochemical Training Institute] in a booklet titled "Human Resource Requirements in the Petroleum Sector." This study, compiled by PDVSA and its subsidiaries, was presented at a round table on the "Development of Human Resources" in the oil sector, held in Caraballeda in December 1979 under the sponsorship of PDVSA and the Ministry of Energy and Mines. The study indicates that of the 3,174 new university graduate professionals to be hired by the oil industry during the period 1980-1984, 70 percent (2,233) will be engineering and allied specialty graduates, and 30 percent (941) university graduates in other fields. The analysis finds that the total number of employees in the industry as a whole will be 43,000 in 1984, representing an increase of 11,000 workers as compared with 1979. It explains that the new personnel will be needed to develop the industry's expansion programs in the areas of exploration, production, changes in refining patterns, and domestic and international marketing. It will also be necessary to train replacements for personnel that resigns, retires or passes away. This figure of 43,000 workers, the study adds, represents 94 percent of the total number of workers in the industry in 1957 (45,600), the year in which the industry had the largest number of workers. In addition to the composition of the 1980-1984 work force, this monograph by PDVSA and its subsidiaries contains ample references to personnel planning in the industry, recruiting policy and methods, and experience and innovations in organizational development. PEQUIVEN [Petrochemical Company of Venezuela] and INTEVEP [Venezuelan Institute of Petroleum Technology] are also the objects of a similar study in this work, in which the personnel development plans and policies of those enterprises are backed by statistics. "Human Resource Requirements in the Petroleum Sector" is a new contribution to the study of factors related to the work force in our main industry, and is a source of information on the efforts being deployed to develop the human resources of our petroleum and petrochemical industries.

PDVSA SEARCHES FOR LIGHT OIL IN ORINOCO REGION

Caracas EL UNIVERSAL in Spanish 9 Sep 80 Sec 2 p 1

[Article by C. R. Chavez]

[Text] For the first time in Venezuela, according to a press release yesterday by PDVSA [Venezuelan Petroleum, Inc] indicating that a major effort has been planned to determine the probable extent and volume of hydrocarbons likely to be found in the country's oldest geological formations underlying the tar sands of the Orinoco Belt, systematic exploration, by way of surveys and drillings, will be carried out in the Paleozoic basin situated toward the western half of the Orinoco Tar Belt.

Only the Archeozoic rocks--PDVSA adds--situated south of the Orinoco, in the Guyana shield (Roraima and Imataca formations), and some igneous and metamorphic emplacements in the Venezuelan cordilleras that date back some 3 billion years and may be counted among the planet's oldest formations, exceed those of the Paleozoic in age.

"In the Paleozoic," according to the PDVSA release, "there are geological periods that began 600 million years ago and sediments that were deposited over a period of 350 million years but that could subsequently have partially disappeared as a result of tectonic movements and intensive erosion processes. It is known, however, that not all of the rocks corresponding to this long era are present in the Venezuelan subsurface, owing as much to prehistoric geographical reasons that impeded normal and continuous sedimentation in our ancestral territory, as to posterior events related to movements of the earth's crust and to diluvial erosive processes that transfigured or eliminated many of the Paleozoic strata.

"Then"--PDVSA's technical report continues--"the Mesozoic followed, the last stages of which are characterized by the Cretaceous limestones, which originated some 100 million years ago, accumulated over a period of 50 million years, were subsequently buried and are now found at a depth of some 5,000 meters below Lake Maracaibo, for example. These are the horizons being explored intensively today by PDVSA's subsidiaries in search of new light and medium crude reserves. Rocks of the Cretaceous--but containing heavy and extraheavy crudes--are also found at lesser depths within the confines of the Orinoco Tar Belt."

This major objective of current explorational activities will be supplemented soon by a search for hydrocarbons in rocks older than the Cretaceous, but in regions of Venezuela where they are more easily reached by drilling rigs, like the states of Guarico and Apure.

Exploration of the Paleozoic in the planned and systematic manner that has been set up will be concentrated in the state of Guarico initially, on the basis that the formations there are the closest to the surface; that is, beginning at depths of 1,000 meters or more. The Paleozoic was explored somewhat haphazardly during the time of the concessionary companies, which stopped work whenever they considered they had reached sterile rock, the igneo-metamorphic substratum, or unviable shows of oil. During that time, the existence of Paleozoic rocks was discovered in the subsurface of Venezuela's Cordillera Oriental region, but the presence in them of hydrocarbons of sufficient commercial interest, or in sufficient quantities, to justify exploring at greater depths and higher costs was ruled out. Today, it is known that the Paleozoic contains appreciable quantities of hydrocarbons and especially gas, in the United States, in North Africa, Europe, Western Siberia and the Middle East.

At the 26th International Geological Congress held recently in Paris it was brought out that Paleozoic deposits contain close to 30 percent of the world gas reserves and 15 percent of the world oil reserves. The figures for the Mezozoic are 44 percent and 54 percent, and for the Tertiary 27 percent and 32 percent, respectively.

This information with all its corresponding didactic details was supplied by the coordinator for the Orinoco Tar Belt, Carlos Borregales, and confirmed by the coordinator for exploration, Wolfgang Alex Lorenz, both of PDVSA.

Borregales reported it in the course of a conference held in the auditorium of the Maturin College of Physicians during the 5th Petroleum Forum for Journalists, organized jointly by PDVSA and the Monagas section of the National Press Association.

During that conference, Borregales stated that the wells drilled to date in the Orinoco Belt, in the more recent sediments up to the Cretaceous, have yielded a production that ranges between 50 and 700 barrels of crude a day depending upon the characteristics of each deposit and by means of primary extraction methods, which has shown promisingly that oil can be produced by conventional methods and techniques in the Orinoco Belt.

The evaluation carried out to date in the Orinoco Belt has enabled PDVSA technicians to estimate the existence of around 1 trillion barrels or more of oil in post-Paleozoic sediments. Borregales says that up to about 5 percent of this volume could be extracted currently using primary methods. This recovery index could be increased to 8 percent using alternated steam injection, and to 15 percent using continuous steam injection or in situ combustion. Should compaction prove to be an effective production means, this recovery figure could reach 25 percent.

This means--says Borregales--that, taking an average based on all the foregoing production alternatives, all of which are perfectly feasible under current technology, our mean recovery figure can be put at around 15 percent, giving us a potential reserve of 150 billion barrels of oil, or eight times our currently-known Venezuelan proved reserves and slightly more than the proved reserves of the largest OPEC producer, which is Saudi Arabia.

To date, 240 wells have been drilled in the Orinoco Belt, 125 of which alone have been drilled since the nationalization of the industry with 92 percent success--only 10 of them having turned out unproductive--and all of which are in more recent formations than the Paleozoic. The evaluation of the Belt is scheduled to be completed in 1983, although that of the Paleozoic will take more time.

NEW MENEVEN GAS PLANTS--With the construction of the El Toco and Sata Rosa II gas plants in the state of Anzoategui, MENEVEN will be able to produce 155 million cubic feet more of gas daily. The PETROVEN [Venezuelan Petroleum, Inc.] subsidiary has revealed that the El Toco plant will be equipped with three reciprocating compressors, 2,600 horsepower each, whose total processing capacity will be 75 million cubic feet of gas daily. The Santa Rosa II plant will have three 4,500 horsepower compressors and will be able to handle a total of 80 million cubic feet of gas daily. Both plants are a part of the Aragua Norte project in its second phase, which also includes dehydration systems installed in the El Toco and Santa Rosa areas and the San Joaquin metering station. According to information supplied by MENEVEN, the El Toco gas plant will be operational by the second half of 1981, and the Santa Rosa II plant will go into operation in the first quarter of 1982. The 155 million additional cubic feet produced by these two plants will be turned over to CORPOVEN for industrial and household uses. NEW HEAVY OIL REFINERY--Maturin, 3 Sep--A heavy oil refinery will be installed in the Sotillo District circumscription in the state of Monagas, according to an announcement made by Dr Pablo Morillo Robles, governor of the state, who indicated that "it was definitively laid down during a meeting with the minister of mines that the plant will be installed on the outskirts of the Uverito plantations in the Sotillo District." He stated that he has also understood that the Maturin Industrial Zone (ZIMCA) gas pipeline will be completed.

PORT GUARAGUAO OIL SHIPMENTS--Lagunillas, 30 Aug (Special)--MENEVEN has shipped 70 million barrels of oil and refinery products through the port of Guaraguao, state of Anzoategui, so far this year to domestic and international markets. This figure was released by a spokesman for that enterprise, a subsidiary of PETROVEN [Venezuelan Petroleum, inc], who also indicated that it represented an average of 335,500 barrels a day through this port which is considered to be the most completely equipped in Latin America, as well as being of fundamental importance to the national oil industry and vital to the exploitation of the Orinoco Tar Belt. The Guaraguao terminal--the spokesman said--has a maximum storage capacity of 4.5 million barrels of crude and 3.5 million barrels of refined products. Its six docks can accommodate the simultaneous loading of an equal number of tankers having a deadweight displacement of 45,000 to 110,000 tons and a draught of up to 55 feet. MENEVEN is currently enlarging dock number 4, to permit, when work is completed, a substantial savings in tanker loading time and a notable increase in its capacity for handling deep-draught vessels. PRESENCE OF FRG'S SOCIAL DEMOCRATIC PARTY GROWING IN LATIN AMERICA

[Article by Roberto Mardaraz: "The Social Democratic Party Seeks Consensus of the Strong Parties in Latin America"]

[Text] If we observe the establishment of the political forces in certain key areas of South America, we shall notice the proliferation of a phenomenon which, although not recent, is having a marked influence at present. We are referring to the extraordinary presence of European Social Democracy in the political spectra on this side of the continent.

In Venezuela, the Social Christians comprise the government, while the Democratic Socialists are the opposition, constituting a political entity which encompasses the country. For a few years at least, whatever be the changes which take place in the oil-producing nation, one of the two movements related to European Social Democracy will control the destiny of this territory, a genuine continental subpower.

In Brazil, the followers of Lionel Brizola's Labor Party have overt ties with the German Social Democratic labor confederation. This does not appear to preclude the possibility of Brazilian affiliation with the international entity that has its headquarters in the FRG, because there are friendly contacts with other party forces, ranging from the labor-oriented left wing to some moderate centrist sectors. For the present, we can be certain that the Social Democrats will be one of the protagonists in Brazil's future.

In Chile, the different options attempted by the government have not brought results among civilians that would lead to a natural succession to the military process. There is every indication that the latter will continue until its potential is exhausted. And, at present, the time may have come for the Social Christians, who have a competent spokesman in the Christian Democratic Party, to appear as the only possible alternative to the regime when the opening becomes an inevitable occurrence.

In Peru, the party currently in power is having a honeymoon with European Social Democracy, and its government is attempting to distinguish itself clearly from other types of power reflected in the area.

In Argentina, two forces that are fundamental from a quantitative standpoint (Peronism and Radicalism) have been unwilling to become affiliated with international entities, something that has left Social Democracy without powerful spokesmen. However, there is every indication that the future years of return to political activity and the resumption of the complete operation of institutions will witness intentions that are already under way: The European Social Democrats appear pleased to note the formation of one or two powerful national movements which would initiate for our country an international affiliation on the part of one or more political organizations.

This itinerary of the Social Democratic presence of South America does not end here, but with the references that have been made, one would have reason to admit that Venezuela, Brazil, Argentina, Peru and Chile, of themselves, may be a backbone for the subcontinent.

What is the significance of the advent of this new political phenomenon in a sector which (with but few exceptions) is familiar only with the international experience of the Marxist and leftist parties, or the outright influence of the powerful force of the imperialist countries?

First of all, it means that the ways of readjusting the international features of policy will be changing. In a part of the globe that has been strongly influenced by variants of the "big stick" and "good neighbor," the reality of the subtle balances sustaining the great Western power, the United States, does not allow it to decide at will on the destiny of nations, not even the smallest and weakest ones.

Moral Influence

With the policy of the club and the storming of the Marines bringing restoration abandoned because of the historical diminishment of the North American role, the United States has in recent years attempted to devise a moral influence, as in the widely publicized case of human rights. But this has not created a valid alternative that would be useful at the present time. The United States has not succeeded in adapting its imperialist influence to less crude and devastating types of relations than those of the past, but at the same time more effective ones than that attempted by President Carter.

Thus, between intervention and the club, and plaintive advice, there is an area of action which appears to tempt the international Social Democrats: democratic governments backed by strong parties or movements, and temporary coincidence with South American national interests, as opposed to the traditional North American exercise of spheres of influence.

The explanation for these facts is related to the overall progress that has taken place in the FRG, associated with these data and their corresponding inferences: a. economic expansion; b. exporting of its political methods; c. exporting of a new economic relationship with South America; d. creation of an alternative as independent as possible from the two superpowers, the U.S. and USSR.

The German economy is experiencing a flourishing period, particularly if we compare its status with the crisis besetting the majority of capitalist countries (see inset).

The projection of its economy into areas that have not been intensively exploited (such as South America) is merely a result of what has been noted.

The exporting of its political methods is related directly to the types of relationship between powers which must be created between Europe and South America, the possible effect on similar and friendly political forces and governments, and even the creation of a new socioeconomic dimension for each country in this part of the world, which would make possible the acceptance of its markets, and the assimilation of its technology, and would have areas in common for the understanding that flourishes in cultural proximity.

And, most particularly, it is related to its firm position in the center of Europe, retaining a high degree of maneuvering power in dealings with the United States and the Soviet Union, and devising a reasonably independent policy that does not depend on the interrelationship between the superpowers.

'The Interest of the Individual'

Six years ago, Raymond Aron commented in L'EXPRESS: "I really think that Europeans are as dissatisfied when there is a great deal of tension as they are when there is too much agreement between the United States and the Soviet Union. This is not so surprising: The secondary ally of a great power feels deprived of freedom of action and efficacy when the tension is such that it is forced to take refuge under the wing of its protector. But it also feels deprived of that freedom and efficacy when the tension disappears to the point where its protector can deal with the adversary without seeking the opinion of the secondary ally. I would call this a classic Machiavellian analysis."

This is the situation which Europe, through its visible mentor, the FRG, is trying to reverse. And it appears to be taking big steps in that direction, aided by the international situation, the oil crisis and the appearance of related phenomena such as China, Poland, the Third World, Cuba and certain Latin American countries, which have weakened the superpowers' operational opportunities.

To prove this, we have the recent example of the "Venice summit," which in the opinion of nearly all analysis seemed like "a mission to rescue Carter and the United States rather than a conversation by a superpower with its allies."

In conjunction with these global trends now confirmed by objective data, there has been added, for reasons which are different but similar with respect to instrument, Pope John Paul II, as a prestigious factor advocating the need for European openness toward Latin America.

Quite recently, upon receiving a delegation of 120 officials from the Organization of American States (OAS) and the European Economic Community (EEC), gathered in Rome to hold a series of meetings on European cooperation in Latin America, he spoke in favor of such cooperation, stressing the progress that it could mean for the backward sectors of the Latin American economies, a beneficial integration which would have as its focal point "the interest of the individual, and the criterion of the individual."

From now on, in order to understand the South American reality, we shall have to carefully monitor the movements of the Social Democrats on the continent. That presence, which is demanding an unprecedented role, may be the explanation for many of the changes aimed at a new type of political relationship, and an actual bipolarity in the orientation of Western affairs for this part of the world.

Brilliant Leaders and a Heavy Flow of Hard Currency Are Its Launching Pad

Any exporting of ideologies or political systems has as its counterpart a socioeconomic aspect which is tailored to fit the dimensions of the ideas.

But, in addition, any exporting of this type must be backed by an economic strength that will make it possible to devise a plan with concrete features, and that will change local situations, set up the propaganda apparatus and nurture the superstructure of the combined interests.

In the non-Marxist world, the FRG seems to have assumed a privileged status in that regard, with a launching platform that has an efficient political apparatus, brilliant leaders and a heavy flow of hard currency, to make the task possible.

The German stability seems indisputable: Despite the increased prices of crude, the FRG displays, like a "rara avis," a large surplus in its trading of goods, a remarkable situation if we note that other powers, such as the United States, Japan, France and Great Britain, show sizable deficits in the same respect.

Moreover, the size of the investment earmarked for hydrocarbons has not caused a major imbalance in the priorities for imports, in contrast to the forced readjustment that other powerful countries have had to make in the area of their purchases abroad, deleting many items on behalf of the increasingly larger space occupied by the amount of dollars allocated for oil.

The FRG's inflation rate is approximately half that of France, and a third that of Italy. While consumer prices have climbed nearly 15 percent in the United States, the Germans, still not satisfied with their results, can offer a more reassuring rate of increase: only 6 percent.

The efforts of the German Social Democrats to intensify their points of contact with South America are, generally speaking, comprised of the movement that occurred in 1977, with the establishment of the so-called North-South Commission, a result of a study made by 19 prominent personages who worked for over 2 years preparing a document in which they suggested that the industrialized countries of the Northern Hemisphere change their treatment of the poor countries in the Southern Hemisphere completely.

What is also termed the "Brandt report" proposes, in 360 concise pages, a massive increase in the government assistance (1 percent of their gross national product) to the growing countries, an international agreement that would insure an energy supply, a program to supply food to the needy countries, the liberation of international trade and a kind of tax benefiting the Third World nations, which would be levied primarily on the sale of weaponry.

The Brandt Report

The director of this movement, leader of the German Social Democratic Party (SDP) which is currently in power, answers to the name of Ernst Karl Frahm, although he is known worldwide as Billy Brandt, a change required during the period in which he was a refugee in Norway, hunted by the Nazis because of his membership in the German Socialist Party. The German with the greatest political influence at present asserts the European identity over the interests of the superpowers, and takes note of the signs of relative independence on both sides of the line separating the West from the Marxist countries: "What must now be cited as fortunately real is the European Economic Community, and also the fact that, in 1980, for the first time since World War II, East and West European countries are showing a deep concern for preventing the continent from becoming a critical area. This applies to both Paris and Warsaw, to Bonn and East Berlin, and to Rome or Budapest."

The message in the Brandt report and the conclusions of the North-South Commission are the first substantial expressions of dissemination on which the German Social Democrats have been working in South America.

During May of this year, a meeting was held in Colombia to analyze the "Brandt report," evoking the presence of many prominent personages from Latin America and Europe. A few days ago, the event was repeated in Brazil, in the locality of Canela, in the state of Rio Grande do Sul. The purpose of these seminars is to achieve valuable contacts, to become fully familiar with the local situations, to make alliances and to examine the prospects mutually with Latin American friends.

Another incident, which has not been widely publicized up until now, indicates continuity in the offensive: In October, a delegation from the German Social Democratic Party will visit South America, and the agendas for the first point of contact, Brazil, are being prepared right now. Rapid correspondence, hard-working embassies, and mutual friends in party leadership or among the waiting public are devoting much of their time to an evaluation of the South American reality through Social Democratic affiliation.

U.S. POSITION ON BOLIVIAN DRUG ISSUE CRITICIZED

Buenos Aires LA NACION in Spanish 20 Aug 80 p 8

[Editorial: "Charges Without Official Corroboration"]

[Text] The attitude of the United States toward the de facto government installed in Bolivia has developed some twists which make the explanation of its original political motivation unsatisfactory.

It is very understandable that the Carter government, embarked upon an indiscriminate crusade for democracy, should nurture the hope of achieving a significant landmark in Bolivia in the reestablishment of institutions in South America. In reality, the Bolivian landmark should be chronologically the first, prior to those in Ecuador and Peru, but the vicissitudes in the process have postponed it since the frustrated elections in 1978. Not only did the elections go uncompleted by the successive convocations in 1979 and 1980, but there was not even any continuity of line in the development toward full institutional government, because the coups d'etat involving Pereda and Padilla, in 1978, and Natusch Busch in 1979, intervened, with advances and reverses along the path in each case.

Carter's intention did not falter in the face of the contrasts. He accepted Pereda when he indicated readiness to resume the electoral path, and Padilla, when a prompt program was imposed upon him. He was willing to wait for the intermediary solution of the Guevara Arze interim government. He was adamant about the inconsistency of Natusch and was willing to invest hope again in the outcome of Mrs Gueiler's second interim government.

As a result, it was not surprising that he adopted an extreme position in the Garcia Meza coup emergency, which served to end the process at a time inconvenient for Carter because of his own electoral campaign. Bolivia could not overnight become yet another defeat on his burdened shoulders.

However, it is necessary to attribute the unsuitability of Carter proselytizing campaign to the foolish importance some sectors in his administration have attributed to the heart of the Bolivian problem.

The reports about the drug traffic, situated on the vague line between the official and the unofficial, constitute a sector as confused as the problem itself, which has precedents inauspicious for its political projection, as has been seen in other cases.

Also a reasonable concern for safeguarding the policy of urging democracy and human rights requires a precise and careful orientation which cannot be supported by charges hurled without official corroboration, inspired by deliberately confused reporting in an effort to provoke other conflicts of an international nature outside Bolivia, instead of dealing with them by means of timely correction within the Carter government administration itself.

UN DECOLONIZATION COMMITTEE RESOLUTION ON PUERTO RICO RIDICULED

[Editorial: "Political Shamelessness of the Dictatorships"]

[Text] Absurdity, from the logical point of view, and shamelessness, from the moral point of view, seem to have taken over in international bodies in recent years, without the reactions which would have been expected from the community of free nations. The resolutions being approved and the statements being formulated in these bodies are so openly in contradiction with common sense and realism on the part of the governments which sign them that only a profound and extensive ethical-political anesthesia can explain or allow them.

In recent days, the so-called "decolonization committee" of the United Nations has approved a resolution in which "the inalienable right of the people of Puerto Rico to self-determination and independence is confirmed." It "urges the government of the United States to take all the steps necessary for the full transfer of power to the people of Puerto Rico" and "condemns the persecution and repressive measures to which the organizations and individuals struggling for the self-determination and independence of Puerto Rico are being subjected."

Now then, all the individuals--and there are a very large number throughout the world--who have had an opportunity to visit Puerto Rico in the course of the past 30 years, at least, have seen for themselves--and there is no way of changing this reality--that on this island, those who want to set forth their ideas in opposition to the present political status of affiliation with the United States can freely do so. It is possible to purchase newspapers, magazines and books there advocating this position, and to hear on the radio and television ardent defenders of this "self-determination and independence" which the United Nations recommends. This has been true, in fact, for many decades. But the fact is also that other individuals, other political groups, other publications and other speakers on radio and television put forth different ideas, and it happens that throughout these many years, the popular elections--and no journalist or committee or individual whatsoever needs to ask permission of anyone in order to observe and study them--have invariably yielded results favorable to the present status.

Moreover, Puerto Ricans of any age, sex or status can leave and return to the island in full freedom. Large numbers of them settle voluntarily in the United States, where, despite the numerous difficulties which the mass communications media make a point of publicizing widely, they prefer to live and remain. They can also return, temporarily or permanently, retain or sell what is theirs, maintain family ties--in a word, they are fully citizens of a country and they have voted--not once but many times--to reiterate that they do not want to lose that privilege. And who has put forth this recommendation? As was to be expected, one of the countries sponsoring the recommendation is Cuba, and the Soviet Union, Afghanistan, Bulgaria, Czechoslovakia, and Iran, among others, totaling 12, have voted for it enthusiastically. It is plainly unacceptable for these countries to propose and approve a statement in which they shamelessly demand, as we said in the beginning, precisely what they have brutally denied their own peoples for decades now.

While the Cubans run every possible risk in order to escape from their island, from which an absolute dictatorship prohibits their emigration, allowing this in some cases at a price of total and irreversible loss of their assets, their family relationships and ties; while Soviet citizens go into exile elsewhere in the world if only they have the opportunity; while the Berlin wall remains as a tremendous symbol of the drama of the peoples who have remained prisoners on the other side of the iron curtain; while in Iran there are again public floggings and stoning and hanging of men and women for shortcomings in their private moral character, these same nations "recommend" and "urge" other countries to give freedom, self-determination and independence to the inhabitants of an island who can leave and reenter their land, who can hear all ideological positions, who vote freely and in the final analysis choose to live where they want . . . and many of them choose precisely the United States.

It is not our intention to praise or condemn the present political status of Puerto Rico in this commentary. However, there is a need to point out the moral indignation caused by such recommendations, which the free peoples seem incapable of expressing in the international bodies.

PRINCIPLE OF RECIPROCITY VIEWED AS KEY TO PARKINSON'S VISIT

Buenos Aires LA NACION in Spanish 20 Aug 80 p 8

[Editorial: "Argentine-British Trade"]

[Text] The intention of the present British Government to promote trade relations between that country and ours is visible. The visits paid last year and this by various missions specializing in economic matters is a concrete indication of this, underlined a few days ago by Secretary of State for Trade Cecil Parkinson of the United Kingdom.

Without a doubt, this decision plays a role in the outline of a British policy designed to recover and strengthen its export markets in Latin America. The fact that this problem is closely linked with the interference of European Economic Community criteria for the farm crop and livestock breeding production orbit should not be overlooked. These decisions affect Argentina and Latin America generally unfavorably, by limiting regional exports both to the United Kingdom and to other member nations of the community.

Where Argentine economic policy as it has been viewed since 24 March 1976 is concerned specifically, the visitor mentioned deemed it a very favorable factor for the increase of the volume of operations, their diversification and value. The statement defining international trade--not aid or credit--as "the greatest source of wealth and the most vigorous catalyst for economic development" agrees with what we have been setting forth as our views in these editorial columns.

Secretary Parkinson also spoke in Cordoba. What he said appeared to be an apology for his country, when he spoke of the neglect by the United Kingdom of its Latin American markets, Argentina among them, in the past 30 years. It is to be hoped that the announced visit next September by Great Britain's minister of agriculture, Peter Walker, will be reflected in a concrete upsurge in Argentine exports in this sector to the United Kingdom and the entire Community.

Mr Parkinson was categorical in his views about the erroneous agrarian policy of the EEC, which has had such disadvantageous effects on our shipments to Great Britain and the other European countries, and it would be wrong to sidestep it.

Without a doubt, it would be best if the reestablishment of links with the United Kingdom in the trade sector were not limited exclusively to the invisible exports of that nation or the purchases of British products made by Argentina. Instead, it is to be hoped that there will be more purchases and investments so that the advantages will be mutual, facilitating the creation by London of new jobs and new production sources served by technology which welcomes foreign contributions when they come in transfers consistent with the legitimate national interests.

The volume of trade between the United Kingdom and Argentina, according to the official figures of that nation, borne out by other approximate figures provided by the authorities in our country, came to 153,191,000 pounds for sales to Great Britain in 1978, with a drop in that volume to 145,064,000 in 1979. The reverse occurred with regard to Argentine purchases from the United Kingdom. The total was 113,826,000 pounds in 1978 and 128,278,000 in 1979. In any case, these figures, converted into dollars--the traditional currency for foreign trade calculations--need to be more than doubled. The balance then is favorable to Argentina by about 20 percent, a substantial margin for a relationship shown by all the evidence to be truly and firmly bilateral.

It is to be expected, as a result, that trade between the two countries will reach the levels consistent with a long, fertile and traditional friendship. This is the foreseeable result of the visits paid by the British missions which have been warmly welcomed by Argentines both in the public and private sector.

OIL PRODUCTION FIGURES SHOW 5.2 PERCENT INCREASE

Buenos Aires LA NACION in Spanish 26 Aug 80 p 15

[Text] In the first 7 months of this year, oil production was up 5.2 percent in comparison to the same period last year, natural gas injection at gas pipeline heads was up 9 percent, and electricity generated increased 11.4 percent. On the other hand, a 37.5-percent decline in coal extraction was seen in this period.

The volume of oil imports, for their part, were up 38.9 percent and required the expenditure of 91.7 percent more foreign exchange than in the comparable period in 1979.

Oil

Cumulative oil production for the first 7 months of this year came to 16.5 million cubic meters, while last month 2.3 million cubic meters were produced. The latter figure shows an increase of 4.2 percent over the figure for the same month last year.

Oil imports totaled a volume of 1.474 million cubic meters in the first 7 months of the year, requiring an expenditure of $303,339,000, or $145,135,700 more than in the same period in 1979.

Gas and Coal

Natural gas injection at gas pipeline heads totaled 5,664,600,000 cubic meters during this period, while in July an 8.2-percent increase over the same month the preceding year was seen in injection. The total injected was 974.1 million cubic meters.

Production of commercial coal showed a decline of 156,800 tons from the figure for last year during this period. A total of 261,800 tons was produced. Production in July totaled 31,300 tons, showing a 55.5-percent drop in comparison to the same month the preceding year.

Electricity

The electricity generated at public service power plants came to 20.9 million megawatt hours in the first 7 months of the year, while the figure for last month was 3.2 million megawatt hours, thus showing an increase of 13.6 percent over July of 1979.

The structure of electrical power generation was as follows: thermoelectric plants, 53.3 percent, hydroelectric plants, 41.7 percent, and nuclear plants, 5 percent.

MINISTER RELEASES DETAILS ON FORMOSA DAM

Buenos Aires LA PRENSA in Spanish 26 Aug 80 p 11

[Text] Formosa--In an interview granted to this reporter, Lt Col Juan Alberto Tisnes, minister of public works and services, provided details on the construction of the Laguna Yema dam, which will be the largest in area in the country. His undersecretary, Nestor G. Carranza, hydraulic projects director engineer Carlos Jose Lagranja, and applied hydraulics engineer Oscar Aldo Sikora, were also present.

This project will be completed in three stages, bids having already been awarded on the first, at a total cost of 110 billion pesos. The reservoir surface will total 14,500 hectares and depth will range between 0 and 7 meters. The batter at the bottom of the reservoir will be of earth, and will be 30 kilometers long and 5 meters high.

First Stage--Diversion Projects

These involve collecting, directing and controlling the waters of the Bermejo River to the left of it toward the Formosa area, by means of a reinforced concrete and hardwood preintake in the bank of the river, equipped with grilles to block the passage of tree trunks and branches and other objects floating on or carried along by the water.

A sedimentation canal will also be built, where the heavy particles of soil in suspension in the water will settle, along with a fixed intake of reinforced concrete, with manual and automatic gates which will close when the flow exceeds 15 cubic meters per second, such as to ensure the adequate and necessary volume for proper management of the water, and also a canal from the intake to the natural channel known as the Teuquito Creek, which will carry the water to the reservoir.

Second Stage--Reservoir Dam

The handling capacity of the Teuquito Creek will be corrected, cleaned and adapted, and water will be stored in the natural depression known as Laguna Yema. By blocking it frontally on the north and south, its storage capacity as a natural reservoir will be increased, producing a lake with a volume of 256 cubic hectameters, a water surface of 14,500 hectares, and a depth varying between 0 and 7 meters.

This blockage, or embankments for containment, make up the dam or dike of loose earth material, which will be approximately 30 kilometers long and 5 meters high, with the corresponding drainage projects, an intake which will receive water through floodgates and a spillway with a tailrace to carry off the excess which for any reason cannot be stored by the dam, either due to heavy rainfall, flooding of the Bermejo River, faulty handling or defects in the intake gates.

It should be stressed that at the mouth of the dam intake installations, a hydroelectric generating turbine will be built, at a low water volume level, to produce approximately 200 kilowatts of energy, at maximal power, to provide elimination for the intakes, spillways, the face of the dam and roads.

All of the energy needed to supply the control houses, project inspection and administration will be produced by solar energy.

Third Stage--Canal and Aqueduct

Once the reservoir waters have been diverted, transported, stored and placed under control, water will be distributed to all of the settlements located along national road number 81, from Ingeniero Juarez to Pirane, over a distance of approximately 350 kilometers, as well as others located to the north and south of that road, as the need arises.

The channel leading the water from the Laguna Yema reservoir to Pirane will be an open one, excavated in natural terrain and with natural slopes, so that the flow throughout its length will rely on gravity, rather than any mechanical or electrical apparatus.

Its maximal capacity is estimated at 10 cubic meters of flow per second, and quotas will be allocated by water measurement and distribution facilities on the canal, in accordance with consumer use demand.

Since there is between Laguna Yema and Ingeniero Juarez an unfavorable incline 34 meters high, making it impossible to transport the water by gravity, plans call for a circular pressure aqueduct using an electro-mechanical pump, which will take the necessary flow from Laguna Yema to Ingeniero Juarez and the intermediate localities.

Basic Goal

With a negative hydric balance (more evaporation than precipitation) in the central and western parts of the province, a semiarid to arid climate prevails, with permeable and eroded soils, making it impossible to reestablish the plant cover, and making the storage of rainwater in reservoirs or dams built on natural terrain difficult.

The high level of infiltration, added to the fact that there is little underground water, a high salt content, and a lack of permanent or intermittent channels to facilitate the diversion, storage and use of the water, make it necessary to turn to the rivers on the periphery of the province, in particular the Bermejo River, which runs along the boundary of Formosa with the Chaco.

The projects for the multiple use of the Teuco River and Laguna Yema will serve to provide the settlements located all along national road number 81 from Ingeniero Juarez to Pirane, and others to the north and south of it, with drinking water. The maximal consumption volume per inhabitant and per day have been calculated with a view to great comfort and health. Provisions allow for more than 50 years of consumption by animals, industries, small intensive irrigation facilities for early crops, recreation and tourism.

Along with this, the ecological impact this will have on the environment must be taken into account. The processes of soil and vegetation erosion will be reversed and the atmosphere in the central and western parts of the province will become more humid. This will result in the recovery of vast areas of fertile land and an abundance of water which will contribute to the development and strengthening of this province, embedded in the heart of the Plate River basin and regarded as a foodgrowing reserve for the year 2000.

Immediate Plans

In the course of this fiscal year, bids on the three stages for the multiple-use project for the Teuco River and Laguna Yema will be awarded, with the completion of the project scheduled for the end of 1982.

According to these plans, the province will have an adequate flow of water in terms of quantity, quality, space and time for its economic and social development beginning in 1983.

Key:

1. Diversion projects (first stage)
2. Reservoir projects (second stage)
3. Reservoir-Laguna Yema-Pirane canal (third stage)
4. Reservoir-Laguna Yema-Ingeniero Juarez aqueduct (third stage)
5. Salta Province
6. Aqueduct
7. Canal
8. Formosa Province
9. Tilcomayo River
10. Bermejo River
11. Paraguay River

NEW THERMOELECTRIC PLANT TO BEGIN OPERATING IN 1983

Buenos Aires LA NACION in Spanish 25 Aug 80 p 13

[Text] Bahia Blanca--Employees of the Buenos Aires Power Administration (DEBA) set forth to municipal employees and representatives of active local bodies certain aspects of the construction of the Bahia Blanca thermoelectric plant, which will be built in the Engineer White port zone in the environs of this city, on an area of 57 hectares recovered from the sea. A survey was made at this site precisely to check on the development of the preliminary work being carried out.

The report was submitted by engineer Nesto Busso, manager of the new plant, and engineer Aldo Parenza, assistant manager and project inspector.

Intendant Victor Puente and representatives of a number of local community institutions toured the site.

The importance of the project was made evident in a demonstration provided by engineer Parenza using graphic materials.

The Bahia Blanca thermoelectric plant will begin operation in 1983, it was said.

It was explained on this occasion that in terms of electrical energy production, the plant will rank second nationally, with 4,200,000,000 kilowatt hours, after Salto Grande. Another fact indicative of the scope of the project is the fuel consumption, which is estimated at 1,778,600 tons of coal per year, or 253.8 tons per hour, to operate it. If fuel oil is used instead of coal, 10 railroad trains a day will be needed to supply it.

The boilers are 120 meters high and the chimney will be 150 meters high, although it has not yet been decided if it will be built of cement or steel.

The DEBA employees said that all possible steps had been taken to prevent environmental pollution.

Plans call for supplementary projects, moreover, with a wharf and a viaduct to accommodate incoming coal or fuel oil, and the expropriation of adjacent land which will be filled with coal ash.

It has been estimated that if this ash is used for fill, 10 hectares a year can be brought up to a level equal to that of the 57 hectares recovered from the sea.

A supplementary project which is already in full swing is the building of 50 housing units immediately adjacent to the port zone, which will be a part of an urban complex for the use of the technicians and personnel at the new plant.

Engineers Busso and Parenza also explained that in addition to the fill work done to date, what has been accomplished at the site where the plant will be built involves a workshop.

Plans call for beginning the pilings by the end of the month, and this work will last the balance of the year, with the cementing of the foundations and the installation of the boilers, as well as the construction of auxiliary buildings, starting in 1981.

A cement plant has been built, requiring the placement of 58 pilings, because of its size, to supply the cement. There is also a large shed recently built, where equipment destined for the plant, basically turbine parts manufactured in the Soviet Union, are being stored.

The DEBA authorities said that at the peak of activity, 1,500 persons will be employed in the installation of the Bahia Blanca thermoelectric plant.

The new plant, which will produce 620,000 kilowatts, will begin to generate energy in the first half of 1983.

ZORREGUIETA: NEW ECONOMIC MEASURES TO BENEFIT FARMERS

Buenos Aires CONVICCION in Spanish 10 Aug 80 p 13

[Text] At the official inauguration of the 30th International Livestock, Agricultural and Industrial Exposition on the premises of the Argentine Rural Society, Secretary of Agriculture and Livestock Jorge Zorreguieta reported on the situation in the farm sector and the beneficial effects which he believes the measures announced by the minister of economy will have. He urged "serious and responsible bodies" just as they "criticize what they disagree with not to forget to express their approval of that with which they do agree, not because ready applause is needed, but because the changes produced are great and must be maintained, and they are being attacked, taking advantage of certain situations, by those who are the true enemies of this process of reorganization and its philosophy."

This official said that the Argentine Rural Society, in its 114 years of existence, has organized 94 expositions--30 of them of an international nature--in which the government and agriculture have participated, and he stressed the importance of "maintaining traditions such as this one, above all in a young country such as ours, in a setting such as the Palermo Park, which enhances its brilliance by making it available to all sectors of the people."

Zorreguieta stressed the importance of Argentina as a world producer of foodstuffs, and recalled that at the beginning of this year the country demonstrated its freedom of decision in matters of great importance to the national interest, in a situation involving the marketing of grain. "This entailed a great responsibility on the part of all, the government and the governed," he added.

The head of the Secretariat of Agriculture and Livestock stated that "we have signed agreements to sell grain to various countries, guaranteeing the placement of a total of 3.2 million tons of corn, 1 million tons of sorghum, 1.1 million tons of wheat, and 500,000 tons of soybeans, representing 32 percent of our exports for the year 1979, the highest in our history. In other words, we have a third of the exportable balance of the harvest sold before it is planted.

"Among these agreements is that we signed a month ago with the Soviet Union, covering a total of 4.5 million tons per year of corn, sorghum and soybeans, to be effective until 31 December 1985. This is the most important agreement signed by our country in its history as a grain exporter.

"We are in a position to announce that we are negotiating with the authorities in Mexico, with whom we are confident we will agree upon the sale of a substantial volume to be added to that already arranged."

Referring to "the beneficial effects to the economy as a whole, but for export production in particular" to be expected from the measures announced by Martinez de Hoz, Zorreguieta said that the value added tax (VAT), which the producer will not have to pay, will mean "the disappearance of a number of taxes imposed on exports and domestic sales of production, representing an improvement of about 10 percent in the real price for grains and oleaginous crops; the elimination of 7 percent of the taxes involved in livestock sales transactions, plus other taxes on livestock exports; and this will also mean a lower business cost with a substantial reduction in the social burdens which, naturally, are of greater importance for the crops which make more intensive use of manpower than for the pampas crops, but in any case representing a general benefit. This means less tax pressure on the farm sector and a change in the tax system which will improve the capacity of our production to compete abroad.

"The combined effect of the tax reductions being effected, along with the increase in the international prices and the agreements signed, will lead to a change in the profitability of crops for the coming harvest, net and gross, so that we are confident in a positive change in the expectations the farmers had only 30 days ago.

"The reductions in the import duties announced will also have an impact on farm costs, and, along with the implementation of other measures, they will have a favorable effect on the price of supplies."

This official stressed that, in the financial category--of great importance to farm production--"credit support from the Bank of the Argentine Nation and the Bank of the Province of Buenos Aires for seasonal production has been arranged," including production included in the "farm season in progress, to cover planting and total expenditures through and including the harvest, and giving the producers the option of taking this credit in foreign currency.

"This complex of measures," he stressed, "remains consistent with the main principle we have always defended, to the effect that if Argentine products are to compete on international markets, they must have international costs too."

Zorreguieta announced that major laws have been amended, and new criteria have been adopted to resolve basic questions in the farm sector. "The government has approved the changes in the grain law," he said, "allowing the construction and operation of elevator terminals by the private sector." He also mentioned the tax reduction law, designed to increase farm production on rural land with low productivity. The decree regulating it, he said, "we have already submitted, and it is most necessary for the marginal land in order to increase investments on the farm frontier."

He stressed that "the draft amendment to the rural leasing law has been submitted to the legislative advisory commission," and he termed it "an essential tool for farm development, which in the past allowed social mobility and advancement in the Argentine rural sector, but which in practice has been suppressed for more than three decades."

Later this official said that a plan for the agricultural development of Patagonia, with the full participation of the provinces and the producers in this region, has been completed, and will be submitted to the national executive branch in the next few days. He also said that within a week the mechanism for the first stage of the Plan for the Control and Eradication of Foot and Mouth Disease (PLACEFA), which will cover the entire national territory in successive stages, will be announced.

Zorreguieta said that the decree establishing the board of directors of the INTA [National Institute of Agricultural and Livestock Technology] has been sent to the executive branch. "The Secretariat of Agriculture is maintaining a continuing dialog with the producers and we have always listened to and understood demands," he added.

This official said that "we understand that the producers are concerned, because we too are concerned, about the current cost and price and farm profitability problems which have become especially difficult in the case of certain regional crops or production on which the international prices have recently dropped."

In conclusion, Zorreguieta said that the renewal of officials which will occur in March of 1981 will not interrupt the political continuity of the government, and he promised that "never again will the role of agriculture as the dynamizing factor in the economy be undervalued."

METALLURGIC INDUSTRY REGISTERS SHARP DROP IN FARM EQUIPMENT

Buenos Aires LA NACION in Spanish 26 Aug 80 p 16

[Text] "The level of activity in the metallurgical industry at the end of the month of June was not uniform, that is to say rather substantial differences were seen among the various sectors comprising it. On one level we would place the group made up of those sectors showing a level of activity we would venture to term 'acceptable' in terms of the general economic context." These statements were made in a report drafted by the Association of Metallurgical Industrialists (ADIM) on the present situation in the metallurgical industry.

The ADIM analysis goes on to say: "In this first group, the volume of production and sales at the end of the month of June 1980 was similar to that reported a year previously, with approximtely 75 to 80 percent use of installed factory capacity being reported. The sectors surveyed which fall within this group were mainly the automotive industry, primary aluminum production (excluding exports) and galvanized plate manufacturing.

"The second group," the report went on, "could be characterized by describing its level of activity as relatively 'regular.' Here production and sales for the month of June were lower than those seen a year earlier by 10 to 20 percent, with between 65 and 75 percent of installed productive capacity in use. This group includes a number of sectors surveyed, including among others aluminum (excluding exports), lead, zinc, aluminum manufacturing, copper manufacturing, casting, freezers, washing machines, sewing machines, electric motors and tools.

"Finally, we have a third group made up of the sectors presenting a plainly 'poor' level of activity. The level of use of productive capacity averaged 50 percent up to last June."

The report goes on to say: "This group is made up mainly of various capital goods. In some cases the situation seen in 1980 was not substantially different from that reported in 1979 (for example tractors, internal combustion engines). In other cases, however, the 1980 situation showed a substantial reduction in comparison to 1979 (for example machine tools, harvesters, farm implements, road machinery). We would say in conclusion that it is within this third group that the most negative indicators for the second half of the present year are to be seen."

ROMERO BARCELO SCORED FOR BACKING PUERTO RICAN STATEHOOD

Havana GRANMA WEEKLY REVIEW in English 21 Sep 80 p 11

[Article by Oscar Ferrer: "Romero Barcelo Wants To Be a Yankee"]

[Text] There are people who are so subservient, with such well-ingrained colonial mentalities and antipatriotic and antinational stands that they feel ashamed at having been born in their own countries. One of these individuals is Carlos Romero Barcelo, the governor of Puerto Rico, who is a native of the island because he couldn't help it and is proud to be a U.S. citizen. But he is not a U.S. citizen by birth, as he would have wanted it, but rather because the U.S. Congress imposed citizenship on the Puerto Ricans in 1917.

This made to order American, who occupies the post of governor of this colonized island for the benefit of the Yankee leaders, declares unashamedly, "We are proud to be U.S. citizens." When he talks in the first person plural, we must assume he's talking for himself, his family (his wife is a U.S. citizen by birth), and a group of ranting annexationists who were also born in the wrong country.

Romero Barcelo is so anti-Puerto Rican and suffers from such a big national inferiority complex that he once said, "Until Puerto Rico becomes a state of the Union, the island will not be able to promote better relations between the United States and Latin America; as a state we could, because they would see us as equals."

Thus, for the colonial governor of Puerto Rico, his island's mission is to facilitate improved relations between the U.S. and Latin America. He is trying to deny the fact that an independent Puerto Rico, capable of running its own internal and foreign affairs, and without the undesirable tutelage of Washington, would be the only way to rescue national identity and deal with the rest of the countries on the continent and in the world as equals. And that would be done in the interests of the Puerto Ricans, not in the interests of the Yankees.

Romero Barcelo repeats his annexationist offensive, this time in written form, in the most recent issue of the U.S. magazine FOREIGN AFFAIRS. In it, admits that Puerto Rico is nothing more than a territory of the United States--read "colony"--and insists that the time has come for Puerto Rico to become the 51st state of the Union.

The article is a reply to an article in the previous issue written by Alfred Stepan, a Yale University professor, asserting that independence could be the most constructive solution for Puerto Rico. Romero Barcelo tries to demonstrate the supposed advantages of statehood for Puerto Rico and attempts to minimize the international support for the cause of Puerto Rican independence.

In this way the governor is trying to ignore, among other things, the resolutions in favor of self-determination and independence for Puerto Rico adopted every year for the last three years by the UN Committee on Decolonization. Romero Barcelo has tried unsuccessfully to deny that Committee the authority to analyze the Puerto Rican situation, as if the island were not really a colony of the United States.

In his FOREIGN AFFAIRS article, the governor, a member of the New Progressive Party (PNP), avoids the subject of annexation in order to lay the groundwork for the well-known goal of his administration, his Party and the White House: to hold a plebiscite on the status of Puerto Rico.

This plebiscite, the holding of which depends on the victory of the PNP in next November's elections, would take place one year later and would be manipulated by the colonial government in order to make the results look favorable to annexation. Immediately after, the PNP government would ask the U.S. Congress to admit Puerto Rico as state No 51.

Romero Barcelo would do anything to be a Yankee. He doesn't want to die as a naturalized U.S. citizen; he wants to live in a territory that is formally part of the U.S. And the only way to do that is to make Puerto Rico a state of the Union, in spite of the opposition to annexation voiced by the people of the island and the world.

The colonial governor of Puerto Rico continues to prove that he is not a man of this century, much less of the last few decades, which have been characterized by the inexorable advance of the decolonization process internationally. His position as an agent of colonialism and an enemy of independence for his native land would have made Romero Barcelo the perfect servant of Cecil Rhodes.

This man, who wants to be a Yankee despite the fact that he wasn't born in the United States, properly belongs to the period when colonialism was on the rise and not to the time when it is facing its decline and inevitable elimination.

Poor Romero Barcelo.

'PRELA' PHOTOGRAPHER--Comrade Cristobal Pascual Linares, a veteran photographer and untiring revolutionary fighter, died yesterday in Havana. Pascual was chief of the photography department of CUBA magazine. He was also a photographer for PRENSA LATINA and a party member. He was 62 years old. [FL221738 Havana Domestic Service in Spanish 1600 GMT 22 Sep 80]

URUGUAYAN CP CELEBRATION--The need for unity is above life itself and the forces fighting Uruguayan fascism are aware of this, said (Manuel Pineiro), member of the Central Committee and chief of its America department, at the main ceremony held to mark the 60th anniversary of the founding of the Communist Party of Uruguay [PCU]. The ceremony was held at the Ministry of Communications theater and was presided by Julio Camacho Aguilera, member of the Central Committee Secretariat; Nicolas Guillen, also a member of the Central Committee, and other leaders. In his speech, (Manuel Pineiro) noted how the blood of Uruguayan communists has flown alongside that of other leftist militants who have been the victims of fascist violence, the outcome of which has been that no amount of repression has been able to silence the combative presence of the communists, destroy their indestructible unity with the working class or break up the organizational structure of the PCU in or out of Uruguay. MEXICAN GOVERNOR--Leandro Rovirosa Wade, governor of the Mexican state of Tabasco, has been visiting Cuba since 19 September. He was received yesterday at the Cuban-Mexican Society for Cultural Relations. Taking part in the fraternal meeting were Flavio Bravo, vice president of the Council of Ministers and member of the Central Committee; Ramon Castro, vice president of the Cuban-Mexican Society; and Alfonso Guillen Zelaya, vice president of the Cuban Institute for Friendship with Peoples. [FL221738 Havana Domestic Service in Spanish 1600 GMT 22 Sep 80]

ACTIVITIES OF MEXICAN GOVERNOR--A Mexican delegation headed by Leandro Rovirosa Wade, governor of the state of Tabasco, has visited the Valles de Picadura Livestock Breeding Farm. The delegation of the fraternal country, accompanied by Ramon Castro, national work hero and director of the farm, visited the Penas Del Leon community, the 14 June semiboarding school and the livestock installations. Rovirosa Wade emphasized the successes of the revolution in livestock development and the social progress of the peasants. [PA232203 Havana Domestic Service in Spanish 2130 GMT 23 Sep 80]

PROVINCIAL PARTY SECRETARY--Party Central Committee member Luis Alfonso Zayas has been elected first secretary of the Provincial Party Committee in Las Tunas Province during today's second day of sessions of the committee's review meeting. The 73 active members and 8 alternate members of the provincial committee and the 56 delegates to the Second Party Congress were introduced during the session. CAMAGUEY PARTY MEETING--Party Politburo member Juan Almeida Bosque has made the closing remarks at the Provincial Party Review meeting in Camaguey. He stressed the need to reduce as soon as possible the negative aspects in livestock which are caused by many deficiences and objective problems. He also noted the advances made in education, public health and artistic activities and he urged furthering the best cultural manifestations of a massive nature. [FL271432 Havana Domestic Service in Spanish 1000 GMT 27 Sep 80]

TRANSPORTATION, COMMUNICATIONS MEETING--A meeting has been held to examine fulfillment of the technical and economic plan for the first half of the year in transportation and communications. The meeting was chaired by Party Politburo member Guillermo Garcia, minister of transportation. Communications Minister Pedro Guelmes participated in the meeting. It was learned that the transportation ministry overfulfilled its plan over the first 6 months of the year by 14.2 percent in comparison with the same period last year. Maritime activity was classified as positive while industrial, construction and automotive activities were negative. The communications ministry also overfulfilled its plan by 15 percent over the same period last year. Its best branches were construction, installations and communications. BPR PUBLICATION COMMENTS ON 'YANKEE" ROLE

PA300127 San Salvador API NEWS in Spanish Vol 2, No 169, pp 1545, 1546

[Taken from COMBATE, a publication published in Sweden by the Peoples Revolutionary Bloc of El Salvador]

[Excerpts] The history of Yankee imperialism has been a history of direct machinations to keep the entire world subjected to the unjust capitalist system.

The arrogant Yankee has been characterized by his hatred of mankind and of progress. The trail of genocide, of entire countries razed by troops, of persons devastated and settlements decimated by his pitiless counterinsurgency tactics are on the black list that can be attributed to the number one enemy of humanity.

For some time, he has been preparing the political and military conditions that will serve to cushion such criminal aggression.

He has woven a complete international campaign to give vigor to his "anticommunist doctrine," emphasizing the need to "defend himself" from international communist subversion.

ERNESTO JOVEL'S LAST INTERVIEW PUBLISHED

PA012306 Panama City CRITICA in Spanish 1 Oct 80 pp 16, 17

[Text] The Salvadoran people are a noble people, part of the great family of Central American and Latin American peoples, who share a common origin and a liberation struggle identified with all the Latin American and Caribbean peoples.

Today, El Salvador is bleeding. Regardless of their political or ideological banners, its best children are falling in fields and cities. It would seem that there is no way to achieve a "cease-fire." The country becomes more hopelessly polarized every day.

What is to be done? How can one help?

The following is the last interview granted by Commander Ernesto Jovel. He was a Salvadoran youth, a Latin American youth, a youth of the world.

--Our military activities are being intensified to show the people the only alternative of struggle in this country, which at this point has led to military activities. Our purpose is to present the military alternative as a form of struggle for our people and to enter a phase of attrition and annihilation of the enemy forces in order to proceed to the phase of the overthrow of the Junta. We believe this can happen in the short term.

The Majano Case

--This situation is very typical of the characteristics and tradition of the country's armed forces. Within the armed forces there are sectors and groups that hold truly democratic positions but which do not have any chance of reemerging as a solution to the deep crisis currently affecting the system. It is a situation that has very little significance and importance for revolutionaries because at this point the democratic and progressive sectors within the army have been totally neutralized by the fascist forces within the army.

--We believe that within the framework of the enemy's plans to neutralize the revolutionary movement, Colonel Majano has no other alternative. He may reemerge momentarily, very temporarily if he stages a coup, which is very difficult. This would immediately lead to a new phase of the crisis and to a further deterioration of this situation. It has been shown that the current crisis will not be resolved until we revolutionaries reach positions of power and participate in the governing process with our part of the power.

--There is no relationship with the progressive sectors within the army. There is political identity when the interests of both democrats and revolutionaries come together. All forces are participating in the struggle. But because of the military caste within the army there is no close relationship, there is nothing official. The groups within the army have their place and participate too, and we are sure that at the time of combat they will join the struggle.

--This is a view held by the Unified Revolutionary Directorate (DRU). Generally speaking, there is unity in promoting short-term military activities. We are fully capable of promoting military activities. We have 200 commanders trained in combat with sophisticated military techniques. They head 400 companies which do exist and are well armed.

--We maintain that there are progressive and democratic sectors within the army. We do not see any prospect in connection with Colonel Majano. He has been a member of the Junta for quite some time and we do not believe he has any possibilities as such. Even if he resigned he would not elicit any favorable reaction from the revolutionary movement because his position is very ambiguous. He is a democrat, but even if he resigns, he cannot do anything for our people's struggle.

The United States

--The United States is willing to support the Junta because the Junta is its only way to control the current situation. We think that the United States controls the situation.

--It is hard to set dates on insurrection, but we can say that the beginning of the great insurrectional struggles, going from the simple to the complex stage began this year. This also depends on developments. To the extent people participate in the armed struggle, the struggle will be developed.

--Armed forces development. We believe that within the army there are both, fascist forces and democratic sectors advocating coups. At this point the fascists have no chance of consolidating a position within the government. First of all, because that is not the current U.S. policy.

Problem of Unity

--Rupture. We remain completely united and these are nothing but rumors. There are some problems with unity, but this is normal and natural in the case of the unification of revolutionaries not only in our country but internationally. We continue to be part of the DRU and are all bent on becoming more united and on coordinating all mass and military actions required by the process. These are rumors spread by the enemy's forces. There may be some misunderstandings. We, the secretaries general--Salvador Cayetano Carpio of the Popular Liberation Forces; Joaquin Villalobos of the People's Revolutionary Army; Jorge Handal of the Communist Party of El Salvador and Ernesto Jovel of National Resistance--remain within the DRU and continue promoting unity.

--We have a fully charted war plan complete with the forces, weapons, strategy and tactics to begin implementing it. All actions are currently coordinated. Each organization is familiar with the plan and the actions it will carry out. The DRU has assigned tasks to various organizations.

--The government to be established by the Revolutionary Democratic Front, in which all democratic and revolutionary forces will participate, will be pluralistic.

--From the military point of view, much secrecy surrounds the seizure of power and it is hard to say. But others where the enemy's military strength has been analyzed, where the main garrisons are located. [sentence as published] A stocktaking of forces as a revolutionary movement with participation by the masses in armed, political and trade union activities and by the people in short-term situations as they arise and some combat situations through which the enemy is exhausted and disbanded [sentence as published] when the proper time comes, the enemy's main military garrisons will be besieged and wiped out.

--We see the struggle as something very dynamic and dialectic. Each organization can be given its share of military targets to be attacked.

--Thus far, we do not have the support the Sandinists had, but we are sure to get it because of the cooling of relations between El Salvador and other countries.

--Some governments are waiting to see what power option the revolutionary movement actually represents. This is a phase under preparation. Its logical consequence will be the support of democratic governments and a diplomatic offensive. We are waging a full-fledge diplomatic offensive to brief them on our plans. It means breaking down the scheme of imperialist domination. The United States has learned from the Nicaraguan experience and has skillfully plotted in Latin America, engaging in a campaign of rapprochement, offers and threats toward any democratic countries that may show solidarity toward our struggle. The absence of full and direct governmental support to our process hinges on this.

--The people must harvest the crops, appropriate them and consume them to build up their overall strength and vigor to go on with their struggle. They must not export the crops or turn them over to the capitalists.

--The nationwide strike was not entirely favorable to the campaign. We revolutionaries must be sufficiently realistic and optimistic. The strike was not altogether successful in this regard. We feel that our people must be prepared for the worst and for the harsh and bloody war we are going to wage. We do not want this war; it is something we have to do if we are to liberate our people.

--We will obtain our companeros' release. We are going to carry out all sorts of military and mass activities in solidarity with the most advanced sectors of the working class represented within the Union of Electrical Workers of the Lempa River Hydroelectric Executive Commission.

--The state of national emergency produces a great psychological impact. However, because of their high degree of organization and orientation by vanguard organizations, our people will not be dominated and we will forge ahead. The enemy must repeal those decrees and end the military control over the unions; otherwise it will be provoking its own downfall.

--Majano: He enjoys the recognition we revolutionaries grant to democrats in general. We feel he is a progressive and democratic man who should participate in the process of liberation of our people.

CHURCH CONDEMNS BOMBING OF ITS RADIO STATION

PA010238 San Salvador DIARIO LATINO in Spanish 29 Sep 80 pp 6, 20

[Excerpts] The church is not against the government or its officials. It is opposed to all forms of injustice, as interpreted in the Medellin and Puebla Documents, Monsignor Arturo Rivera Y Damas, apostolic administrator of the San Salvador Archdiocese said while defining the attitude of the church and the destruction of the YSAX Voz de La Verdad broadcasting facilities.

The prelate emphasized that the Catholic Church does not hold political positions. "It is with the people and the truth," but had no faith in the investigation of the broadcasting facilities bombing.

The press conference held by Monsignor Rivera Y Damas was attended by Msgr Ricardo Urioste, General Vicar and Father Fabian Amaya Torres in charge of the church's communication media. The three churchmen condemned the attack against YSAX and said they have no faith in the investigations.

Monsignor Ricardo Urioste said in turn that when Msgr Oscar Arnulfo Romero was murdered an investigation was made, but nothing has been learned so far. We do not know who killed Monsignor Romero and much less do we expect to learn who bombed the radio station.

Monsignor Rivera said the church does not make charges against any sector, "because it is dangerous to comment," but it does not have much faith in the offered investigation.

Father Fabian Amaya Torres said that the YSAX radio station will continue working normally: "We shall not give up."

During the same news conference the clergymen condemned the fire of the Guatapa Convent and referred to other aspects of the wave of violence affecting the country. They also asked for a thorough investigation and public statement on the bombing attack.

In paragraph 2 of its communique released to the press the archbishopric says: "According to the details of this act and the presence of uninformed personnel, we have deduced that it involves some group, linked to the security corps, that acts with total impunity."

PAPER PRAISES FECAMCO FOR SUPPORTING FREE ENTERPRISE

San Salvador LA PRENSA GRAFICA in Spanish 28 Aug 80 p 7

[Editorial]

[Text] The principle of free enterprise--the principle that includes the freedom to operate a business, freedom of trade, and which excludes ruinous state intervention--is a pivot around which the present economic system of the western nations revolves.

This principle has been defended for some time by the Chamber of Commerce and Industry of El Salvador. This institution has been supporting free enterprise, during a time when there has been a certain amount of social, political, and economic agitation everywhere. This is a situation in which the principle of free enterprise is being brought into play, as well as other principles which are equally important within the general framework of a democracy.

There is still a great battle to be fought to prevent the breakdown of the principles, ideas, and opinions on which the activities of the Latin American peoples are based. And the Chamber of Commerce and Industry of El Salvador has been a leader in this campaign.

This struggle has drawn regional recognition. In fact, in the meeting held in the city of Tegucigalpa, the capital of Honduras, by the FECAMCO [Federation of Chambers of Commerce of the Central American Isthmus], the Nicaraguan delegation introduced a motion asking for collective recognition of the struggle for the principle of free enterprise being led by the Chamber of Commerce and Industry of El Salvador.

The Nicaraguan motion passed unanimously, thus showing that this is not a one-sided, isolated struggle, but rather it is the defense of a principle that is of interest to all the Central American nations, in particular, and to the other Latin American nations in general.

Allied with the campaign to defend this principle of free enterprise is the principle of economic freedom in its many and varied aspects. The recognition of the FECAMCO is an act of self-defense.

EDITORIAL PROTESTS VERDICT AGAINST COUP PLOTTERS

Port-au-Prince LE PETIT SAMEDI SOIR in French 23-29 Aug 80 p 11

[Text] Haitian justice has finally decided to pronounce a verdict in the action brought against the four citizens accused of plotting the "overthrow" of Duvalier's government. Since the death penalty demanded by the public ministry on 28 July last, Haitian public opinion had waited impatiently for the verdict in this action, which had seemed for some as an important "first," after cutting short the terrible Duvalier years, and for others, a political identification card of the power of 71.

For the "first" of its kind, it is surely a real one. For much too long, the old Fort-Dimanche building was the only judge for those who contested, by word or act, Francois Duvalier's power. Closing the prison cells sounded like closing the lid of a coffin for the young people arrested at random for "subversive" reading, for the intellectuals who discussed Karl Marx, or caught fire with Fidel Castro's armed action, for thcse churchmen who dared to preach the rights of the individual (anarchist remarks at that time), for activists in whose possession the SD [security corps] found arms or homemade petards, for those who clearly said what they thought about the political and economic reality of the country. Their eyes bruised by the darkness, they waited for their last hour in this antechamber of death.

That was the time of invasions and instability. In front of Haiti there was Cuba, where a young university student, who became a guerrilla, overthrew dictator Fulgencio Batista. In the "room next door," the Dominican Republic, Juan Bosch did not hide his animosity towards Papa Doc. A little further away in the United States of America, Democrat John F. Kennedy did not upset Francois Duvalier's life and death power for fear of stirring up a Cuban type revolution in Haiti.

Presidential acts of mercy or amnesty were practically non-existent. We had to wait until September 1977 to witness what was, in fact, a sensational event, which was presented by the official propaganda as a humanitarian and magnanimous act: worn-out bodies due to solitary confinement, almost forgotten faces, silhouettes which one believed dead rising from the damp semi-darkness of the cells: 108 political prisoners were released. This sad-faced miserable procession which was coming out of the door of the national penitentiary heralded a new political course indicating "contradiction" inside the regime. If the "doves" had gained a token of sympathy from public opinion, the orthodox felt wronged in what they always felt was their power: intransigence. Intent on the past, the latter did not understand: neither Carter's human rights policy which they identified with interference in state affairs, nor the criticism of the PETIT SAMEDI SOIR which they were confusing with anti-Duvalierist opposition, nor the aspirations of a new political class which, in order to open up to worldwide economy and encourage foreign investment in Haiti, was not supposed to cut short on arbitration but at least to muffle brutalities and repression.

A period of alternation in democratic and repressive measures opened an era of ambiguous policies. They went from factual authorization of "black Friday" for all political parties, to tolerating criticism of the law in connection with the press. It is, therefore, in this political context that during the action against the four citizens accused of plotting against the government, for whom the death penalty had been demanded, that a lawyer for the defense exclaimed loudly in front of the judges: "this verdict will be the birth and death certificate of Haitian democracy."

Robert Jacques Thelusma, Gustave Colas, Emmanuel Noel, ULrick Desire, contrary to the request of the public ministry, were condemned to 9 years of solitary confinement. Is this the birth of Haitian democracy?

To answer "yes," would be to advance too quickly. To answer "no," would be just as if one hoped that the accused would be shot or hanged in a public square.

We will not answer "yes" in the PETIT SAMEDI SOIR as "progressive democracy" has,in fact, often been presented as "progressive reinforcement." So much so that the liberation forces are now asking themselves which are the "real" conquests? Lerouge was the only one in the court who raised the problem of the braceros (day laborers)... when in fact the democratic forces, stripped of any true impact beyond some communiques, had to institutionally support the delegate from the Cape. Legal, administrative and theological barriers prevent the democratic forces to call for a national consensus on a national question. This is not called democracy, but a state-controlled partisan monopoly.

We will not say "no" to the question. Extremism is not our strong point. There is a difference between the death penalty and 9 years' solitary confinement. However, that does not mean that we are minimizing the sentence, as we know that confinement conditions have not changed fundamentally. Torture, humiliation and depersonalization are often denounced. And the last report of the Inter-American Commission for the Rights of Man on confinement in Haiti is particularly disquieting. The percentage of prisoners who died of tuberculosis and diarrhea is most alarming. The other day a foreign journalist asked me why, in the democratic process started in Haiti, the government had not planned to transform the noted Port-Dimanche prison into a school or social center.... I admit I did not know what to answer.

And then 9 years can be reduced according to the circumstances. However, this is what is troubling us as regards political prisoners in general. They are often hostages exchanged on the political market. Corvalan, Bukowsky went through that. Robert Matos was sold in Miami, through Castro's "good graces." Human rights do not recommend such practices.

The democratic verdict is scientific. It is based on the legal texts of civilized society. It cannot be subjective nor submissive to purely political requirements. It takes into account individual liberty against totalitarianism. Although Sacco and Vanzetti were anarchists they did not deserve the electric chair. Although they had planned (they had not reached the executive phase of their project as yet) to topple the Haitian Government, Gustave Colas, Emmanuel Noel, Jacques Thelusma, Ulrick Desire did not deserve either execution, the rope, the electric chair, or garroting, not even these 9 autumns of harsh solitary confinement.

IMPORTANCE OF CONSTITUTION TO NATIONAL PROGRESS EMPHASIZED

San Pedro Sula LA PRENSA in Spanish 19 Aug 80 p 7

/Commentary: "Finally, a Constitution!"/

[Text] After many delays--some justified, and others quite ridiculous--the National Constituent Assembly has decided to turn wholeheartedly to its principal task: to discuss the constitutional bills presented by the political parties, so that the new fundamental charter of the nation may be drawn up as quickly as possible.

From the statements voiced by various deputies, and also from the commentaries made by political observers, we see that there exists, at least in principle, a firm political intent to draft and put into effect an advanced political document.

This is important, since the greater or lesser degree of progressivism of the new constitution will determine whether or not the country can advance with security by means of positive transformations.

But it is important, as various thinkers have repeated, to define the change that is being sought.

In a recent radio broadcast, a journalist from the electronic media expressed--and rightly so--his concern about the wave of rumors circulating, rumors that claimed that the Assembly was considering the nationalization of the banks and a state takeover of coffee exports in Honduras, as a start for the program of reforms.

This would apparently be a mechanical reproduction of the Salvadoran experiment, in which these same two steps were taken, as part of the changes brought about by the revolutionary junta.

If we have to begin a plan of transformations in our country, which no one denies, since the need for change is so evident, we have to start from our true situation; if not, we would be headed toward ruin.

Honduras has its own specific characteristics, and what is good for Nicaragua, Guatemala, or Cameroon may, quite frankly, be bad for our people.

In the specific case of the banks, it seems clear that some irregularities have been detected in financial circles, but they are not of such gravity that they call for a state take-over. Remember that, in Honduras, the Central Bank has fairly wide supervisory powers, and so any irregularities may easily be corrected without going to extremes.

In the case of coffee, it would be absurd to introduce a confiscatory step of the type used in El Salvador.

In the first place, while in El Salvador 14 families dominated the total coffee production, here it is owned by 50,000 households, the vast majority of whom own small and medium farms that have no relation at all with the huge fiefs of our neighboring country, which have now been expropriated by the agrarian reform.

Apart from that, there are mechanisms of social ownership and community export systems, such as the Honduran Federation of Coffee Cooperatives, Limited, while at the same time, traditional commercial exporters are operating all over the country, who compete by offering better prices to producers. All of this is radically different from what was happening in El Salvador, where the entire operation, in its three parts--agricultural, commercial, and financial--was controled by the powerful minority that for decades had been running the country with an iron fist.

Both examples are more than enough to remind us of something that we should all keep in mind: Honduras is a special case in Central America, and it is precisely because of its special nature that guerrilla movements and violence have not prospered here.

Now. Does all this mean that we should continue with things as they are?

Obviously, no. The need for free enterprise to continue to operate without asphyxiating obstacles does not necessarily mean that we have to ignore major social problems.

On a number of occasions LA PRENSA has told its readers that where political democracy has been combined with free enterprise, the resulting prosperity has been impressive.
